“That the Appropriation Bill be printed and distributed in time for consideration before the Bill passes through Committee of the House,”

I must remark, that when the Appropriation Bill is introduced, any question about the printing of the Bill, its distribution, and the time for discussing it, ought then to be brought under the notice of the House, and can then be settled. But anticipating discussion on a Bill, which must come in the course of the present Session under the notice of the House, is, in my opinion, irregular. I have therefore privately intimated to the noble Lord that the mode in which he proposed to bring the subject under consideration would not be in conformity with the rules and orders of the House.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he rose on a question of order. He wished the right hon. Gentleman would instruct him as to the course which he ought to pursue. Two years ago he brought the same subject under the consideration of the House, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wilts (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt) both concurred in the opinion that he ought to bring the question forward at the beginning of the Session. In obedience to those high authorities he had done so, and he now understood that it was out of order.

He would act in obedience to the decision of the right hon. Gentleman (the Speaker), but he wished to know the course which he ought to pursue; for the state of the case was this:—The Appropriation Bill was not printed, nor was it in anybody's hands, until it became the law of the land, and the matter was past remedy. For the last seventeen years most objectionable matter had been introduced into the Bill without the knowledge of the House—matters which he would undertake to prove lay at the very root of the abuses of their financial system. He would undertake to prove that it had “infistulated”—if he might use the expression—the whole financial system of the country. He would therefore beg leave to ask the right hon. Gentleman what course he ought to pursue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, as far as regarded the second of these Resolutions, it contained matter of very considerable public importance, and, in its substance, was well worth the attention of the House. He would fain hope the noble Lord would, through the help of the right hon. Gentleman, find means of bringing the substance of that Resolution under the consideration of Parliament. But as respected the first Resolution, he would submit to the consideration of the noble Lord, whether it was hardly necessary to trouble himself or others to discuss the mode of bringing it into proper shape, because it was not customary for the House to occupy itself with discussing whether a particular Bill should be printed or not. What he wished to point out was, that there was nothing in the matter which the noble Lord had in view which required him to submit a Motion to the House, even if formal. The present state of the case was this:—The Bill was prepared by the Government and printed for the use of the House, and he freely tendered to the noble Lord the assurance on the part of the Government that the Bill should be carefully revised, and he had no doubt the same thing would be done by those who might succeed them. The Bill should be revised by the Government in time to be printed before it went into Committee. It was not for him to say that the Bill should be printed; it was for the House to determine that. But, so far as the Government was concerned, he could assure the noble Lord that no impediment should be thrown in the way of having the Bill printed before going into Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: I had the pleasure of informing the noble Lord, when I thought it my duty to object to the form of his Motion, that I should be very happy to give him my assistance in drawing up a general Resolution to accomplish the main object he has in view. But I was not able to undertake to do so under the pressure of public and private business now on my hands. I must, however, inform the noble Lord and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that for some years past it has been customary to print this Bill; the only difference is, that instead of a large number of copies being circulated through the body of the House, a hundred copies are printed, and are at the disposal of hon. Members in the Vote Office.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he wished to call attention to the fact that there were other Bills of the same description. For instance, the Indemnity Bill was passed annually without being printed—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman will communicate with me in private, I shall be happy to give him every assistance on the subject.

NAVY (PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT).

ADDRESS MOVED.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to move that the House should, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, submitting to Her Majesty, That, in the opinion of this House—First, the position of the Officers of Her Majesty's Naval Service, in respect of promotion and retirement, is not satisfactory, and ought to be amended; secondly, that with a view to the increased efficiency of the Naval Service, and to meet the just expectations of Officers with respect to promotion, it is desirable to adopt for all ranks the principle of retirement by age; thirdly, that the pay of Naval Officers ought to be so adjusted as to enable them consistently to maintain the rank they hold, and to give them fair remuneration for honourable service. It might remove some misapprehension if he were to state that the fourth clause, which he intended to remove from his Resolution, and which was removed from the paper in the hands of the Speaker, was retained in the papers in the hands of hon. Members generally. He wished also before proceeding with the statement which he proposed to make to pay that deference which was due to the noble Lord the first Minister of the Crown, who had at the last moment given notice of the Amendment which was on the paper. Were he at all certain that the appointment of the Select Committee proposed by the noble Lord would enter on a proper consideration of the subject to which he was about to call attention, it would not be at all respectful to the House to occupy their time after such a suggestion from the first Minister of the Crown. But it would be in the recollection of the House that one of the highest authorities in it—the Chancellor of the Exchequer—had laid down the axiom that referring any subject to a Select Committee was the same as shelving it. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head, but the House would recollect that he had given expression to a conviction of that kind in that House on a previous occasion, and therefore it was well that they should understand what the intentions of Her Majesty's Government might be when they suggested that any particular subject should be submitted to a Committee. The reasons he had for requesting the attention of the House to the subject were of sufficient moment to warrant him in discussing it at considerable length. It would be admitted that considerable dissatisfaction existed amongst the officers of the navy, and that dissatisfaction, he believed, was not without some grounds—indeed, it might be said good grounds; because the first Minister of the Crown had, at the last moment, suggested that the subject should be referred to a Committee, which he would not have done if there had not been some matter for the Committee to investigate. In the first place, he would call attention to a speech made by the First Sea Lord of the Admiralty at the recent election in Devonport. That Gentleman was a great authority on naval matters, and he stated, with respect to the scheme for increasing the pay of naval officers, as follows:—

“There was another question which had been brought forward, and that was respecting a scheme for increasing the pay of certain naval officers. In the position which he held as one of the Lords of the Admiralty they could not expect him to enter into the details of such a scheme as that. Before the Admiralty were advised to adopt a scheme of that nature, he thought they should be furnished with every particular of the grievances of which those naval officers complained.”

One would imagine from that remark that no such grievances had ever been brought under the notice of the Admiralty or that, if they had, the Admiralty had been in the habit of attending to them. It would, however, be in the recollection of the House that in 1859 the hon. and gallant Member for the East Riding (Admiral Duncombe) presented a petition, signed by 500 lieutenants, and he mentioned on another occasion this petition to the First Lord of the Admiralty. The First Lord of the Admiralty in his public capacity took no notice of that petition, but in his private capacity he directed his private Secretary to write as follows :—

"I am directed by the Duke of Somerset to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st of December, 1859, and the accompanying memorial, to which he will give his attentive consideration, and it will give him great pleasure, should he find himself at liberty, to improve the condition of the memorialists."

Well, not very long after that, in 1860, another petition of a very important character, signed by nearly all the lieutenants of the Channel fleet, sixty-four in number, approved by most of the captains of the ships in which they were serving, was presented to the Admiralty through the commander-in-chief of the fleet (Sir Charles Fremantle), in which the grievances of the petitioners were most respectfully made known to the Board. No reply was given to that memorial, but the following circular was issued :—

"All combinations of persons belonging to the fleet, for the purpose of bringing about alterations in the existing rules and regulations of the navy, whether affecting their interests individually or collectively, are prohibited as being contrary to the established usage and practice of the service, and injurious to its interests and discipline. Every person is by the Naval Discipline Act, 1860, (Part I., sec. 33,) fully authorized individually to make known to his superior any just cause of complaint, but individuals are not to combine, either by the appointment of committees or in any other manner, for the purpose of obtaining signatures to memorials, petitions, or applications, nor are they collectively to sign any such document."

That was the reply to the petition which in 1860 was placed before the Admiralty in the most respectful manner, and yet it would be seen that the First Lord of the Admiralty, instead of doing all he could, and the Board of which he was a member doing all they could to redress the grievances, both the noble Lord and the Board had done all they could to stifle the complaints. Various other classes had submitted their claims to the consideration both of that House and the Ministers of the Crown. Not very long ago the surgeons of the navy had grievances, and they had strong grievances no doubt. But they were a strong body; the Medical Colleges took up the matter, and the students were most strongly advised not to join the navy. The Admiralty found that for a time no medical officers were forthcoming, and so under that pressure the grievances of the surgeons were redressed. Various other classes had complaints, but their complaints were never listened to except under compulsion. The executive branches of the navy received no consideration whatever. Very recently complaints had been made by the masters of the navy, which was one of the most valuable executive bodies connected with the service. Their complaints had been laid before the Admiralty; the Admiralty appointed a Committee—that was the usual course; the Committee sat, and reported to the Admiralty, but neither the masters nor any one in the world, except the Admiralty, had heard what the result of that Committee was; and although a year had elapsed since the Committee reported, the report had never been made public, far less acted upon. Knowing these facts, then, was it surprising that the officers of the navy looked upon the Admiralty as anything but their friends—that they looked at the heads of their profession as being those who endeavoured, as far as might be, to deprive them of those just rights which he was sure, when known and appreciated by the country, would be readily granted to them. When the circular was issued to which he had already alluded, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) moved for the Committee which the noble Lord proposed to resuscitate, and which was then opposed by the influence of the Government. That was a Committee to inquire into promotion and retirement in Her Majesty's navy. The Government, unable to defeat the Motion directly, determined to do so by a side wind. A Committee was sitting at the time upon the construction of the Board of Admiralty, and the mode in which the other Committee was got rid of was by saddling the Admiralty Committee with all the members of his hon. and gallant Friend's Committee, and directing the large and unmanageable joint Committee to discover the truth on two subjects which had nothing on earth to do with each other. That unmanageable Committee fell to the ground, and in 1862 it was not re-appointed; and after an amazing amount of evidence had been taken, damaging to the character of the Admiralty Administration, that evidence was consigned to the waste-paper basket.

It was but right that he should refer to the course which he had himself taken with regard to the subject he desired to bring under the consideration of the House on that occasion. When that Committee was sitting he had not the honour of a seat in that House, but his hon. and gallant Friend near him suggested to him that it would be extremely desirable to ascertain what the opinion of the officers of the service was, and lay it before the Committee, and that for that purpose they should get satisfactory evidence—he did not mean evidence biassed one way or the other—but the evidence of officers of sufficient standing in the service and sufficient knowledge to appear before the Committee, who would not take up the time of the Committee by a great deal of irrelevant evidence, but who would speak to the point. There was a Committee at that time sitting in London on another subject connected with the navy, and of which he (Sir J. Hay) happened to be a member, and he mentioned to them the fact that this information was required, stating also that it seemed to him that their Committee might be used as an instrument for ascertaining the opinion of the officers of the navy. There was some considerable difficulty in obtaining opinions in the face of the Admiralty circular; but it was arranged that each officer should be written to, with a copy of a letter, with a request that he would give his opinion on the matters alluded to in the letter, and state the mode in which he proposed to remedy any grievance which might exist. That course was taken with above 1,500 officers, whose names were in his possession, and who had contributed the information required of them. Among them were officers of the highest possible rank—forty-seven admirals, some of whom were in active service, and 1,200 officers of all ranks in active service. When these replies had all been collected, he waited upon the Duke of Somerset, and had the honour of a personal interview, and he placed in the hands of the First Lord of the Admiralty the suggestions that had been received, and a copy was sent to the Secretary of the Admiralty and all the members of the Board. In order that that document should have some parentage, he had placed his name in the corner of it; but he must not omit to pay a due compliment to the gentleman who had acted as the secretary of the committee to which he had referred, the Rev. Mr. Harvey, the secretary of the Navy Fund, who had given up his time, and worked most zealously for the benefit of the navy, and he was sure for the benefit of the country also. Mr. Harvey was the descendant of an old naval stock. He was descended from that Harvey who fought in the famous action of the 1st of June, and all his relations—brothers, father, uncles, cousins—were distinguished naval officers. He therefore came from a good old naval stock, and he had accordingly taken great interest in the service. To that gentleman he (Sir J. Hay) was indebted for the calculations which were set before the House in the printed papers, and which he was happy to say had been accepted by the Admiralty as correct, the whole of them, with one trifling exception, having been verified. He had been criticised by the Duke of Somerset, and on one or two points he should like to criticise his critic. In page 21 of the printed papers it was stated, in the Duke's memorandum—

“The cost, therefore, of the proposed plan for these four classes of officers (supposing that no additional pay be granted to officers omitted from the plan) amounts to a quarter of a million annually.”

That sum was afterwards made to increase like Falstaff's men in buckram, for in page 24 it was stated—

“According to the plan proposed in these suggestions the immediate charge for retired naval officers would amount to half a million.”

Now, it was desirable that the House should understand that no such demand was made. It was also stated that the cost of the reserved list had been omitted; but that was a misapprehension. In page 27 it was remarked that the active list of the navy had been restored to a more satisfactory condition with regard to promotion, but that statement was based on an average of only two years, and the question was whether there might not be found within the next ten years greater stagnation and irregularity in promotion than had occurred before. The principal object he had in view was that stated in the Resolution he was about to propose—namely, that "the position of the officers of Her Majesty's naval service, in respect to promotion and retirement, is not satisfactory, and ought to be amended; that, with a view to the increased efficiency of the naval service, and to meet the just expectations of officers with respect to promotion, it is desirable to adopt for all ranks the principle of retirement by age." The adoption of that system would promote the efficiency of the navy, because the officers, being reduced in number, would be more constantly employed. The principle he advocated was applied in every foreign navy, and especially in that of France. Admiral Mundy, who during his recent distinguished services in the Mediterranean had been in constant and friendly communication with the French navy, expressed himself very strongly on this point in a book he had lately published. Speaking of certain inferiorities in our navy, as compared with that of France, he said—

"The Admirals, Captains, and other officers in active service afloat, in the French navy, are all comparatively young in their respective ranks—a Vice Admiral is placed in retirement at sixty-five years, and a Rear Admiral at sixty-two, the Captains and junior officers following the same law on a graduated scale, by which means a steady flow of promotion is certain through every grade. The compulsory removal from the active list at a fixed age, is considered one of the main elements for securing advancement in the profession, and it is rigidly enforced to a day by the Minister of Marine. This system, where existing interests are fairly respected, is highly conducive to the efficiency of the service, but it could never give general satisfaction to the officers of the British navy, nor could it be justly carried out, unless Flag Officers, Captains, Commanders and Lieutenants were all made impartially subject to the regulations of the scheme. I hold it, then, to be advisable for the well being and content of the Royal Navy, that some statesmanlike measure, having for its base the retirement from active service afloat at a fixed age, should be introduced by those having authority in these matters; and the sooner this long pending and irritating question is settled, the more acceptable it will be to the service at large." [Mundy, pp. 362-3.]

A forced retirement of officers at a fixed age would, of course, lead, in the first instance, to an increase in the retired list, but not in the navy list as a whole. A certain number of officers would be transferred from the active to the retired list, while the number of both classes on the books of the navy would remain as before. It was important to point that out, because it had been erroneously assumed, in the criticism on his proposal which he held in his hand, that while the one body was to be augmented, the other would be maintained at its old figure. At present there were six different retired lists for admirals, ten for captains, four for commanders, and three for lieutenants. There was no reason whatever for such a diversity of classes. It was impossible to discriminate between one class of officers and another; and the variety of lists gave rise to a great deal of professional jealousy, nearly every one feeling aggrieved at the difference between his neighbour's position and his own. In fact, the present plan was altogether of a hand-to-mouth character, without consistency or cohesion. Whenever the Admiralty found the navy getting too full, they induced a certain number of officers to go on the retired list. At one time several distinguished admirals were bribed off at the rate of 18*s.* 6*d.*; but the higher allowance of 25*s.* had been given to a subsequent batch, although they were not of the same standing. The consequence was that those on the former list very naturally complained that an injustice had been done to them. They said that they went off to relieve the navy; that they took what they could get; but that it was not fair to get them out of the way to bring on another list at a higher bribe. But the same course was pursued throughout the whole of these retired lists. He therefore urged the Government to amalgamate all the retired lists, to recompense the officers on a fair and uniform principle, and thus to put an end to these jealousies which were so injurious to the service, and were cherished by means he would say, not of the injustice, but of the irregularities of the retirement. There was no reason for proposing that there should be sixty admirals on the list beyond the fact that there were forty men on the list above the age who would have retired in consequence of age if the age system had been adopted; and that reduced the list to sixty, and it did injustice to no one. Before adopting that system it would be necessary to provide for the very few distinguished admirals at the head of the list. The proposal was, that when an officer had passed the age of a given rank, he should be promoted to the rank above it and placed on the retired list; but above the rank of admiral there was only the rank of Admiral of the Fleet, which corresponded with that of Field Marshal in the army. It was therefore suggested that some of those distinguished admirals at the head of the list, who had commanded fleets or squadrons, should receive promotion to the analogous rank which was given to military officers when they achieved the rank of Field Marshal. It was usual in the navy to have only one or two Admirals of the Fleet; at present there were seven Field Marshals; and it was naturally suggested that on the auspicious event which was shortly to occur, the officers in question should receive that step in rank which the House would not grudge them, and which they might not live long to enjoy, but that the number of the highest rank should be finally fixed at three. With reference to the number of admirals on the active list, the suggestion was that they should be reduced to sixty. There were now twenty, including those attached to the Admiralty, on active service, and that number actively employed would leave forty more ready to serve if occasion should require. It was also proposed to reduce the list of captains from 350 to 250; and as it was found that not more than 115 or 120 were employed, that reduction would give an opportunity to all the captains of serving constantly, or if not, of retiring from the list. The proposal would increase the captains on the ten retired lists from 439 to 590 officers, but at the same time it would do justice to those reserved captains whose hardships had been so frequently discussed in the House. Without going through all the various classes, he might say that his proposal would reduce the active list from 1,753 to 1,313 of all classes, and the intention was to prevent its further increase—so to use the retired list as to keep the active list down at a more workable number. The Admiralty alleged that the active list was never in a more satisfactory condition. In 1852 he addressed a letter to the noble Lord at the head of the Government on the subject of the navy as it then was; and on the basis of the Northampton tables he drew up a calculation which showed how the promotions from the captains' to the flag list would take place up to 1870. Singularly enough, in four of the ten years already he had named the man who had been junior rear admiral on the 1st of January, and in two others the persons whom he had named were on the point of arriving at the rank in the month of January. In two years, from exceptional causes, the calculations were wrong, but they righted themselves in following years, and were now within a very few names of the truth, ten years from the time of calculation. However his calculations in the main had proved correct, for what was wrong in one year would right itself in another, and therefore there could be no doubt that the tables in question formed a very reliable guide. He warned the Government, that although for the next two years there might not be a dead lock, yet stagnation in regard to promotion would certainly ensue after a few years, when the present admirals would all be men who had reached that rank at about fifty or sixty years of age. What was wanted was such a steady flow of promotion as would infuse fresh blood into the various ranks and maintain throughout the service that youthful vigour which was so essential to its efficiency.

He would next direct attention to the excessive hardships entailed on naval officers from the low scale of pay in all ranks. In the memorandum of the Admiralty it was stated that the present scale of pay was fixed by an Order in Council of date 1816, and had been arranged with due regard to the rates of pay in the army. He found by reference to the Order of Council that such was the case. Laying aside all questions of purchase, the pay of the naval officer was not fixed at the same rate as that of the military officer. The pay and allowance of an admiral commanding in chief amounted to £2,930 a year, while the pay of a general amounted to £4,151. A vice-admiral received £2,550; a lieutenant-general £4,050. The pay of a rear-admiral amounted to £2,190; that of a major-general to £3,904. According to the Order of 1816, there were circumstances peculiar to the naval service which counterbalanced the superiority in pay of the military service. Those circumstances, however, no longer existed, for they consisted for the most part, as stated in the Order itself, of the right of naval officers to their respective shares of prize money. While touching on the subject of prize money, he might ask how it was that in the Navy Estimates nothing was said, as promised, of the Kertch prize money? What had become of all the prize money so long due to the army and navy? He was surprised that the Admiralty should choose the present moment to refer the officers of the navy to an Order which stated that the pay of the military service had been fixed at one third more than that of the navy, in consequence of the prize money and other allowances receivable by naval officers. But the non-receipt of prize money was not the only grievance of which naval officers had reason to complain. The batta formerly allowed to officers serving in the East Indies had been most unjustly taken away from them. Until within the last few years the naval commander in chief on the Indian station received nearly £5,500 per annum. While, however, the War Office continued to give the generals commanding in India and China a certain allowance in lieu of batta, the Admiralty had refused, at the suggestion of the Secretary of State for India, to make a similar provision for the naval commander-in-chief. Considerable difficulty was consequently experienced in finding an officer willing to accept the post, and, if he were correctly informed, the present commander-in-chief had serious thoughts about resigning his command, on account of the inefficiency of his pay. He now received, including table money, £2,190 a year for discharging the same duties for which he was formerly paid £5,500, everything included. There was no officer of the Crown in the East, holding a corresponding rank, who was not paid double the sum given to the naval commander-in-chief. For example, the Lieutenant Governor of Hong Kong received £5,000 a year; the generals commanding in Madras and Bombay between £7,000 and £8,000, and the commander-in-chief in India about £10,000. It might be said that the naval commander-in-chief did not run the same risk; but what was the fact? Within the last few years several naval commanders in chief had died on the station; and yet, in spite of the responsibility he incurred and the hardships he suffered, the officer in command on the Indian station did not receive from the Admiralty anything like the consideration which had been accorded by the War Office to the military servants of the Crown in the East. Injury had been done to the emoluments of naval officers in another way. What he meant was, that they had been deprived of freight for the treasure which was formerly brought home in men-of-war, and now, in consequence of altered circumstances, was conveyed in contract steam vessels. Some years ago, about 1835, the commander-in-chief on the West Indian station received, including pay, freight and prize money, £14,000 a year. He now did the same work for £2,500 per annum. The pay of no military officer had been reduced in the same proportion, and surely it was not too much to ask that the pay of the naval commander-in-chief in the West Indies should be raised by £1,000 a year, in order that he might be prevented from running into debt. Again, the post of the naval commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean was one of the most important under the Crown. It was impossible to say what calls might not be made upon him, or what diplomatic skill he might not be required to show. Was it right so to limit his pay as to make it almost impossible for any officer to go to the Mediterranean unless he had a large private fortune? Surely the service had not been thrown open to the competition of all classes, in order that high commands should be held only by wealthy men. It was not proposed that the naval commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean should be so highly paid as the Governor of Malta, or Gibraltar, or the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, though his position was far more responsible than any of them. The proposal was that he should get £4,500 a year, instead of a little over £2,000, as at present. An allowance was made for the capture of slaves, but in that respect no officer, except the commander-in-chief at the Cape of Good Hope, derived the smallest advantage. In three years the commander-in-chief on the West Indian station received accidentally about £600 for the capture of slaves; but the money he was obliged to disburse during the same period considerably exceeded the amount he received from the Crown altogether. He next came to the pay of the captains, which had been gradually reduced since 1816, and he did not know any corresponding class of officers who received less pay. The average pay of a captain in 1816 was £575 a year; it was now, adding command money, £565. There were actually captains who received, as active pay, not more than £365 a year; and he believed that the command money, which had been called a boon, did not average more than £6 10s. per annum. That was not so small a matter as it might seem to be, for those officers were compelled to give entertainments at foreign ports, and they did so with their own money, and got into debt. He did not think that military officers were overpaid, but they were certainly in a better position than the officers of the navy. A military officer had to purchase his commission; but his regiment, if he so pleased, was his home until he became a colonel. On the other hand, a naval officer could not serve his time for his flag without spending £3,000 or £4,000 of his own money; when his ship was paid off, he was turned adrift, and he could not turn his attention to some other employment, because he was obliged to hold himself in readiness for active service. When again appointed to a ship, he had to provide an outfit at his own expense, and at last he became an admiral with £456 a year half-pay, whereas a general officer, besides receiving about the same amount of pay, had his chance of a regiment. The case of naval officers was so accurately described in a publication which appeared on the previous day, that he would take the liberty of quoting it to the House—

"He enters the service at thirteen as naval cadet, becomes a midshipman at fifteen, a sub-lieutenant at nineteen, and a lieutenant at twenty-two. He is now in the receipt of 10s. a day full pay, and 4s. half-pay. So far there is nothing to complain of; but, unless he has strong interest or unusual luck, he remains a lieutenant ten years, and at thirty-two has not a farthing more full pay than he had at twenty-two. At thirty-two we will say that he is promoted to the rank of commander; he then has to go on shore with the half-pay of 8s. 6d. a day, and remain idle for three years, when, at the age of thirty-five, he will be offered a command. His full pay is now 16s. 6d. a day, with 2s. 6d. a day table money; with this 2s. 6d. he is supposed to entertain his officers, foreign captains, consuls, &c. At the end of a four years' commission we will presume that our officer has paid his ship off in a creditable manner, and has obtained his post-captain's commission. He is now thirty-nine, and in receipt of 10s. 6d. a day half-pay and five years to enjoy it; at the age of forty-four he is again offered a ship, and we will say he accepts it (many men cannot, as it would ruin them). Well, he takes command of a corvette, and his full pay is £1 a day, and 5s. for table money, and as captain he is frequently put into situations where he must entertain, and very frequently too."

As an illustration he might mention that a friend of his, some years ago, and before the expulsion of the late dynasty from Greece, being in command of a corvette, was called upon to convey to Ancona, the brother of the King. Well, the commander laid out a considerable sum—about £80, in providing delicacies for the the Royal personage and his suite. Just as he had got everything ready, down came a message to the effect that the departure would not take place for a week. At the end of the week the ices and other things being spoiled, he had to go through the same preparation again; and when he remitted the account to the then Admiralty through the commanding officer at Athens he was told that he could only be paid for one preparation—namely, £80, instead of £160. That was only an illustration of what was a frequent occurrence.

"At the end of another four years he pays his ship off, and at forty-eight years of age he once more finds himself in a state of enforced idleness, with 10s. 6d. a day half-pay. If he is a man of strong interest, he may, at the end of another three years (ætat 51), obtain command of a Coastguard ship, with the full pay of £1 5s., and 8s. 6d. a day for table money. This is considered one of the great prizes of the service, as the captain's family can live on board, and, as a general rule, the captain of one of the home ships is not called on to entertain as much as he is obliged to do abroad. But this pleasant command only lasts a sharp three years, and at fifty-four he is once more on half pay—10s. 6d. a day, if he is not included within the first 170 captains on the list; 12s. 6d. a day if his name is included between the 70th and 170th names, and 14s. 6d. if his name appears within the first 70. Twenty years is the average time an officer is on the captain's list before he obtains his flag, and so our captain at fifty-nine becomes a Rear Admiral with a half-pay of £1 5s.; in another seven years he becomes a Vice Admiral (ætat 66) and receives £1 12s. 6d. a day half-pay; another seven years and our naval cadet of sixty years ago has got to the top of the tree, is now a full Admiral, and gets £2 2s. a day half-pay—that is to say, that having devoted sixty years of his life to the service of his country he gets £766 10s. per annum for his reward."

Pursuing the history of the imaginary officer, to whom he had referred, to the top of his profession, he might by great interest or extraordinary luck become a full admiral at the age of seventy-three. He would then, after sixty years of arduous toil and in all climes, if he was lucky, find himself in the receipt of £766 10s. a year; but if they would look at the Navy Estimates which had just been laid on the table, they would find that the solicitor to the Admiralty had just retired after eighteen years' service upon £746 a year. He hoped his legal friends would not suppose that he begrudged them their due, but still it did seem hard that a naval officer who had served in all climes, and incurred all danger, should, with the greatest possible luck (for only twenty-one men out of the whole could obtain it)—should after sixty years of service only obtain £20 a year more than the solicitor to the Admiralty after eighteen years' service. In his Key to the Civil Service Mr. Parkinson, himself a civil servant, avowed that though the profession to which he belonged was not so well paid as the law, it contrasted very favourably, at least in its highest ranks, with the army and navy.

Let them next compare the pay of English naval officers with those engaged in foreign services. The lowest full pay of a captain in the English navy was £365 per annum, and the highest £547, to which must be added command money, when in command of a ship, £91, or £155, or £219 per annum, according to the complement of the ship. The only pay of a captain in the American navy was £875, being 140 per cent more than the average pay of that rank in the English navy. In the English navy the lowest half-pay was £191, and the highest £264. The half-pay in the American navy was £625, being an excess of 227 per cent over the average of our navy. In the French navy the highest captain's pay was £833, and the lowest £536. The difference held good through all ranks. The commander in the English navy received, with command money, £346 per annum. The American full sea pay for the same rank was £654. The lowest rate of pay for this rank in the English navy was £301, the lowest in the American navy, £588 10s., or 95 per cent more. The half-pay in the American navy was, the highest £468, and the lowest £375. In the English navy the highest was £182, and the lowest £155. In the French navy there was no rank answering to that of commander, and therefore with regard to this rank he could enter into no comparison with the navy of France. The pay of a lieutenant in command in the English navy, including command money, was £219; the full sea pay of an American officer of the same rank was, £531 5s.; that of a French officer £355. The highest pay of a lieutenant serving in a ship in our navy was £200; the full sea pay of an American officer in the same position was £468. The lowest pay of a lieutenant in the English navy was £182; the full pay of an American officer of the same rank was £312. In the English navy the highest rate of half-pay for this class of officers was £155 and the lowest £73; in the American navy the highest was £302, and the lowest £250. This comparison showed that the officers of the American navy were paid more than double what the officers of our navy received, and yet the officers of the English navy were supposed to meet the Americans on terms of equality, and he trusted they performed their duties quite as well as they did. When a captain paid off his ship, he not unfrequently found his half-pay was lower than that of his surgeon. The supply of surgeons proved unequal to the demand, and they obtained something like a measure of justice; but was it right for the Government or for a Naval Administration to suggest to its officers that nothing would be given to justice, but everything to compulsion? The utter inadequacy of pay in the navy would be seen by another comparison. The junior captain of a regiment at this moment serving in China ranked with a junior lieutenant of the navy; yet he was receiving £46 a year more than a captain in charge of a naval brigade on that important station. These anomalies could not be in accordance with the wishes of her Majesty's Government, though they were in accordance with the regulations; they were not in conformity with the Order of Council of 1816, but with the mistaken construction which was put upon it.

One suggestion to which he wished to call attention he was sure would carry with it the assent of the House. It was known that after a lieutenant had served a certain time he had no chance of promotion. His proposal was to give encouragement to men to serve, for he was sure that naval officers would bear him out when he said that one of the great evils at the present time was that they could not lay their hands upon a first lieutenant, upon whom so much depended (being the superior officer next to the captain) to keep the ship in first-class order. Thirty years ago it was known where these officers had been, and where they had received their training; and if a captain succeeded in securing a lieutenant of ability and experience, the ship was manned in a few days after he had hoisted his pennant, and everything was in brilliant order. Now, men after a certain length of service quitted the navy, or else shirked being first lieutenants as much as possible. The present administration had done all they could to make that position additionally distasteful by taking away the time of officers who went to serve on board the Excellent. The proposal he had to make was, that after three years' service the lieutenant should receive a gradual increase of pay up to twenty years' service at the rate of 6d. per day. This, he was sure, would be received with the most abundant satisfaction by the officers of this class. At the end of twenty years, after doing his duty well and thoroughly, the officer would be able to retire from the service which had had the benefit of his hearty and effectual co-operation. It seemed to him that it would be desirable to adopt some portion of the suggestion as to the plan always followed in the army of paying the adjutant, who received 7s. 6d. a day. The proposal was to give the officer who was the adjutant of the ship, the first lieutenant or the gunnery lieutenant, some additional pay for having instructed himself and made himself competent to instruct others in those points by excelling in which they could only have an efficient navy. This he proposed to fix at 3s. 6d. a day.

There was another point to which he invited attention—namely, with reference to the reduction in the number of officers of the navy. The proposal in the suggestion was that there should be no more cadets introduced into the service than could be absorbed by due and proper promotion. The present system was to admit as many as filled the subordinate offices, without regard to what became of them afterwards. He thought it very unfair to bring in boys of thirteen or fourteen years of age, who at twenty found themselves without any prospects in the service, and had in the meantime been debarred from study or from the means of qualifying themselves for any other profession. The present was peculiarly a time at which a change could be introduced advantageously, for we were about to have a fleet consisting of a few large iron-cased ships and a large number of gunboats. On board small vessels there were no facilities for training youngers, and these would consequently have to be kept on board the larger ships, of which there were only to be a limited number. He gave his noble Friend great credit for stimulating the naval reserve by his speeches, by his writings, and his acts; and in connection with that force, and the officers who had been induced to join it, the House must bear in mind that a great additional element of naval strength had been gained. Not merely would the crews of ships of war be kept by its assistance up to their full strength, not merely would hands be found to man vessels engaged in the transport of troops, but the Government would be able to send all our best and swiftest merchant steamers to sea; and if these could not be opposed to the enemy's iron-clads, at least they would sweep his commerce from the ocean.

Sir John Hay

These lieutenants of the naval reserve really answered to the grade of master and commander which was introduced into the navy a hundred years ago, the officers holding that grade being the captains of hired ships, who did good service in their day, but had been since gradually elbowed out of the navy. It was likewise necessary to improve the condition of the warrant and petty officers, among whom were many good men and true. He maintained that on their part there was no wish to aspire to the higher grades of the service; they looked to offices in the dockyards as the legitimate rewards of their exertions; and if the best men were encouraged to accept these positions, there would be no necessity to introduce so many boys into the navy. One other point he was sorry to have to touch upon—he did not mean to allude to the question of barrack accommodation, but to that of naval colleges. He was astonished, after the recommendations made more than two years ago, that no immediate pains were taken to increase the staff on board the Britannia and other training ships, and to give the excellent officers in charge the assistance they so much needed, and thus put a stop to the mischief which existed. It had been stated to him that there had been twenty-seven boys under the age of fifteen laid up at Haslar Hospital under a disease too loathsome to be mentioned. Was this known to the Admiralty, and yet no steps taken to establish a naval college? He was sorry to have had to allude to so painful a subject, but at all events the abominations to which he had referred should cease to exist. [See page 818.]

There might be a few boys, who, like the Assyrian youths in the furnace, might pass through a school where such a state of things existed, unscathed, but they must be few. He thought that what he had stated furnished strong reason for establishing a naval college, and that the boys should be kept at a public school or elsewhere until they were old enough to enter into that college. The system now was not the same as it was a few years ago, when the boy was consigned to the captain's care, and the captain looked upon him as a son. He approved of boys not going to sea until they were sixteen. Lord Dundonald was between seventeen and eighteen when he first went to sea, and it did not prevent his becoming one of the most distinguished naval officers. He had endeavoured to lay before the House the reasons why he had accepted the suggestions of these officers, and why he had undertaken to introduce the subject to the notice of the House. He hoped that he had done it prudently and temperately. He had given intimation of his intention to the Admiralty, and to the noble Duke at the head of it. He had shown that it was impossible for naval officers to make their grievances known, and how the circular to which he had referred prevented their taking the course which had been suggested. He had nothing further to add than to move the Resolutions which were placed in the Speaker's hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, submitting to Her Majesty, That, in the opinion of this House, the position of the Officers of Her Majesty's Naval Service, in respect of promotion and retirement, is not satisfactory, and ought to be amended; with a view to the increased efficiency of the Naval Service, and to meet the just expectations of Officers with respect to promotion, it is desirable to adopt for all ranks the principle of retirement by age; the pay of Naval Officers ought to be so adjusted as to enable them consistently to maintain the rank they hold, and to give them fair remuneration for honourable service."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, doing full justice, as I am prepared to do, to the motives of the hon. and gallant Officer who has made this Motion, and convinced as I am that he has been actuated by nothing more than an honourable desire to promote the interests of the service of which he is a distinguished ornament, yet I cannot refrain from dissenting from the course which out of the House, and now in the House, the hon. and gallant Officer has thought fit to pursue. If there is one principle with regard to military and naval bodies which ought more than any other to be borne in mind, it is that military and naval bodies ought not to become deliberative assemblies, with the view especially of enforcing on the Government what they conceive will be changes for their own benefit and advantage. It would be a most dangerous precedent if it were admitted that the navy of the country, or the army of the country, are to meet together and to appoint committees, which committees are to correspond with every member of the profession with a view to inciting them to state grievances which they feel, or to feel grievances of which, perhaps, they were not hitherto aware. Such proceedings must tend to shake the foundation of military and naval discipline, and are most dangerous in their possible consequences. I have too high an opinion of the naval officers of this country to entertain any apprehension as to the result of the labours of the self-constituted committee of which the hon. and gallant Officer has this evening been the mouthpiece. But I say the principle on which they have acted is a wrong and dangerous principle, and, I trust, will not be deemed a precedent for future proceedings. For I say that when you ask members of a profession, individually or collectively, whether they would not like a little more pay or earlier promotion, whether they do not think that other people in some other profession are better off than themselves, and whether they will not feel obliged to any man who will stand forward as their champion with a view to obtain advantages of some sort or another—I say if you know human nature, you can readily surmise what the answer to such an invitation will be. The hon. and gallant Officer has stated in a very impressive manner, that which I have no doubt in many cases is perfectly true, that hardships are felt by members of the naval profession from the inadequacy of their pay to the demands made upon them and the slowness of promotion. But is the navy the only service in which you can find those complaints, and often well-founded complaints? Are there no such complaints in the Church? Are there no complaints in the law? Are there no complaints in the civil service? In every one of these great national professions will you not find men of merit and talent, who justly feel their advancement is not equal to their pretensions and qualities, and that the remuneration which they receive is not nearly sufficient to furnish them with all the means to maintain the position in society which they feel they deserve? But we are obliged to look in this House at these things on a great scale, and cannot deal with one profession singly and by itself. If you begin to increase the pay and advantages of one profession, you will be called on to do the same with others. You cannot improve the condition of the officers without feeling that something must be done for the men in the navy. You cannot increase the advantages of the navy without doing something for the army. You would be led, in this way, to an enormous increase of national expenditure; and when the Government came down with the Estimates founded on what the hon. and gallant Officer would call "an improved principle," a cry would be raised in the House and the country that it was an undue increase of expenditure, and a proportionate increase of taxation. Therefore, I say that the hon. and gallant Officer, very naturally looking to his own profession, has not sufficiently attended to the bearings of the question on the general administration and resources of the country. But if I think, with all deference, that the course pursued by this self-constituted committee of officers is not altogether consistent with a due regard to the discipline of the naval service, I must be permitted to say that the course which the hon. and gallant Officer has taken in proposing these resolutions is not altogether consistent with a proper regard for the legitimate functions of this House of Parliament. It is impossible to pretend to prescribe the proper and precise limits for the action of this House. I know full well that there is no part of the administration of this mighty empire, with all the organization of this mighty empire, which this House is not entitled to take into consideration, and upon consideration to propound opinions and advice. But in a mixed and balanced constitution like ours each branch ought well and duly to consider with great discretion and forbearance how it will exercise its functions in a particular case.

The hon. and gallant Officer has proposed three Resolutions. The first bears on the system of promotion and retirement in the navy; the second on the extension of a system of compulsory retirement at certain stages of life; and the third calls on the House to affirm that the pay and allowances of the navy ought to be such as to enable the officers to maintain a due position in the service. Now, it seems to me that it is a dangerous course for this House to assume to itself administrative functions. Anybody who knows anything of administration must know that a multitude of administrations for any one particular purpose cause confusion. But that an assembly of 650 Gentlemen should be able to administer the details of any public department is, I think, a proposition which it is only necessary to state in order to see the impossibility of its application. At the same time, I admit that there may be instances in which it might be fitting, in the opinion of the House, to address Her Majesty's Government, with a view to some particular purpose which the House may think it expedient to accomplish. But in that case, this House ought to be precise and intelligible in its recommendations and advice. The Resolution ought to be one which the executive Government of the day might know how to carry out if it thought fit to adopt it, or which it might understand fully and in detail, in order, if it did not choose to be responsible for it, that it might be able to take such steps as the circumstances might dictate. But the Resolutions of the hon. and gallant Officer, if adopted to-night, would leave the Government entirely at sea as to the particular mode of acting upon them. They call upon us to say that the present system of promotion and retirement is unsatisfactory. Well, then, what is satisfactory? What would the Government have to propose to the House with the view of meeting the objection that the present system is unsatisfactory? Probably the hon. and gallant Member would answer, "You will find that in my speech or my memorandum." [Sir JOHN HAY: Hear, hear!] But his speech and his memorandum are no part of the decisions of this House of Parliament; they do not appear in our journals; they are not matters to which the Government could appeal and say, in the name of the Sovereign, "We have done that which the House of Commons asked," because the House of Commons would not have asked anything definite, precise or intelligible, which the Government would know to be the object and purpose of the Resolution. The same remark holds good as to the second Resolution about retirement by age. There is already, to a certain degree, a practical application of that principle. The hon. and gallant Gentleman wishes the principle to be extended, but he does not say to what limit, in what way, or, in short, give any clue to enable the Admiralty to know that by doing any particular thing in that respect they will have accomplished the wishes of the House. I say, then, that these Resolutions are so vague and indefinite in their terms, that if they were affirmed by the House, the Government, with the utmost desire to meet the intentions which the House might be supposed to have expressed, would remain perfectly in the dark as to the mode in which effect should be given to them.

I will not go into the details of that which the Admiralty have already done upon these matters. My noble and gallant Friend the Secretary to the Board will, I have no doubt, explain fully to the House all that the Department has done, and in what degree the opinions and assertions of the hon. and gallant Officer, in regard to the many points of detail on which he has entered, are well or ill-founded. But as to the last Resolution, which bears upon pay, I humbly submit that that is not a proposition which this House would, if well advised, think it proper to adopt. It does not even say that the pay ought to be increased; but there are words inserted in the concluding paragraph by which the House would pledge itself to make good the expense of any of these different propositions. Well, I hold out that it is not expedient for this House to address the Crown gravely to make an increase in any Department of the public expenditure. It is for the executive Government, upon its responsibility, if it should see fit so to do, to propose to Parliament such additions to that expenditure as they may deem necessary for the public service, and it is for this House to adopt or reject them as it pleases. But I think the House will agree with me that it is not advisable to address the Crown in these vague expressions, calling upon it indirectly to make a great increase in our naval expenditure—an increase which must be followed by further augmentations of charge in that very same Department, and which, if carried into effect with regard to the navy, could not be stopped there, but must be extended to the army, and even to the Civil Service also. The hon. and gallant Officer dwelt very much upon a comparison of the emoluments of certain ranks in the navy with those of the army and other public departments. Now, as to a comparison with the army, it must be borne in mind that the commissions in that service are purchased, and that the officers embark a considerable capital to rise to any high rank, whereas in the navy the same practice does not obtain. But, in both the army and the navy, if you merely took the incomes given to men even in high rank as professional pay, why, no doubt, every man would wish that they were a great deal more. But the remuneration to these services does not consist simply in annual emoluments. There is the respect which is paid to them in their several positions—there is the admiration which the nation feels for the service of which they are members. And it is not a vain assertion to say that honours and respect are not an insignificant element in a requital for public services, because our whole system is founded upon a contrary assumption. We reward men by titles and by decorations; and, when we come to the highest rewards, you, Sir, reward the most distinguished commanders not by pecuniary emoluments, but by conveying to them from that Chair the thanks of this House of Parliament for the services they have rendered to the country. The highest recompense awarded to public men consists of honours showing that they have entitled themselves to the respect and regard of their fellow-countrymen. That, therefore, must be borne in mind when you consider what naval and military officers receive in return for the personal exposure they undergo and the deeds they achieve in performing their duty to their Sovereign. If, then, I cannot concur in the Motion of the hon. and gallant Officer, I feel it incumbent on me to pursue on this occasion precisely the same course as I pursued two years ago with regard to the Resolution moved by the hon. and gallant Officer who sits next to him (Sir J. Elphinstone). The hon. and gallant Officer who made the present Motion has referred to what then took place. On that occasion, Resolutions had been carried which involved not only the question of promotion and retirement, but the question of pay. The House, on being appealed to on a subsequent day, rescinded those Resolutions, and consented to refer to a Committee then sitting on Admiralty organization the question of retirement and promotion. It so happened that that Committee consumed the entire Session in taking evidence, and did not make any Report. The hon. and gallant Officer says they did that which was most damaging to the Admiralty; they reported the evidence they had taken. I might, perhaps, be allowed to interpret their course upon a different principle. The Committee was not appointed in any friendly spirit to the Admiralty. Their examinations were not conducted with the view of heaping honour and credit upon the Admiralty. But when they came to the end of their inquiries, and the Session was over, they prudently abstained from putting into a Report the result of the evidence they had taken. I believe, if they had done so, the Report would have been favourable to the conduct and the organization of the Department they inquired into. At all events, let me ask, why did they not move to re-appoint the Committee in the ensuing Session? If they had thought the result of the evidence they had taken was so damaging to the Admiralty as the hon. and gallant Officer says, I should have imagined that pure patriotism, if no other motive, would have led them, for the sake of the public service, to re-establish that Committee the following year, with the view of bringing to a condemnatory conclusion the evidence which he thus characterizes. But no such thing. Last year was allowed to pass away without any re-establishment of that Committee. If it had been so re-established, it would have gone into those questions connected with retirement and promotion which it was specially instructed to investigate, and which it was not able to do in 1861 because the time did not permit of it. Well, Sir, I now propose to do precisely what I did then. As the hon. and gallant Officer has brought this question again before the House, if the House thinks it fit that an inquiry should be made into the existing system of promotion and retirement, Her Majesty's Government have no objection whatever to that investigation being made. And I would propose that a Committee should be appointed for the specific purpose of going now into that inquiry which the Committee of 1861 could not enter upon. I therefore propose as an Amendment to the Resolutions of the hon. and gallant Officer those of which I have given notice—that in the first place it is not expedient for the House to pronounce an opinion on a question of promotion and retirement, which has been committed to the investigation of a Committee until we shall have received the Report of a Committee on this question, and that a Committee be re-appointed for the purpose of entering on that investigation.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having on the 13th day of March 1861 instructed a Select Committee to consider the present system of Promotion and Retirement in the Royal Navy, is of opinion that its decision should be suspended until the subject shall have been accordingly considered and reported upon; and that a Select Committee be appointed to consider the present system of Promotion and Retirement in the Royal Navy, and to report their opinion thereon to this House,"

—instead thereof.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the speech of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government very much resembled the month about to commence—it came in like a lion, but went out like a lamb. He (Sir James Elphinstone) did not belong to the naval service of the country, and therefore he hoped that the animadversions which the noble Viscount had been pleased to make upon the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend would not apply to him. He trusted that he might stand up to state freely and boldly, and as an independent Member of the House, that in his opinion the grievances and wrongs of the officers of Her Majesty's naval service cried aloud for inquiry and redress. Two years before he had obtained a Committee upon this question. And how did the Government meet him? Because there happened to be introduced into the Resolution one word which was considered by the forms of the House to be improper the Committee was tacked on to another inquiry, which was never intended to produce any useful result. He quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that the evidence which was reported to the House by that Committee left a slur on the Board of Admiralty. And he could not understand any Government sitting under it. Had the Government done their duty when his hon. and gallant Friend (Admiral Duncombe) declined to move the appointment of the Committee, the Government would have put up a naval Member on the Treasury bench to move its re-appointment. There were four or five ex-First Lords on that Committee, and official members fully sufficient to bear up the noble Lord's views, and when they made their Report to whitewash all the previous performances of the Board of Admiralty. The noble Viscount stated that there were grievances in the Church, in the Law, and in the Civil Service; and if the Resolutions of his hon. and gallant Friend should have the effect of removing the grievances of the officers of the naval service, then every other service in the country would start up with its peculiar grievance. The Church, no doubt, had many of its members labouring in a good cause upon very inferior incomes. But two blacks could never make a white. Why should not their incomes be raised to a more just and equitable standard?

Viscount Palmerston

There were, however, positions of preference in the Church far beyond what any naval officer could hope for, and the average remuneration in the Church of England was considerably above that in the naval service. With regard to the law, he thought its representatives were fully competent to speak for themselves. There did not, however, appear to be anything in that House to show that that profession was in a very bad state. With respect to the Civil Service, its representatives, feeling themselves aggrieved, had already done what the navy was doing. They had brought their grievances before that House, and had obtained some redress for the wrongs of which they complained. The address moved for by his hon. and gallant Friend was not one intended to be made to that House, but to be laid at the foot of the Throne. He admitted that the highest reward that a subject could possibly receive was to come into that House and receive its thanks. But he asked whether the thanks of that House were ever awarded to a subject without being accompanied with more substantial marks of the approbation of the Crown? He had already alluded to the constitution of the Committee; nevertheless, if the House should desire its re-appointment, he would advise his hon. and gallant Friend to accept the proposal of the noble Lord. He hoped, however, that the noble Viscount would take care to have the proposed Committee framed upon a fairer basis than the Committee to which they had referred. The country could have no confidence in such a Committee. The preponderance of the official element in it was damaging to its utility. The whole of the first year was taken up in wading through official theories instead of coming to the practical evidence, which alone was of any value. It was the invariable practice of the Admiralty to allow those grievances to go on as long as they were quietly borne by the parties complaining. It was therefore absolutely necessary for the navy itself to take the initiative in the matter, in order to ensure a due consideration to their grievances. In 1816 the status of the officers of the navy was taken into consideration, and they were then placed upon a footing which he did not think did them justice. He would go back a little earlier, for the purpose of reading the copy of a letter, written in 1802, by Lord Nelson, with regard to the position of the navy at that time—

"Merton, Oct. 20, 1802.

"Sir,—Your idea is most just and proper, that a provision should be made for midshipmen who have served a certain time, with good characters, and certainly £20 is a very small allowance; but how will your surprise be increased when I tell you that their full pay, when watching, fighting, and bleeding for their country at sea is not equal to that sum? An admiral's half-pay is scarcely equal, including the run of a kitchen, to that of a French cook; a captain's but a little more than a valet's; and a lieutenant's not equal to a London footman's. But as I am a seaman, and faring with them, I can say nothing. I will only apply some very old lines, wrote at the end of some former war—

"Our God and sailor we alike adore
In time of danger, not before;
The danger past, both are alike required;
God is forgotten and the sailor slighted."

A word more to illustrate the feeling of the service in regard to the existing system. The noble Lord, from the tenor of his remarks, insinuated that his hon. and gallant Friend had referred to grievances which were not really in existence. A letter from an officer appeared in one of the morning papers of the previous day, which contained the following extract:—

"On Tuesday evening the subject will be brought before the House of Commons. Each word then uttered will be anxiously weighed and discussed in every ward-room and gun-room mess in the service. All other matters are dwarfed in interest when compared with this, for on its result depend the issues of renewed hope and the strength that springs of it, or a return to the sickening anxiety of hope deferred and straitened means. We do not ask, sir, for wealth, for such would be to us the incomes obtained by our brothers and schoolfellows who have pursued home-staying occupations. We only ask that our pay may be increased to the modest competence that will make us free from the necessity of incurring debts we have no power of repaying."

Now, one word as to the financial state of the question. They were told that this was a most serious matter to bring before the House, although it involved a demand for only a trifling sum in order to raise the rate of compensation to the most valuable officers in Her Majesty's service to a more equitable standard than existed at present. It should never be forgotten that those officers in time of war occupied the first line of defence, and to them the country looked chiefly for protection. But had there been any economy practised in the material of the navy? Had they not rushed into extravagance the most unprecedented? They had wasted millions by the grossest mismanagement. With what consistency, then, could the Government refuse this claim, involving but a small sum, with such facts before them?

Again, the parallel between officers in the army and navy had not been fairly stated, as officers in the engineers, the artillery and the line were all eligible to staff appointment. But taking the purchase portion of the service, he could testify that it would be cheaper to purchase a captain's commission in a marching regiment than to pay a young naval officer's expenses in bringing him up to a lieutenant's commission. In conclusion, he was convinced, if the question of naval economy were fairly examined, it would be found that naval officers might, with public advantage, be placed on the same footing in regard to remuneration as officers in other services, and at the same time an enormous saving might be effected in the expenditure of the navy.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, as he had two years before made a Motion for a Committee which was unanimously agreed to, he thought it only due to the House to give some explanations regarding it, and in connection with the Amendment moved by the noble Lord. The noble Lord had assumed rather too much in saying that the reason why the Committee made no Report was because the evidence given was so favourable to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty that they thought silence the best course to pursue. Now, the fact was, from the way in which the Committee had been nominated, it was predicted that it would necessarily be a complete failure. At the suggestion of the noble Lord the House consented to put on the Committee all the ex-First Lords in the House; two others were examined before it, and in addition the official element was largely represented. The person moving for a Committee was generally allowed to have a preponderance of persons on it who were supposed favourable to his views; but when the noble Lord added a new subject of investigation he also added to the Committee four new Members, three of whom were chosen from his side of the House, and thus he gave a preponderance to his own party. Now, he (Admiral Duncombe) said originally, and he was still of the same opinion, that the question ought to have no political complexion, but if there was a preponderance at all in Committee, it ought to be on that (the Opposition) side of the House. Nevertheless, they were all aware that there always was more or less of political bias. When the proceedings commenced, he felt himself placed in the position of public prosecutor of the Board of Admiralty. That was a position he did not desire to occupy. From the moment the Committee sat he did his best to furnish evidence from day to day, and to elicit from the various officers connected with the Admiralty and navy the best testimony on the subject; but not then having the weight of Chairman he felt that was a disagreeable duty to perform, and therefore he declined to undertake it in a second Session. They sat until the end of the Session, took a quantity of evidence, but had no time to make a Report. The evidence alone was reported to the House, in order that they might deal with it as they pleased. At the commencement of last Session a question was asked of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) whether he intended to move the re-appointment of the Committee. That right hon. Gentleman answered in the negative. He (Admiral Duncombe) was subsequently asked a similar question, when he gave a decided negative also. The noble Lord was not, therefore, justified in saying that the whole of the evidence given was in favour of the Admiralty.

SIR ROBERT CLIFTON said, the noble Lord seemed to think that a naval officer who had distinguished himself would be sufficiently rewarded by receiving the thanks of that House. That, no doubt, was a very great honour; but if a commander had distinguished himself abroad upon £346 15s. a year, the thanks of that House would not supply him with means of entertaining distinguished foreigners, or providing for his own outfit. He was sure the noble Lord would not wish to preclude any English officer from exercising hospitality on a foreign station. Many officers, however, were obliged to decline appointments owing to their inability to meet the expenses of the posts offered them. He considered that any question taken up by so experienced an Officer as the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay) was deserving of the greatest attention; and if that gallant Officer should resolve upon dividing the House upon this question, he (Sir Robert Clifton) would certainly go into the same lobby with him. He would vote for the Resolutions because he felt that they had expended extravagant sums on fortifications which were useless, and some of which, he believed, would never be completed. He thought that after such expenditure and such waste of money upon ships that were afterwards declared to be useless, it was high time to consider the personnel of the navy.

Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he did not think the navy would be more contented in consequence of the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The noble Lord spoke as if a statement of grievances in the navy were a new thing—as if the conduct of the officers had been prompted by something like a seditious feeling. But the noble Lord ought to be well aware how often the question had been brought before the House. He (Mr. B. Cochrane) did not understand the principle laid down by the noble Lord. Were they to understand that no questions whatever relating to the pay of naval officers, of officers in the Civil Service, or of the diplomatic body, were to be brought forward in that House; or that officers meeting together to discuss what they regarded as grievances were guilty of a dereliction of duty? He could not imagine this. Nor could he imagine that the noble Lord intended to convey that impression, although the words he had used would bear such an interpretation. But when the noble Lord talked of the high honour and distinction which attached to an officer in Her Majesty's service, surely he could not mean to contend that that distinction, whatever might be its value, would enable a lieutenant on half-pay to feed his family on £73 a year, or compensate him for the discomforts to which he was subjected. While concurring generally, he might add, in the views to which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield had given expression, there were some parts of his scheme from which he felt bound to differ. If, for instance, officers entered the service on certain conditions, with the belief that they could rise to a certain rank, and if they asked for an opportunity of serving afloat, which was denied, then it was a hard thing to say to them, "You have not served afloat so many years; you must, therefore, be put on the retired list." Again, he could not see why an officer simply because he happened to be over seventy, was to be shelved. There were men of great energy, and of grand intellects, who had passed that age. Marshal Radetsky, for example, had been in actual service at the age of eighty-six, while Lord Howe and Lord Duncan had, when above their seventieth year, shown, in the battle of the 1st of June and Camperdown, themselves capable of conferring great benefits upon the country. It would, then, he thought, be somewhat harsh to such officers to put them in a false and undignified position merely because they happened to have passed a certain time of life. He might also observe that there were, in his opinion, many officers who did not desire to be made Admirals of the Fleet, as his hon. and gallant Friend proposed, though they might in some respects be benefited by the step. His hon. and gallant Friend was, however, he thought, eminently entitled to the thanks of the service for his scheme, which was, on the whole, carried out most elaborately, and with a kindness of feeling which was deserving of all praise. A comparison, he might add, had been drawn between the rate of pay in the French, Austrian, and American services, and that in our own, and he could not help remarking that it appeared to him somewhat extraordinary that the discrepancy between the two rates should, in many instances, be so great as that a captain in the American service should receive £500 a year more than officers of the same rank in the English service, and that an assistant surgeon in the American service should receive a much higher sum than the highest full pay of an English lieutenant. Those were monstrous anomalies. But he did not need to go to foreign countries for examples of similar anomalies. A clerk at Somerset House began with a salary of £90 a year, and the salary was annually increased by £5 or £10. Another class began at £300, and had an increase of £20 per annum, until their salaries reached £500; while there was another class which entered the public service at £500, and whose salaries went on increasing until they reached £650—a favourable contrast to the state of things in the navy. To show how this state of things operated, he would appeal to his noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty, who he was sure had the interest of the service at heart, however much he might be trammelled by the system under which he had to work, to say whether it was not the fact that several officers had refused ships because they could not afford to take them, so great was the necessary expense of a command? Then was it not monstrous to shelve men who were paid in so miserable a manner that they could not accept a ship if offered to them.

Again, naval officers when on half-pay were not allowed to enter on other occupations, but must hold themselves in readiness to serve, or have their names erased from the Navy List—a statement the truth of which was illustrated by the case of a Lieutenant Engledue, who had accepted an appointment in the Peninsular and Oriental Company's service, and whose name was struck out of the Navy List, because when offered a commission he could not afford to give up his situation. He might further observe, with respect to the question of prize money, that we had the opinion of Lord Dundonald, to the effect that it was impossible to say how much we were indebted to the stimulus which it afforded the navy. That most unfortunate of all declarations, however, the Declaration of Paris, had done away almost entirely with that stimulus; and to show of how much value it was at the present day, he might mention that in a notice issued a short time ago at Somerset House for the distribution of prize money in the case of the capture of a Chinese junk, he found that while the occurrence had taken place in 1857, the distribution of prize money was not to be made until the present month, and that then the share of the commanding officer was only £4 7s.; that of the second in command only £3 4s.; the share of some of the men being as low as 2s. 3d. per head. Now, while he took the view which he was advocating of the way in which the naval service was treated, he was by no means disposed to find fault with the advantages which the army received. He might, however, observe that colonial governorships were given rather to members of the latter service than to naval men, and that the pension of £3,000 a year given to the family of our greatest Admiral—Lord Nelson—died with the present Lord. Comparing also the list of promotions on the occasion of the majority of the Prince of Wales, he found, that while twenty-eight of these promotions took place in the army, there had been only four or five in the navy. It might be said, that notwithstanding these drawbacks, there was no lack of men possessing the energy and spirit requisite for the naval service. No doubt, and if the miserable pittance given to officers were reduced by one-half, the spirit and rising energy of the country was so great that people would always be found ready to come forward in defence of the country. That, however, was, in his opinion, no good reason why the smallest sum possible should be paid for their services; nor did he think such a principle was one on which any Government ought to proceed. Again, it was urged they knew what the rule was before they entered the service. True; but had not everything been doubled in price? Whilst the customs duties were relaxed, was there not income tax, and was it not the fact that the expenses of living were double or treble what they were several years ago? He must venture to express his dissent from the noble Lord's views, and he considered that the hon. and gallant Officer deserved well of that House and the country for having brought forward this question so ably, and he trusted that the noble Lord, who had given way to a certain extent, would give way still further, and in time adopt the views of his hon. and gallant Friend.

Mr. FERRAND said, that as he had the honour of representing one of the largest of our naval boroughs, he hoped that he might be permitted to make a few remarks on the subject before the House. A large number of his constituents took a deep interest in the question, and he was anxious to address the House on several points which it embraced; but the subject had been so nearly exhausted that it would be necessary for him to offer only a very few observations. He had listened to the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government with great pleasure, and also, he must add, with some astonishment. As had been well remarked by the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House, what course were the officers of the navy to take when they wanted redress for a refusal of justice if they were not, either by petition or by their friends, to come before the House? He had spent about a fortnight in the borough of Devonport, and never was more astonished than to see the cowed spirit of the navy, the cowed spirit of the dockyard men, under a dread of the tyranny of the Admiralty. He had also received several letters from naval officers there, urging him to take part in the debate, but at the same time entreating and imploring him not to mention the names, for fear of the certain ruin which they stated would await them at the hands of the Admiralty. Was this a fit state of things to find in the borough of Devonport? The noble Lord had said that the officers ought to conduct themselves with discretion and forbearance. They had done so. They had applied to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty for redress; but they had applied in vain. He held in his hand a letter addressed by one of the Secretaries to the Admiralty to a large body of officers after they had fully, distinctly, and explicitly laid their claims before the Board. They had previously received a reply to a former application, that their claims could not be admitted. They had applied again to the Admiralty, entering, as he had said, fully, distinctly, and explicitly into their claims; and what was the course taken by the Lords of the Admiralty? Did they attempt to show those officers that their claims were unjust, and that they had no right to prefer them? No. A letter came from the Admiralty, signed W. G. Romaine—

"I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acknowledge the receipt of a memorial signed by you on behalf of the captains on the reserved half-pay list containing a request for increased half-pay; and I have to inform you in reply that their Lordships can only refer you to their former letter on the subject."

It was not till the officers received that curt and offensive reply from the Board that they ventured to come before that House; and he would ask the noble Lord to whom they were to appeal after that answer if not to the House of Commons. There was a sympathy within the walls of that House towards the naval service which had compelled the noble Lord at the head of the Government to come down and consent to the appointment of a Committee. The noble Lord would not have done that had he not feared that he would be in a minority if he had not conceded so much. But was it assented to for the purpose of burking the question? Or did the noble Lord intend, when the Committee was appointed, that there should be a just, and fair, and impartial inquiry? If such were his intention, he believed that the Committee—he believed that no Committee honestly appointed could do otherwise—would support the views of his hon. and gallant Friend who had introduced the Motion. But if the noble Lord pursued the same course towards the proposed Committee with that he pursued towards a Committee previously appointed on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for the East Riding (Admiral Duncombe), he might depend upon this that he would be trifling with the spirit of the naval officers of the country and he would bitterly repent the day when he refused, by a side wind, to grant them that to which they believed they had a just claim. He could view the naval service in no other light than a lottery, in which there were many blanks and only a few prizes; and he was not surprised to hear the naval officers at Devonport protest against the manner in which a few high influential Whig families contrived to monopolize the great prizes in the navy. The noble Lord had alluded to the high honour which a naval officer obtained in receiving a vote of thanks from that House. But why were the principal prizes of the navy monopolized by men who had no right to them compared to many of the naval officers whose services had never been properly required? If a Conservative Government had jobbed the high places in the naval service, either at the Admiralty or in the Dockyards, in the manner the present Government had done, they would have had a loud outburst of indignation from hon. Gentlemen on the other side, if then in opposition. He had said, he believed, quite sufficient on this question to show to the noble Lord that the officers had not received fair play when they made their appeal to the Board of Admiralty. He had been told by even dockyard men, that if they made a complaint to the Board of Admiralty, so sure as they made it so sure were they made to rue the day by being deprived of their employment. If that state of things was to continue, either in or out of the dockyards, in the naval service, the Government would repent it, for the dockyard men themselves, who were a highly independent body of workmen, had their spirit roused to such an extent by intimidation, by oppression—not by the Conservative party, but by the Whig party—that if ever a day should come when it was highly necessary that those men should be true and loyal to their country, they might remind the Government how they had been treated previously to the time of peril; and the Government might then find the dockyard men actuated by the same spirit as the men in private yards were a few years ago, and that they would show their spirit of independence in a manner most injurious to the country.

Mr. R. W. DUFF (Banff) said, he thought that while the Admiralty were profuse in their expenditure on vessels constructed on obsolete models, &c., they were most illiberal in their dealings with the officers of the navy. When the Lords of the Admiralty refused to receive salaries for their services, and said they were quite content with the honour, he should be able to understand the objection to pay the officers in the navy proper remuneration. The present scheme of promotion and retirement was admitted to be so unsatisfactory that the late First Lord of the Admiralty declared, before the Royal Commission, he would rather overrule the opinions of the whole Board than continue to administer under the existing system. He felt so strongly that, although a general supporter of the Government, if the hon. and gallant Officer divided the House, he should vote with him.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, it was well known that the great majority of the Committee to which allusion had been made consisted of First Lords of the Admiralty, and most of the witnesses examined before it were of the same description. Several of the Members who were appointed to serve upon the Committee were so disgusted with the course of its proceedings that they retired from it; and when the noble Lord proposed the appointment of another Committee upon the subject, those who were deeply interested in the question could not help suspecting that the Government, unable to refute the arguments so ably brought forward by the hon. and gallant Officer, were about to repeat the same farce. The arguments of the noble Lord against the Motion had been based in a great measure upon the assumption that the conduct of Her Majesty's navy was mutinous and unpatriotic; but as a naval officer himself, he could assure the House that his fellow officers were sincerely desirous to promote the efficiency of the service, and had in many instances assented to suggestions and advocated measures which were antagonistic to their own interests. The junior officers, for instance, gave it as their opinion that they ought to serve longer than they had hitherto done in the lower position which they occupied, and that was one of the proposals on which the projected alteration in the system was founded. On the part of the naval officers, therefore, he must repudiate the accusation that they were actuated by any other than patriotic motives in the course they had taken. Then it was said by the noble Lord, that if they acceded to the demands of the officers of the navy on the present occasion, they would have the officers of the army coming forward with similar applications. But though it was proposed by the Order in Council of 1816 to equalize as far as possible the pay of the two branches of the service, the pay of the navy was at the present moment very much inferior to that of the army. It should be remembered, too, that at the present day naval officers became entitled to little or no prize money, and that when by some rare accident they obtained such a right, many years usually elapsed before it was practically recognised. The officers of the navy merely wished for a proper system of promotion and retirement, and the object of the present proposition was to carry out what had already been partially carried out by the Admiralty—that was to say, compulsory retirement at a certain age, when officers were no longer fit for active service. But if this principle were good at all, it should surely be carried through all branches of the service. It was proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend that there should be a smaller number of officers, and in that way the service would be much more efficient, for it was well known that in the present state of affairs the list was overcrowded with officers who were useless because they could not get employment. There were something like five hundred commanders on the list, and out of that number only about half were employed. He had risen, however, principally for the purpose of protesting against that accusation of selfish and unpatriotic motives which the noble Lord had brought against the service to which he had the honour to belong; and, in conclusion, he had only, as a member of the profession, to express his gratitude to the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield for the able manner in which he had introduced the subject, while he was sure the House would be grateful to him for having placed so clearly and concisely before them a matter upon which they were proverbially ignorant.

MR. BENTINCK said, he should not have troubled the House upon that occasion had it not been for what had fallen from the noble Lord at the head of the Government with respect to the former Committee on the Admiralty, whose labours had created so much discussion. He was sure that the noble Lord, in submitting any statement to the House, meant that it should be strictly correct; and he therefore felt much surprised at the declaration made by the noble Lord upon that subject, which was completely at variance with the facts of the case. The noble Lord had told them that the Committee had been fairly constituted, and that the weight of evidence was of such a nature, that if the Committee had made a Report, that Report must have been favourable to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) had been a Member of the Committee, and he could state how the facts really stood. When the Motion for the Committee was first made in the House, he had ventured to take exception to its composition. He had pointed out to the House that it was impossible a Committee so constituted should ever arrive at any practical conclusion, or that they should ever produce a Report which would have the slightest weight with the House or the country. The ground on which he had objected to the Motion was, that the greater number of the members on the Committee either were at that time serving or had previously served the Admiralty in an official capacity. He had, therefore, moved the rejection of all those members on the list who were liable to that objection, but he had been overruled by the House upon that point. He had then expressed his opinion that the labours of the Committee must end in a mere waste of time, and must, in fact, become nothing better than a farce. He believed that that prediction had been literally fulfilled. He had attended the Committee for about four months, and he had found that the whole of its business had been to listen day after day and week after week to the self-laudatory speeches of distinguished members and ex-members of the Board of Admiralty, who, when called upon to give evidence, had taken the opportunity of explaining how admirably they had managed the business of the Department. What was the consequence? The consequence was, that the Committee had done so little to investigate the subject that had been referred to their consideration, that at the close of the Session they found they were not in a condition to make a Report to the House, and at the commencement of the next Session his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), when asked whether, as Chairman of the Committee, he would move its re-appointment, declined to undertake that duty, while his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Riding (Admiral Duncombe), on whose Motion the Committee had originally been constituted, also stated that he was not prepared to take such a step. He believed, that if a Committee was ever to be of any use, it should consist of men who were not judges in their own case, and that a Committee appointed to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty ought not, therefore, to be composed of Admiralty officials. One word in reference to the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield, who, in his able speech, had completely exhausted the arguments on his side of the question. He agreed with a great portion of that speech, and he believed that as an abstract proposition there was great hardship in the way in which naval officers were paid; but he was at the same time bound to admit that there was considerable force in the statement of the noble Lord at the head of the Government with respect to the inconvenience of dealing with subjects of that description in the manner proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend. There was another point to which they should direct their attention. They should not forget that there were other interests represented in that House besides the navy. If the House were at once to pledge itself to give effect to the views of his hon. and gallant Friend, that would imply that it should either impose new taxes or to retain taxes from which the country was in hopes of being relieved. As the representative of a numerous constituency, who had many claims to obtain remission of taxation, he should not feel himself justified in being instrumental in raising a barrier which would prevent the accomplishment of that object by voting at once for the abstract proposition of his hon. and gallant Friend. He would therefore suggest to his hon. and gallant Friend, that as the noble Lord had admitted by his Amendment that a grievance did exist, his hon. and gallant Friend should accept the proposal of the noble Lord, and allow the matter to be referred to a Committee. But he hoped, that if his hon. and gallant Friend were prepared to pursue that course, he would insist that the Committee to be appointed should be differently composed from the Committee to which he (Mr. Bentinck) had alluded, and that it should consist of men who were not from their position under the influence of a strong bias, but of men in whom the House and the country could place perfect confidence.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, the question before the House is one of the most difficult with which we can possibly have to deal. There have been from time

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, the question before the House is one of the most difficult with which we can possibly have to deal. There have been from time to time points in the administration of the Admiralty which have required rectification, and I am not prepared to say that now, or at any future period, there may not be some class of officers who have a fair right to claim more advantages than they now possess. I have listened very carefully to this debate, and although I have not heard many proposals that could be carried out, I have been gratified, as a naval man, to perceive the intense interest which is taken in this noble service. The Resolutions of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield are mild enough in themselves, but they are backed by a scheme which is about the most impracticable and injurious for the navy that ever was propounded. Bear in mind that there are two things which are essentially necessary to maintain the navy in efficiency. First of all, you must have a sufficient number of officers of all ranks to enable you, in the event of war, suddenly to expand your force. Secondly, as the service is one which requires men of pre-eminent activity of mind and body, it is necessary to have a constant flow of promotion. If the House will keep these two points in view, they will soon see what an impracticable scheme has been put before them by my hon. and gallant Friend. The object of my hon. and gallant Friend's scheme is to reduce the active list. For instance, it is proposed to curtail the number of lieutenants. Now, the fact is, that although we are in a time of profound peace, and although fewer officers in proportion to the ships are now required than formerly, we have not at this moment sufficient lieutenants. If we were called on to man a squadron of ten line-of-battle ships, I do not know where we should find the requisite number of lieutenants, although we have 800. How could our navy maintain its position if this reduction to 700 were to be enforced? The proportions of all ranks are mainly governed by the lieutenants; they are, as it were, the pivot of the system, and, in my opinion, we should have a thousand of them. It is quite possible, I own, as far as the wants of the service are concerned, to reduce the upper ranks. No one can say that it is probable we shall at any time require ninety-nine admirals. But, if you cut down the admirals to sixty, the captains to 250, and the commanders to 300, keeping the lieutenants, as I have shown you must, at 800 to 1,000, you are stopping the flow of promotion and ruining the navy. At the end of the war of 1816 we had 242 admirals, and in 1863 we had 325 admirals. Of course, that large number is not necessary for actual service, but without it we should not have that flow of promotion which is absolutely needed in the navy. The gallant Officer opposite proposes that there should be a retired list on which officers should be placed at the age of forty; but that would be most unjust, and it would be so costly—for a retired list is necessarily unlimited—as to be altogether unbearable. Both the active and the retired lists proposed by the gallant Officer, therefore, are utterly impracticable. I do not deny that the navy has certain disadvantages to complain of, but I cannot agree that it is getting worse and worse every year, or that there is any discontent among the officers, beyond that which may be engendered by sending circulars about and inviting them to imagine grievances which they never knew of before. Let us just compare the flow of promotion now and at the end of the French war. In order to a proper flow of promotion you must have a fair proportion in the upper as compared with the lower lists. In 1816 there were on the various lists 4,000 lieutenants—who are the key of the whole system—or 67 per cent of the whole lists of naval officers, leaving 33 per cent of the classes to which they could hope to rise. In 1832 there were 3,000 lieutenants on the list, or 59 per cent, leaving forty-one chances in a hundred of promotion. In 1848 there were 53 per cent of lieutenants leaving 47 per cent of higher rank; and in the present year there are 1,177 lieutenants, or 35 per cent of the whole list, leaving sixty-five chances of promotion to the hundred. That is a great improvement, though I should be glad to see the improvement greater. What I wish to show is that the various schemes which have been introduced from time to time have undoubtedly done good. We are obliged in the navy—in peace or war equally—to promote officers because we want young men. In the Civil Service, or in the seniority services, officers can be kept in time of peace on full pay; but that, of course, leads to a stagnation of promotion, which would be fatal to the efficiency of the navy. The great misfortune is, that in time of peace you have not fleets and squadrons in commission sufficient to give employment to your commanders and captains; and when a man is made commander or captain, it may be long before he obtains employment. As regards the age at which officers get promoted, the navy, I think, is better off than the other services. In the matter of pay I warn my gallant Friend that his case is not so good as he thinks. I wish to see the navy as well paid as any service. I had almost said better paid; but if my gallant Friend is going to hold out to officers that they are to have largely increased pay, he will turn out to be the worst friend the navy has ever had. I admit that in the French service the pay of some officers is higher than in the English navy, but a most important thing in the comparison is the age at which officers are promoted and begin to receive good pay, and here you will find we have the advantage of the French. Comparisons may fairly be drawn between the navy and the artillery. Let us take the case of two brothers, one of whom enters the artillery, the other the navy. The naval officer, it must be remembered, is educated at the public expense, while the artillery officer has to pay for a very expensive education at a military academy. In the navy a man is made, on an average, a lieutenant at twenty-two, and receives £182 a year, and the artillery officer becomes a first lieutenant at twenty-three, and gets only £125, including all allowances, and has quite as expensive a mess to pay for as the other. This disadvantage in pay follows through all the ranks up to general officer. I have here some figures regarding the pay of the different ranks in the French navy, which the naval attaché to the French embassy has been kind enough to go over very carefully with me. I find that the pay of a French lieutenant is £144 while he is abroad, £128 when in France, and only £110 when he is in arsenal. Put that against £182, the pay of the English lieutenant. I should be sorry to reduce the pay of the latter officer; but I say, with facts such as these, you have no right to come down here and say that our officers are worse paid than any others. [Sir JOHN HAY: What about lieutenants in command?] The French officers, I admit, are better paid when in command. That applies until you come to the flag officers, but there it ceases. Their admirals are not better paid. Again, it is to be remembered that the French officer is generally much older than the English when he comes to command. When a French lieutenant is in command, he gets £408. My hon. Friend said that he receives £530, but that is a mistake. Our lieutenant gets £234, so that the French officer is better paid; but then he is thirty-six or thirty-seven years of age, when our lieutenant in command may only be about twenty-five. I admit, therefore, that French captains, commanders, and lieutenants in command are better paid than officers of similar rank in the English navy; but then the former are older than the latter. When you come to the flag officers you find that the French Contre-Amiral has £2,160, including every allowance, while a Rear Admiral in the British navy has £2,190. [Sir JOHN HAY: All public entertainments are paid for in the French navy.] I do not know how that is, but the French officers are obliged to provide themselves with furniture, plate, and linen—he must do the whole thing on his own account—while for the British officer all these things are found, on a payment of 5 per cent. An officer in our service need only take his portmanteau on board with him. [Sir JOHN HAY: He must now take his own provisions.] No such thing. My hon. and gallant Friend made a very temperate statement this evening; but do not let him attempt to prove too much. In referring to the points on which I have touched, I do not mean to imply that I should not wish to see the pay of our officers improved. I do not say that I shall not be a party to procuring better pay for them if I can get the chance; but I shall not be a party to raising a cry that they are miserably paid. What has the present Government done for the officers of the navy since they came into office? I do not think the House has any idea of what I have come down and asked for since I took my seat on these benches. The aggregate sum which I have asked the House to vote is a very large one. For the improvement of the pay and pensions of all classes of the navy I have asked for £120,000 a year. That is one sum. My hon. and gallant Friend can move for a Return of the various items of which that amount is made up, if he thinks fit to do so. In addition to that comes the retirement of 1860. If hon. Members will turn to page 23 of the Duke of Somerset's memorandum, they will find that in 1860, before the retirement scheme took effect, the reserved list amounted to £386,000; but in the year 1861 it had increased to £420,000. That was due to an Order in Council. This House has, consequently, granted within the last three years and a half, at the instance of the Admiralty, upwards of £150,000, which has been added as a dead-weight to the expenditure of the country. Is it fair, then, of my hon. and gallant Friend to charge me or charge the Admiralty with neglecting the interests of the service? Is it fair of him to make such a representation to the public? Is it fair to excite discontent in the service by issuing paper shells—elongated shells, which have pierced the sides of even the Warrior and the other iron-plated ships, and have done more damage than iron shells could do? If my hon. and gallant Friend or any other officer had come to the Admiralty and represented the wrongs which he thinks the navy labours under, his statements would have been listened to with attention. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Ferrand) says that officers dare not come to the Admiralty. I do not know why the hon. Member should make that statement, which, if correct, would apply to former Boards as well as to the present. I presume he alludes to the case of the retired officers. Well, we know they laboured under the impression, that when the Admiralty accepted their retirement, they were entitled to rise in rank and pay. The right hon. baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) was First Lord when that arrangement was made. The House knows he is not a man who would really intend to do one thing and tell any one that he intended to do another. He said the intention was that those officers were not to rise pari passu with the other officers. The gallant officers concerned thought otherwise. They brought their case before the House, and I was glad when their pay was improved. I shall also be glad if it be shown to the Committee which it is proposed to appoint that there is a case for increasing the pay of the officers to whom my hon. and gallant Friend has referred. My hon. and gallant Friend spoke of the pay of the captains having been reduced. That is really misleading the House. Up to a particular period there were various perquisites. At the time those perquisites were taken away, a proper fixed remuneration was decided on. Since then I am not aware there has been a reduction of pay. When the circular, giving command money and adjusting pay, came out a year or two ago, some officers lost by it; but those were exceptional cases, and did not affect those already employed. The great majority were gainers. As for the insinuation, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government is attempting to get rid of the question by a side wind, it is not worth replying to. The profession will not believe it. The noble Lord has given too many proofs of his love for the service. The officers of the navy will feel certain that what he says he will do, and that when he proposes an inquiry he intends that it shall be conducted with the utmost justice and fairness.

Lord Clarence Paget

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the speech of my noble Friend has been directed rather to those details upon which the House has not been asked to pronounce an opinion than to the broad principles which are laid down in the Motion submitted to us by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield, and upon which he has asked us to come to a decision. I cannot allow this debate to close without offering to my hon. and gallant Friend my congratulations upon having at last elicited from a reluctant Admiralty and a reluctant Government a distinct admission, in more shapes than one, that he is practically justified in the course he has taken on the present occasion. At the same time, I must express my strong opinion that my hon. and gallant Friend was not in any way open to the somewhat harsh censure which the noble Viscount at the head of the Government passed upon him as an officer of the Royal Navy for having brought his Motion before the House. In my opinion, my hon. and gallant Friend has taken a course upon this subject which does him the greatest credit and honour. This is no new subject; it is one of great importance; and looking to the position of my hon. and gallant Friend as an able and distinguished officer of the Royal Navy, I think he could have taken no course more natural, more honourable, or more becoming in him than to come forward on behalf of his profession and brother officers, and to ask the Government to redress the grievances of which they have long complained. Nor was my hon. and gallant Friend open to the objection which the noble Viscount expressed as to the shape of his Motion. The noble Viscount asked how the House was to pronounce an opinion upon anything so vague as this Resolution. Why, Sir, nobody knows better than the noble Viscount himself, that if my hon. and gallant Friend had taken an opposite course—if he had encumbered his Motion with those details to which my noble Friend the Secretary to the Navy has just adverted—he would have exposed himself to the taunt, which no one would have been more ready to make than the noble Viscount, that the House of Commons could not pronounce an opinion upon matters which were only fit to be dealt with by the executive Government. I need not say that this is a subject in which I have always taken a great interest, and I am desirous, if the House will allow me, to call its attention for a few moments to the past history of the question. When I was called upon to administer the affairs of the Admiralty, I found the naval service in a most unsatisfactory condition. During the short period I held office I was obliged to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider how we might improve the manning of the navy. I think it will be admitted on all hands that the result of that inquiry has been most satisfactory. I also found the navy, with regard to this question of promotion and retirement, in so unsatisfactory a state, that I was compelled by a sense of duty to address myself to the question, and to prepare a plan for the improvement of the system of promotion and retirement, which plan was adopted by the Cabinet of the Earl of Derby, and, if I had held office for a month longer, would have been carried into effect. That plan was founded upon the broad principle which I have advocated before, which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield has urged to-night, and which I am prepared to advocate again—namely, that you will not have the naval service of England in a satisfactory condition until you adopt the system of retirement by age, and apply it to all ranks of the service. I left the plan in the hands of the noble Duke who now fills the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, imploring him not to regard it in a party light, but to look upon it as an endeavour to improve the naval service, and to carry it out if he approved the principles upon which it was founded. The Duke of Somerset did not see fit to carry out the plan, or any other founded upon that principle. The course I then took was, in 1860, to make a Motion which was strictly constitutional in its character, and which, as the Government were unwilling to act as an Executive, was the next best course that could be taken. I moved in this House for the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the question of promotions and retirements in the navy. After a debate and a division, the Motion was rejected. It was under these circumstances that, in 1861, my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) moved for the appointment of a Committee of this House for the same purpose. And here I must take exception to the statement of the Prime Minister respecting the course which he is now adopting. The noble Lord told us that he is now adopting the same course as was taken by him in 1861. Not at all. In 1861 he resisted the Motion for a Committee. The Admiralty, represented by the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget), also resisted it. They said it was an improper mode of proceeding. The noble Lord then disapproved the Committee, voted against the Committee, and was beaten. This happened in 1861, and now, two years afterwards, the noble Lord, from what motives it is not for me to say—circumstances must have changed, for his conduct has entirely changed—although in 1861 he disapproved a Committee and divided against it, now says the appointment of a Committee is the proper course. Now, I venture to think that such conduct is both inconsistent and injudicious; and, Sir, the whole position of the Government is the most extraordinary that I have ever heard since I have been a Member of this House. They seem to be afraid to bring forward any important measure and to grapple with any difficult subject. The administration of the Criminal Law falls into a state so feeble and so unsatisfactory that the whole country cries out against it. Do the Government, as an Executive, improve that administration? No; they say, "Let us have a Commission." Now they find that the naval service is not disposed to be trifled with any longer; they find grave complaints made on its part, and a strong feeling in this House in its favour. So they change their tactics and say, "We, the Executive, won't redress these grievances; let us have a Committee." In my opinion, the worst mode in which this subject of naval promotions and retirements can be dealt with is by a Select Committee of the House of Commons. In my opinion, it ought to be dealt with by the Executive. If the matter is too complicated to be dealt with directly by the Executive, then a Royal Commission is the violence, and works of art from malicious injury, would they be acting like sensible men if, from any feeling of scrupulousness, based, he believed, on a perfectly false philosophy, they allowed themselves to be exposed to the most rampant violence when such an effectual remedy lay idle in their hands? He begged to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that on the part of Her Majesty's Government he would not offer any objection to the bringing in of the Bill, but he wished, however, to guard himself against being supposed to assent to its principle. The right hon. Gentleman had not explained the manner in which he proposed to effect his suggested alteration of the law. The House should bear in mind that only two years ago the Criminal Law was revised and consolidated, and that, upon the recommendation of the Select Committee to whom the revision was intrusted, the House decided that the punishment of flogging should be abolished in respect to offences to which it formerly attached by law, with the exception of the two or three cases to which the right hon. Gentleman had adverted. The House would, therefore, have to carefully consider, when the Bill came before them at a future stage, the grounds on which it was asked to retrace its steps. He did not collect from the right hon. Gentleman's speech whether he intended to make the infliction of corporal punishment imperative, or to leave it to the discretion of the Judge. In the latter case he would do well to remember, that when that punishment was attached to certain offences, it was very rarely inflicted. When a particular judge, in the exercise of his discretionary power, sentenced a prisoner to be whipped, juries were found reluctant to convict, and prisoners often escaped. The Judges very rarely sentenced prisoners to corporal punishment, and past experience led to the belief that if they were again to be intrusted with the power of doing so, they would rarely exercise it. The Bill might thus alter the theory of the law without producing much effect on its practice. On the other hand, if the infliction of flogging was to be imperative, the right hon. Gentleman had not stated whether he meant it to be a cumulative punishment, in addition to imprisonment and penal servitude, or in substitution for them. Again, a prisoner's health, age, or other circumstances might make it impossible to inflict the punishment, though he had committed an offence to which it might attach. Nor had the right hon. Gentleman very accurately defined the crimes to which he desired to affix that punishment. He had spoken of offences attended with violence, but it was not very clear whether he meant to include burglaries with violence. Moreover, if flogging was so effectual, where was the line to be drawn? Was one man, who knocked down another to rob him of his watch, to be subject to this punishment; while another, who knocked down a woman to violate her, was to be exempt from it? In the army and navy flogging might be necessary in certain cases; and in gaols, when violent outbreaks suddenly occurred, he believed it was the only effectual mode of suppressing insubordination; but it was a different thing when inflicted on men who were to be tried for a crime weeks, or perhaps months, after its commission. He would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, and he should be glad to hear fuller explanations from the hon. Gentleman at a subsequent stage.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the further security of the persons of Her Majesty's Subjects from personal violence, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ADDERLEY, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, and Mr. GARNETT.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 35.]

JURORS' REMUNERATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill under which jurors would be entitled to remuneration in certain cases. The claims upon the time of jurors had of late greatly increased, and he proposed that when they were called on as a matter of convenience to suitors to perform a duty not cast upon them in former times, namely, to act in cases not originating in the county in which they resided, they should be entitled to receive a fee of 7s. each, or one third of the fee paid to special jurymen.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill; but at the same time he wished to be understood as not committing himself to its principle.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the remuneration of Jurors in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Sir FREDERICK KELLER.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 36.]

WRITS PROHIBITION.—LEAVE.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to ask for leave to introduce a Bill to prohibit the issue of writs for actions of debt in the superior courts for sums of less than £20. Practically, a large majority of the cases in which writs were issued did not come to trial, and an enormous number were for very small sums, of £2, £3, and £4, where the costs were at least equal the sum sought to be recovered. He proposed by this Bill to meet that great grievance, leaving the law as it stood at present in regard to actions for damages and other matters. He proposed to fix the second reading for a not very early day, and would undertake to shape the Bill according to any suggestions of the legal authorities of the Government, if they accepted the principle.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was willing to assent to the introduction of the Bill, which was undoubtedly one of great importance. The hon. Gentleman had stated that he would accede to any suggestion that might be made, in case it should appear to them that there was no objection to the principle of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to prohibit the issue of Writs for Actions of Debt in the Superior Courts for sums of less than Twenty Pounds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE and Mr. HARDCASTLE.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES' ANNUITIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was anxious, on the part of several most intelligent persons who had communicated with him, to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, which he was personally convinced would receive a satisfactory answer. On the occasion of the marriage of Her Most Gracious Majesty, the Duke of Wellington insisted on having a public declaration that the Prince Consort was of the Protestant faith. He had been requested to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government to announce distinctly whether Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra was a Protestant.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am very glad to be able to answer the question of the hon. Gentleman in a manner that will, I am sure, be satisfactory to him and to the House. When the question arose of selecting a Princess who might be the wife of the Prince of Wales, the following conditions were thought to be requisite: First of all, that she should be young; next, that she should be handsome; further, that she should be agreeable, that she should be amiable in her disposition, that she should be well brought up; and, lastly, that she should be a Protestant. All these conditions, I am happy to say, are united in the Princess Alexandra. I trust, therefore, that the choice will be as satisfactory to the nation as I am sure it will be conducive to the happiness of the Prince of Wales.

House in Committee.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^d on Thursday.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

Bill to make provision concerning Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes payable in the Metropolis on the day appointed for the passage through the Metropolis of Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE GASE and Mr. BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 33.]

House adjourned at half after Ten o'clock, till Thursday.

ITALY—AFFAIRS OF ROME.

QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had given notice to his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of his intention to put two Questions to him that evening. The first of these had reference to the delay in the production of certain Despatches which his noble Friend quoted in his speech on this subject a few evenings since. Although his noble Friend had read extracts from these Despatches, they had never been printed; and his noble Friend had failed to lay them on the table immediately afterwards, as was the invariable practice to do in the case of documents from which extracts had been read in the course of debate. His noble Friend near him (the Earl of Ellenborough) stated most truly the other night, that no Minister of the Crown ought to read extracts from any public document, unless he were prepared at once—he emphatically stated at once—to lay the document upon the table, because, if delay were to take place, incorrect impressions might be produced. Inasmuch as the whole question turned upon the balance of recollection, he hoped the noble Earl would not permit any further delay in the presentation of these documents. These despatches ought to be produced at once; and he believed that when the noble Earl's attention was called to them again, he would readily admit that they would not bear the interpretation which the noble Earl had sought to place upon them. There was another Question which he would put to the noble Earl, of a more serious nature. Within the last few weeks a statement had been printed in some of the German papers, and had been copied into other journals without contradiction, to the effect that Cardinal Antonelli in a Despatch to M. Chigi, the Papal Nuncio at Paris, informed the latter that Mr. Odo Russell had made a further attempt to induce the Pope to quit Rome, and had quoted a letter from the noble Earl expressing some disappointment that the Pope had not followed this advice, and had even gone so far as to intimate, that if he did not speedily avail himself of the offer, he might be compelled to do so. It was also stated that Cardinal Antonelli had demanded what right Mr. Odo Russell, being only an attaché, had to address the Pope in these terms, and had declared that he would in future only hold communication with Mr. Russell in his private capacity. He wished to know whether the noble Earl knew of any such Despatch.

EARL RUSSELL said, that with regard to the despatches of the noble Marquess from which he had quoted in a former debate, he had more than once stated that he had no objection to produce them, or extracts from them. He had not understood that the noble Marquess had formally asked for them—but they would be laid upon the table to-morrow. There was no doubt that it was conformable to the general rule that all despatches quoted by a Minister should be laid upon the table; but he also knew that that rule had not been observed on more than one occasion, and particularly he remembered in the other House of Parliament a Chancellor of the Exchequer quoting extracts from despatches of his and not only not producing them till a late day, but not producing them at all. In this case he would give the extracts to-morrow. He was rather surprised that the noble Marquess should so constantly harp on this theme. He considered that the despatch from which he had quoted the dictum, that if England's advice in the cause of national liberty was neglected, it would reflect no discredit upon her, was to his noble Friend's honour. He knew nothing in his noble Friend's diplomatic career which reflected on him more credit; and if his noble Friend succeeded in effacing it, he knew of nothing in it which would remain to do him equal honour. It was quite natural that in reference to the French occupation of Rome the English Government should make representations in favour of national liberty. If these representations were well taken, they produced good; if not, they could reflect no discredit on the English Government. No doubt, there was a great difference between the position of the French and English Governments in reference to this question. With respect to the other Question, as to some supposed despatch from Cardinal Antonelli to M. Chigi, he was certainly not at all responsible for what Cardinal Antonelli might have written to the Papal Nuncio at Paris. It was a very odd story altogether. As to his having written a letter to Mr. Odo Russell to the effect that the Pope ought to leave Rome, and that if he did not, he might be obliged, and which Mr. Russell read to Cardinal Antonelli, he (Earl Russell) had certainly never written any such letter. As he certainly did not expect that the Pope would leave Rome, knowing well that the Emperor of the French by a change of Ministers for Foreign Affairs had indicated his intention to maintain the French troops at Rome, he would never have thought of writing such a letter as had been represented; and, consequently, he had never felt disappointed that the Pope would not follow his advice. Mr. Odo Russell, who was the other person immediately concerned, said he went to pay a visit of courtesy about the time mentioned; but he never mentioned any letter of his, he never had such a letter, and he never read such a letter to Cardinal Antonelli. Whether Cardinal Antonelli was under that impression or not he could not tell. Nor could he say whether there was such a despatch or not, but as far as it related to a letter of his the statement was without foundation. The noble Marquess asked what business had an attaché of the embassy at Turin to go to Rome? Mr. Russell was not an attaché of the Embassy at Turin. At one time he was an attaché at Florence and Naples; but the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the King of Naples having quitted their respective dominions, of course he could no longer be an attaché at their courts. Cardinal Antonelli inquired of Mr. Russell in what character he was at Rome; and, after some observation, he went on to say, that as the King of Sardinia was an excommunicated Sovereign, it would not be agreeable to the Roman Government to receive an attaché from an Embassy to an excommunicated Court. The Foreign Office could have no objection to meeting the views of the Roman Government in this respect, and Mr. Russell was made an attaché directly from the Foreign Office. If Mr. Russell had ever spoken to Cardinal Antonelli on State affairs, it was entirely owing to Cardinal Antonelli, who had taken the initiative. The Cardinal had often conversed with Mr. Russell on State matters in the most confidential manner, stating, at the same time, that there was nothing official in the communications. There could be no possible harm in Mr. Russell listening to what Cardinal Antonelli had to say.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the noble Earl had not answered the really important portion of the Question which had been put to him. His noble Friend had not asked him to produce a despatch from Cardinal Antonelli—which of course he could not do—but whether he had any reason to know that Cardinal Antonelli, in a despatch to Monsignor Chigi, had declared that the representation made by Mr. Odo Russell was incorrect with respect to what had taken place; and that so much inconvenience had in consequence arisen that Mr. Russell was not to be recognised in any official capacity, and was merely to be considered as a private person having no more authority than any other private individual. The question really was, whether a person accredited by the British Government, and charged by them to speak in their name, was not to be so received, but was merely to be regarded as a private individual.

EARL RUSSELL said, it was, of course, impossible that he could have received such a communication from Cardinal Antonelli—and Mr. Russell had not said a single word on the subject, though he had only just lately received a private letter from him.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER called attention to the fact that the Ordinances relating to Durham University had been laid on the table sixteen days before the close of last Session. The Act of Parliament provided that they should lie on the table for forty days; and if in that time an Address were not carried by either House of Parliament requesting Her Majesty to withhold her consent, the Queen in Council was empowered to confirm the Ordinances. He wished to know whether it was intended that the forty days were to be forty continuous days, or whether it would be deemed a sufficient compliance with the statute if they remained on the table unchallenged sixteen days of last Session and twenty-four days of the present?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the question raised by the right rev. Prelate was one of considerable importance. He was of opinion that the forty days must be taken to mean forty Sessional days; injustice might otherwise result, if Ordinances were laid on the table a few days before the recess, and were, by lapse of time, confirmed at a period when an opportunity of objecting to them could not be afforded. That the forty days should be continuous days would require stronger expressions than were to be found in the statute, and, as he understood the Act, they were to be forty Sessional days, and therefore the sixteen days of last Session would count in the present case.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that as to-morrow would be the last day on which Parliament would be able to deal with this question, he begged to give notice that he should then move an Address to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to withhold her confirmation from the Ordinances of the Commission of the Durham University.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

THE CASE OF PATRICK BOURKE.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether, in the promised inquiry into the circumstances attending the removal of Patrick Bourke from Leeds to Westport, he has taken any steps to secure the attendance of a representative of the Irish Poor Law Commissioners?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS replied, that the day after the noble Lord had brought the matter before the House he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) received the papers connected with the subject from Ireland, and he sent them forthwith to the Guardians at Leeds for their explanation. He had only that day received their answer. The Guardians took issue upon almost every fact stated in the papers, and professed their perfect readiness to enter into the fullest investigation of the case, and assist in every way in laying before the Board and Parliament all the facts connected with the case. It would be open to the noble Lord to see their answer, and he might then determine for himself whether any further inquiry was necessary. The ordinary course was to direct an Inspector to proceed to the spot and hold an open inquiry into the matters in question. If that were done, it would be in the power of the noble Lord to send any person he thought proper to watch the evidence and take such steps in the inquiry as he might think necessary. If the noble Lord thought further inquiry were necessary, he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) would then direct notice to be sent both to him and to the Poor Law Commissioners of Ireland of the place and the day when and where the further inquiry would take place.

BOOK POST TO INDIA AND CHINA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, On what grounds British manufacturers and others are prohibited from transmitting to India and Hong Kong specimens of textile fabrics of British Manufacture under the Book Post restrictions, as they are permitted to transmit them to France and elsewhere?

MR. PEEL replied, that with the single exception of France, as to which a special arrangement was made at the beginning of 1861, the Post Office did not undertake to carry, under the regulations of the Book Post, specimens of textile fabrics or any other trade patterns. He had no doubt that a general adoption of the principle would be beneficial to commerce; but he was told that there were considerable difficulties in the way, and it must depend upon the removal of those difficulties whether the Book Post could be made available for patterns.

REGISTRATION OF ASSURANCES.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he intends to introduce any Bill for the Registration of Assurances during the present Session?

SIR ROBERT PEEL replied, that a Bill had been prepared by the Government, and it would be introduced immediately.

THE LICENSING LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. LAWSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, the House having rejected the Liverpool Licensing Bill, he is prepared to introduce a general measure for amending the Licensing Laws?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the rejection by the House of the Liverpool Licensing Bill had tended rather to retard than to accelerate the introduction of a general measure. Several material points in connection with the subject were still under consideration, but he could not at present give a positive promise with regard to the introduction of a Bill.

THE NIGER EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any Report has been received from Lieutenant Lefroy, commanding Her Majesty's Ship Investigator, of his recent expedition in that ship as far as Rabba, on the river Niger, 400 miles into the interior of Africa, and of his return, after seven weeks' absence, without the loss of a man from fever or other cause; and whether he would have any objection to lay that Report upon the table of the House?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, there would be no objection to lay the Report in question on the table, if the noble Lord would be good enough to move for it. He understood it would be printed in the next Gazette.

BURMESE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to inquire, Why the Prize Money earned in the Burmese war, which terminated ten years ago, has not been paid?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, there had been some mistake with regard to the distribution of the Burmese prize money, the causes of which he could not quite ascertain. The Warrant, authorizing the distribution, was sent out in October, 1860. In 1861 there was an announcement made in India that no application would be received after the end of that year, and in conformity with that order a similar notification was published in this country. The Government had every reason to suppose then that the distribution would take place at once, but they discovered accidentally in September last, in reference to some question as to the Delhi prize money, that the distribution of the Pegu prize money was delayed in consequence of their not having received the prize roll of the naval force employed in Burmah. Steps were immediately taken in connection with the Admiralty to procure a roll of the men entitled to share in the distribution; the roll was sent out in the course of the autumn, and he hoped there would be no further delay in the distribution.

UNION RELIEF AID ACT (1862) CONTINUANCE BILL.—[BILL 17.]

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. CORDEN, MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance Bill was not likely to be reached that evening till an hour which would be inconvenient to many hon. Members who had Amendments to propose; arrangements had therefore been made for taking the Bill first on next Monday evening.

THE ROYAL LEVEES AND DRAWING ROOMS.—QUESTION.

MR. STURT:—I wish, Sir, to ask Her Majesty's Government a Question, but I am somewhat at a loss to know to what individual Member of the Government I should address it. I wish to ask the Government, Whether it is their intention to introduce any regulation by which Her Most Gracious Majesty's subjects, and more especially the stout portion of them, may attend the Levees and Drawing Rooms with decency and comfort, and without the risk of being squeezed to death?

There was no answer given to the Question.

BARRISTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 31.] QUESTION.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he rose to ask the hon. Member for the King's County to postpone this Bill until after Easter.

MR. HENNESSY, in reply, said, to meet the convenience of the Government, he would postpone the Bill until after Easter.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH and LORD CLARENCE PAGET rose together.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I wish to make an appeal to my hon. and gal-

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that nothing had been done. In truth the Coast Guard had been brought under the Admiralty, and rendered available for service in the navy—and the Naval Coast Volunteers had been re-organized for the same purpose. What struck me as remarkable was that the right hon. Baronet, after finding fault with the present Government for not dealing with an important question, but appointing a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter, should have taken great credit to himself for pursuing precisely the same course. And then as to the plan of retirement: The right hon. Baronet's scheme is on the table of the House, but it was not fortunate enough to receive the support of his own Board, as we have been told to-night that he threatened to dissolve the Board upon the question of the medical officers.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman a second time, but he is making all sorts of mistakes. I never alluded to the question of the medical officers. What was said by the hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House referred to the evidence I gave before the Admiralty Committee. In that evidence I stated that my plan for retirement and promotion—not connected with the medical officers—from the manner in which it affected officers at the head of the service, was not acceptable to some of the naval men at my Board; and having Her Majesty's permission to make the statement, I said I was prepared to break up my Board rather than not pass my plan.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I quoted the statement of the hon. Gentleman who spoke a few minutes ago, and who was a member of the Committee. However that may be, the plan of the right hon. Gentleman was not approved by the noble Duke who succeeded him, who brought forward his own plan in 1860. Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman says that my noble Friend in assenting to a Committee is inconsistent with himself two years ago. But that is not the case. My noble Friend proposed to refer to the Committee upon Admiralty affairs then sitting the very question which he now proposes to refer to a Select Committee. The course, therefore, is not inconsistent, but identical. Then, as to the extraordinary tyranny exercised by a Whig Board of Admiralty that we have heard of from the hon. Member for Devonport, by which they prevented a due exercise of the franchise by those employed in the dockyards. When I was First Lord the patronage of the dockyards were given over to the Superintendents, and since then the Board of Admiralty has had nothing to do with promotion or employment in the yards. But the best proof of the independence of those employed in the dockyards is the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Ferrand's) presence here; for if at the last election at Devonport the dockyard votes had not been given at all, the Lord of the Admiralty would have been returned, whereas, in fact, with a majority elsewhere in his favour, the Lord of the Admiralty had a majority of 150 dockyard votes against him. As for the objections to accept the China command, I can only say the noble Lord near me has never heard of them.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he believed he should be carrying out the wishes of the House by accepting the proposal of the noble Lord the Prime Minister to appoint a Committee to inquire into this subject, and the recommendations of which would be brought before Parliament. He trusted that the Committee would be one in which the House and the service would have confidence. As the noble Lord had changed his opinion within the last ten or fourteen days, and, instead of opposing, now proposed inquiry, he was prepared to meet him half-way. With reference to what had fallen from his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, it was not for him to contest the positions he had advanced; it would be for the Committee to decide who had put forth the fairest statement, and he did not mistrust the result. He felt excessively obliged to the House both on his own behalf and in behalf of the navy for the kind attention he had received, and he now sat down in the confident hope that the inquiry would take place, and that the Report would be carried out in good faith by Her Majesty's Government.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, having on the 13th day of March 1861 instructed a Select Committee to consider the present system of Promotion and Retirement in the Royal Navy, is of opinion that its decision should be suspended until the subject shall have been accordingly considered and reported upon; and that a Select Committee be appointed to consider the present system of Promotion and Retirement in the Royal Navy, and to report their opinion thereon to this House.

SECURITY FROM VIOLENCE BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he rose to ask permission of the House to introduce a Bill for providing for the further security of Her Majesty's subjects from personal violence. The Bill was a very short one, but he thought it would be effectual. The punishment provided by the existing Act of 1861 for the crime of robbery with violence was penal servitude for terms ranging from three years to life, or solitary imprisonment, with hard labour, not exceeding two years. He proposed to make the same addition to that punishment for robbery with violence which was made by the Act of 1842 to the punishment for attacks upon the Queen, and by the Act of 1845 to the punishment for malicious injury of works of art—namely, corporal punishment. He did so for the same reasons, with the same object, and he was convinced with the same result which attached to those two Acts. It seemed to him that in the long and dreary vista of broken-down experiments in penal enactments during the last fifty years those two Acts stood out in striking contrast of complete success. The proposition was made in no retrograde spirit, but it followed precedent, proof from experience, and, he must say, the dictates of common sense. In the Larceny Consolidation Act of 1861 corporal punishment of adults was deliberately retained in the case he had alluded to, which he held belonged to the same category as robbery with violence. He attached no weight whatever to the opinion of those who opposed corporal punishment as degrading. These men argued from their own innocence to the feelings of degraded humanity. The question was not whether corporal punishment was applicable to men of honour, but to the correction of men of the lowest motives. According to the philosophy of punishment, to be effectual it must be addressed to the motives of the punished; and if there were those who would only be deterred from crime by fear of pain, it was surely far better to visit the crime with the punishment which would put a stop to its commission rather than by inefficient punishments lead to the perpetual repetition of the crime and the punishment too. He in no way trenched on the ground fenced off for the Royal Commission instituted for inquiring into the operation of the Acts on penal servitude and transportation, and the manner in which they had, or rather had not, been carried out. Even if the House was content to suffer an embargo to be laid on its action, and that public opinion should be obstructed just when it was ready for action on recent experience, the Minister could scarcely plead such an embargo as an excuse from discussion who had continued to deal with the question himself, and made considerable alterations by circulars from his own Department, pending the inquiry which he had himself instituted. He proposed not in any way to affect the operation of the two Acts of 1853 and 1857 which had been referred to the Commission, but simply to make an addition, or, he would say, to supply an omission in them—namely, to add another crime to the list which had been reserved for corporal punishment in aggravation of the penalties provided by those Acts. He had not only the great success of the Acts of 1842 and 1845 to adduce in favour of his proposition, but wherever else corporal punishment had been tried, or was still in use, they found it had precisely the same results. He might quote the high opinion of the Duke of Wellington as to the efficiency of corporal punishments in the army; for when he gave evidence against the excessive use of that punishment, he guarded himself against being supposed in favour of its abolition. Not only for deterrence, but as an exemplary punishment, in certain cases, he considered it was absolutely necessary. As to the use of that punishment in prison for purposes of internal discipline, he could adduce the high authority of Major Fulford the governor of the county goal at Stafford, who stated that in thirteen years' experience, having had every species of ruffian under his care, however inefficient other punishments might have been, he could say with regard to corporal punishment alone that he never on any occasion had to repeat it a second time. He did not think public opinion in this country would be content, especially in the existing extremity for efficient secondary punishments, to throw away one which had proved so effectual; and if it had been successful in protecting Her Majesty from violence, and works of art from malicious injury, would they be acting like sensible men if, from any feeling of scrupulousness, based, he believed, on a perfectly false philosophy, they allowed themselves to be exposed to the most rampant violence when such an effectual remedy lay idle in their hands? He begged to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that on the part of Her Majesty's Government he would not offer any objection to the bringing in of the Bill, but he wished, however, to guard himself against being supposed to assent to its principle. The right hon. Gentleman had not explained the manner in which he proposed to effect his suggested alteration of the law. The House should bear in mind that only two years ago the Criminal Law was revised and consolidated, and that, upon the recommendation of the Select Committee to whom the revision was intrusted, the House decided that the punishment of flogging should be abolished in respect to offences to which it formerly attached by law, with the exception of the two or three cases to which the right hon. Gentleman had adverted. The House would, therefore, have to carefully consider, when the Bill came before them at a future stage, the grounds on which it was asked to retrace its steps. He did not collect from the right hon. Gentleman's speech whether he intended to make the infliction of corporal punishment imperative, or to leave it to the discretion of the Judge. In the latter case he would do well to remember, that when that punishment was attached to certain offences, it was very rarely inflicted. When a particular judge, in the exercise of his discretionary power, sentenced a prisoner to be whipped, juries were found reluctant to convict, and prisoners often escaped. The Judges very rarely sentenced prisoners to corporal punishment, and past experience led to the belief that if they were again to be intrusted with the power of doing so, they would rarely exercise it. The Bill might thus alter the theory of the law without producing much effect on its practice. On the other hand, if the infliction of flogging was to be imperative, the right hon. Gentleman had not stated whether he meant it to be a cumulative punishment, in addition to imprisonment and penal servitude, or in substitution for them. Again, a prisoner's health, age, or other circumstances might make it impossible to inflict the punishment, though he had committed an offence to which it might attach. Nor had the right hon. Gentleman very accurately defined the crimes to which he desired to affix that punishment. He had spoken of offences attended with violence, but it was not very clear whether he meant to include burglaries with violence. Moreover, if flogging was so effectual, where was the line to be drawn? Was one man, who knocked down another to rob him of his watch, to be subject to this punishment; while another, who knocked down a woman to violate her, was to be exempt from it? In the army and navy flogging might be necessary in certain cases; and in gaols, when violent outbreaks suddenly occurred, he believed it was the only effectual mode of suppressing insubordination; but it was a different thing when inflicted on men who were to be tried for a crime weeks, or perhaps months, after its commission. He would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, and he should be glad to hear fuller explanations from the hon. Gentleman at a subsequent stage.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the further security of the persons of Her Majesty's Subjects from personal violence, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ADDERLEY, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, and Mr. GARNETT.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 35.]

JURORS' REMUNERATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill under which jurors would be entitled to remuneration in certain cases. The claims upon the time of jurors had of late greatly increased, and he proposed that when they were called on as a matter of convenience to suitors to perform a duty not cast upon them in former times, namely, to act in cases not originating in the county in which they resided, they should be entitled to receive a fee of 7s. each, or one third of the fee paid to special jurymen.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill; but at the same time he wished to be understood as not committing himself to its principle.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the remuneration of Jurors in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Sir FREDERICK KELLER.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 36.]

WRITS PROHIBITION.—LEAVE.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to ask for leave to introduce a Bill to prohibit the issue of writs for actions of debt in the superior courts for sums of less than £20. Practically, a large majority of the cases in which writs were issued did not come to trial, and an enormous number were for very small sums, of £2, £3, and £4, where the costs were at least equal the sum sought to be recovered. He proposed by this Bill to meet that great grievance, leaving the law as it stood at present in regard to actions for damages and other matters. He proposed to fix the second reading for a not very early day, and would undertake to shape the Bill according to any suggestions of the legal authorities of the Government, if they accepted the principle.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was willing to assent to the introduction of the Bill, which was undoubtedly one of great importance. The hon. Gentleman had stated that he would accede to any suggestion that might be made, in case it should appear to them that there was no objection to the principle of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to prohibit the issue of Writs for Actions of Debt in the Superior Courts for sums of less than Twenty Pounds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD FLEYDELL BOUVERIE and Mr. HARCASTE.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES' ANNUITIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was anxious, on the part of several most intelligent persons who had communicated with him, to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, which he was personally convinced would receive a satisfactory answer. On the occasion of the marriage of Her Most Gracious Majesty, the Duke of Wellington insisted on having a public declaration that the Prince Consort was of the Protestant faith. He had been requested to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government to announce distinctly whether Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra was a Protestant.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am very glad to be able to answer the question of the hon. Gentleman in a manner that will, I am sure, be satisfactory to him and to the House. When the question arose of selecting a Princess who might be the wife of the Prince of Wales, the following conditions were thought to be requisite: First of all, that she should be young; next, that she should be handsome; further, that she should be agreeable, that she should be amiable in her disposition, that she should be well brought up; and, lastly, that she should be a Protestant. All these conditions, I am happy to say, are united in the Princess Alexandra. I trust, therefore, that the choice will be as satisfactory to the nation as I am sure it will be conducive to the happiness of the Prince of Wales.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^d on Thursday.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

Bill to make provision concerning Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes payable in the Metropolis on the day appointed for the passage through the Metropolis of Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE GAY and Mr. BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 33.]

House adjourned at half after Ten o'clock, till Thursday.

ITALY—AFFAIRS OF ROME.

QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had given notice to his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of his intention to put two Questions to him that evening. The first of these had reference to the delay in the production of certain Despatches which his noble Friend quoted in his speech on this subject a few evenings since. Although his noble Friend had read extracts from these Despatches, they had never been printed; and his noble Friend had failed to lay them on the table immediately afterwards, as was the invariable practice to do in the case of documents from which extracts had been read in the course of debate. His noble Friend near him (the Earl of Ellenborough) stated most truly the other night, that no Minister of the Crown ought to read extracts from any public document, unless he were prepared at once—he emphatically stated at once—to lay the document upon the table, because, if delay were to take place, incorrect impressions might be produced. Inasmuch as the whole question turned upon the balance of recollection, he hoped the noble Earl would not permit any further delay in the presentation of these documents. These despatches ought to be produced at once; and he believed that when the noble Earl's attention was called to them again, he would readily admit that they would not bear the interpretation which the noble Earl had sought to place upon them. There was another Question which he would put to the noble Earl, of a more serious nature. Within the last few weeks a statement had been printed in some of the German papers, and had been copied into other journals without contradiction, to the effect that Cardinal Antonelli in a Despatch to M. Chigi, the Papal Nuncio at Paris, informed the latter that Mr. Odo Russell had made a further attempt to induce the Pope to quit Rome, and had quoted a letter from the noble Earl expressing some disappointment that the Pope had not followed this advice, and had even gone so far as to intimate, that if he did not speedily avail himself of the offer, he might be compelled to do so. It was also stated that Cardinal Antonelli had demanded what right Mr. Odo Russell, being only an attaché, had to address the Pope in these terms, and had declared that he would in future only hold communication with Mr. Russell in his private capacity. He wished to know whether the noble Earl knew of any such Despatch.

EARL RUSSELL said, that with regard to the despatches of the noble Marquess from which he had quoted in a former debate, he had more than once stated that he had no objection to produce them, or extracts from them. He had not understood that the noble Marquess had formally asked for them—but they would be laid upon the table to-morrow. There was no doubt that it was conformable to the general rule that all despatches quoted by a Minister should be laid upon the table; but he also knew that that rule had not been observed on more than one occasion, and particularly he remembered in the other House of Parliament a Chancellor of the Exchequer quoting extracts from despatches of his and not only not producing them till a late day, but not producing them at all. In this case he would give the extracts to-morrow. He was rather surprised that the noble Marquess should so constantly harp on this theme. He considered that the despatch from which he had quoted the dictum, that if England's advice in the cause of national liberty was neglected, it would reflect no discredit upon her, was to his noble Friend's honour. He knew nothing in his noble Friend's diplomatic career which reflected on him more credit; and if his noble Friend succeeded in effacing it, he knew of nothing in it which would remain to do him equal honour. It was quite natural that in reference to the French occupation of Rome the English Government should make representations in favour of national liberty. If these representations were well taken, they produced good; if not, they could reflect no discredit on the English Government. No doubt, there was a great difference between the position of the French and English Governments in reference to this question. With respect to the other Question, as to some supposed despatch from Cardinal Antonelli to M. Chigi, he was certainly not at all responsible for what Cardinal Antonelli might have written to the Papal Nuncio at Paris. It was a very odd story altogether. As to his having written a letter to Mr. Odo Russell to the effect that the Pope ought to leave Rome, and that if he did not, he might be obliged, and which Mr. Russell read to Cardinal Antonelli, he (Earl Russell) had certainly never written any such letter. As he certainly did not expect that the Pope would leave Rome, knowing well that the Emperor of the French by a change of Ministers for Foreign Affairs had indicated his intention to maintain the French troops at Rome, he would never have thought of writing such a letter as had been represented; and, consequently, he had never felt disappointed that the Pope would not follow his advice. Mr. Odo Russell, who was the other person immediately concerned, said he went to pay a visit of courtesy about the time mentioned; but he never mentioned any letter of his, he never had such a letter, and he never read such a letter to Cardinal Antonelli. Whether Cardinal Antonelli was under that impression or not he could not tell. Nor could he say whether there was such a despatch or not, but as far as it related to a letter of his the statement was without foundation. The noble Marquess asked what business had an attaché of the embassy at Turin to go to Rome? Mr. Russell was not an attaché of the Embassy at Turin. At one time he was an attaché at Florence and Naples; but the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the King of Naples having quitted their respective dominions, of course he could no longer be an attaché at their courts. Cardinal Antonelli inquired of Mr. Russell in what character he was at Rome; and, after some observation, he went on to say, that as the King of Sardinia was an excommunicated Sovereign, it would not be agreeable to the Roman Government to receive an attaché from an Embassy to an excommunicated Court. The Foreign Office could have no objection to meeting the views of the Roman Government in this respect, and Mr. Russell was made an attaché directly from the Foreign Office. If Mr. Russell had ever spoken to Cardinal Antonelli on State affairs, it was entirely owing to Cardinal Antonelli, who had taken the initiative. The Cardinal had often conversed with Mr. Russell on State matters in the most confidential manner, stating, at the same time, that there was nothing official in the communications. There could be no possible harm in Mr. Russell listening to what Cardinal Antonelli had to say.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the noble Earl had not answered the really important portion of the Question which had been put to him. His noble Friend had not asked him to produce a despatch from Cardinal Antonelli—which of course he could not do—but whether he had any reason to know that Cardinal Antonelli, in a despatch to Monsignor Chigi, had declared that the representation made by Mr. Odo Russell was incorrect with respect to what had taken place; and that so much inconvenience had in consequence arisen that Mr. Russell was not to be recognised in any official capacity, and was merely to be considered as a private person having no more authority than any other private individual. The question really was, whether a person accredited by the British Government, and charged by them to speak in their name, was not to be so received, but was merely to be regarded as a private individual.

EARL RUSSELL said, it was, of course, impossible that he could have received such a communication from Cardinal Antonelli—and Mr. Russell had not said a single word on the subject, though he had only just lately received a private letter from him.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER called attention to the fact that the Ordinances relating to Durham University had been laid on the table sixteen days before the close of last Session. The Act of Parliament provided that they should lie on the table for forty days; and if in that time an Address were not carried by either House of Parliament requesting Her Majesty to withhold her consent, the Queen in Council was empowered to confirm the Ordinances. He wished to know whether it was intended that the forty days were to be forty continuous days, or whether it would be deemed a sufficient compliance with the statute if they remained on the table unchallenged sixteen days of last Session and twenty-four days of the present?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the question raised by the right rev. Prelate was one of considerable importance. He was of opinion that the forty days must be taken to mean forty Sessional days; injustice might otherwise result, if Ordinances were laid on the table a few days before the recess, and were, by lapse of time, confirmed at a period when an opportunity of objecting to them could not be afforded. That the forty days should be continuous days would require stronger expressions than were to be found in the statute, and, as he understood the Act, they were to be forty Sessional days, and therefore the sixteen days of last Session would count in the present case.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that as to-morrow would be the last day on which Parliament would be able to deal with this question, he begged to give notice that he should then move an Address to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to withhold her confirmation from the Ordinances of the Commission of the Durham University.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

THE CASE OF PATRICK BOURKE.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether, in the promised inquiry into the circumstances attending the removal of Patrick Bourke from Leeds to Westport, he has taken any steps to secure the attendance of a representative of the Irish Poor Law Commissioners?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS replied, that the day after the noble Lord had brought the matter before the House he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) received the papers connected with the subject from Ireland, and he sent them forthwith to the Guardians at Leeds for their explanation. He had only that day received their answer. The Guardians took issue upon almost every fact stated in the papers, and professed their perfect readiness to enter into the fullest investigation of the case, and assist in every way in laying before the Board and Parliament all the facts connected with the case. It would be open to the noble Lord to see their answer, and he might then determine for himself whether any further inquiry was necessary. The ordinary course was to direct an Inspector to proceed to the spot and hold an open inquiry into the matters in question. If that were done, it would be in the power of the noble Lord to send any person he thought proper to watch the evidence and take such steps in the inquiry as he might think necessary. If the noble Lord thought further inquiry were necessary, he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) would then direct notice to be sent both to him and to the Poor Law Commissioners of Ireland of the place and the day when and where the further inquiry would take place.

BOOK POST TO INDIA AND CHINA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, On what grounds British manufacturers and others are prohibited from transmitting to India and Hong Kong specimens of textile fabrics of British Manufacture under the Book Post restrictions, as they are permitted to transmit them to France and elsewhere?

MR. PEEL replied, that with the single exception of France, as to which a special arrangement was made at the beginning of 1861, the Post Office did not undertake to carry, under the regulations of the Book Post, specimens of textile fabrics or any other trade patterns. He had no doubt that a general adoption of the principle would be beneficial to commerce; but he was told that there were considerable difficulties in the way, and it must depend upon the removal of those difficulties whether the Book Post could be made available for patterns.

REGISTRATION OF ASSURANCES.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he intends to introduce any Bill for the Registration of Assurances during the present Session?

SIR ROBERT PEEL replied, that a Bill had been prepared by the Government, and it would be introduced immediately.

THE LICENSING LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. LAWSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, the House having rejected the Liverpool Licensing Bill, he is prepared to introduce a general measure for amending the Licensing Laws?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the rejection by the House of the Liverpool Licensing Bill had tended rather to retard than to accelerate the introduction of a general measure. Several material points in connection with the subject were still under consideration, but he could not at present give a positive promise with regard to the introduction of a Bill.

THE NIGER EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any Report has been received from Lieutenant Lefroy, commanding Her Majesty's Ship Investigator, of his recent expedition in that ship as far as Rabba, on the river Niger, 400 miles into the interior of Africa, and of his return, after seven weeks' absence, without the loss of a man from fever or other cause; and whether he would have any objection to lay that Report upon the table of the House?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, there would be no objection to lay the Report in question on the table, if the noble Lord would be good enough to move for it. He undertook it would be printed in the next Gazette.

BURMESE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to inquire, Why the Prize Money earned in the Burmese war, which terminated ten years ago, has not been paid?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, there had been some mistake with regard to the distribution of the Burmese prize money, the causes of which he could not quite ascertain. The Warrant, authorizing the distribution, was sent out in October, 1860. In 1861 there was an announcement made in India that no application would be received after the end of that year, and in conformity with that order a similar notification was published in this country. The Government had every reason to suppose then that the distribution would take place at once, but they discovered accidentally in September last, in reference to some question as to the Delhi prize money, that the distribution of the Pegu prize money was delayed in consequence of their not having received the prize roll of the naval force employed in Burmah. Steps were immediately taken in connection with the Admiralty to procure a roll of the men entitled to share in the distribution; the roll was sent out in the course of the autumn, and he hoped there would be no further delay in the distribution.

UNION RELIEF AID ACT (1862) CONTINUANCE BILL.—[BILL 17.]

QUESTION.

In reply to MR. CORDEN,

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance Bill was not likely to be reached that evening till an hour which would be inconvenient to many hon. Members who had Amendments to propose; arrangements had therefore been made for taking the Bill first on next Monday evening.

THE ROYAL LEVEES AND DRAWING ROOMS.—QUESTION.

MR. STURT:—I wish, Sir, to ask Her Majesty's Government a Question, but I am somewhat at a loss to know to what individual Member of the Government I should address it. I wish to ask the Government, Whether it is their intention to introduce any regulation by which Her Most Gracious Majesty's subjects, and more especially the stout portion of them, may attend the Levees and Drawing Rooms with decency and comfort, and without the risk of being squeezed to death?

There was no answer given to the Question.

BARRISTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 31.] QUESTION.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he rose to ask the hon. Member for the King's County to postpone this Bill until after Easter.

MR. HENNESSY, in reply, said, to meet the convenience of the Government, he would postpone the Bill until after Easter.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH and LORD CLARENCE PAGET rose together.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I wish to make an appeal to my hon. and gallant Friend—[Cries of Order! amid which the noble Lord resumed his seat.]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. and gallant Member give way?

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: I am quite ready to go on. I have no feeling but that of doing my duty as a Member and upholding the dignity of the House. The noble Lord was getting up to make some statement in reference to the breach of privilege of which I complain; and if the noble Lord is prepared to make an apology on the part of the party offending to the House, and to me, I am the last man to stand in the way, so long as my honour and the honour of the House are safe. It is in the recollection of the House that we had a debate two nights ago on the subject of the Naval Estimates, and that in the performance of my duty I then made some comments on an appointment by the Board of Admiralty which appeared to me to be open to grave question. I thought that in making those remarks I had guarded myself against saying anything unkind or ungenerous. I asked whether or not the gentleman who was appointed Chief Constructor of the Navy had ever built a ship; and I said, that if not, the appointment was, in my estimation, a very dangerous and improper one, because the Constructor of the Navy will have the control of all the dockyards in the service, and if he be incompetent to teach those whom he has to direct, all discipline will fall to the ground. I stated, also in correction of my noble Friend (Lord C. Paget), that the gentleman in question had really not been a member of the College of Naval Architecture. At first I believed he had, because there was a Mr. Reed who was a member of that College, with Mr. Chatfield and Mr. Creuze, and when Mr. Reed was appointed I believed him to be that person. It is now certain that he is not that person, but that he was brought up as an apprentice, at first at Sheerness, then at Portsmouth, and also, but of this I am not quite sure, at Chatham. He was, however, a mere apprentice. I am glad to find a person in that position raising himself up. I myself have risen in the service and in position, and no one is more glad than I am to see others do so. However, this gentleman, as I have said, had really been merely an apprentice of the working class, and was at the School of Mathematics at Portsmouth. There he acquired a knowledge of mathematics. He is a very talented man, I have not the least doubt, but he never was a member of the College of Naval Architecture, and he never had, so far as I am aware, a knowledge of naval architecture, fitting him for the prominent post which he now occupies. As a Member of Parliament, I think I had a fair right to criticise the appointment. I am sure I would not do it invidiously. I should be the last man to bear hardly on him; and if he had been appointed to a junior office, with a prospect of rising to a higher position, no objection would have been made. But to place him at once at the head of all the constructors of the navy I think is hardly fitting. These are the statements I made. I have since read the report of my speech in all the leading journals, and I can find nothing that goes beyond what I have described. I also said I did not believe Mr. Reed had acquired that amount of practical experience which would enable him to discharge his duties with advantage to the country. Under these circumstances I was never more astonished in my life than when I received yesterday morning a letter from Mr. Reed, whom I never saw, and of whom I know nothing except in his public character. That letter is as follows:—

"10, Glen Mohr Terrace, Greenwich,
"February 24.

"Sir,—In the House of Commons last evening I heard you deny that I had belonged to the Admiralty School of Naval Architecture, which, though true verbally, inasmuch as the school was entitled 'School of Mathematics and Naval Construction,' is calculated to convey a most false impression, inasmuch as the school in question was, in fact, a school of naval architecture, inferior in no respect to that which bore the name previously. Further, I heard you state that I was without a proper knowledge of my profession; in fact, that 'I knew nothing about the matter.' Now, I call upon you to say why you made this false and libellous statement concerning me in your place in Parliament, and on what grounds you justify, or attempt to justify, it. I beg to assure you that I have not sought the appointment which the Admiralty have given to me, and I think you are bound, if you feel called upon to put forward the claims of a constituent of yours as superior to mine, to do so without subjecting me to personal abuse in a place where I can have no opportunity of answering you.

"I am Sir, yours very truly,

"E. J. REED.

"To Sir Frederic Smith, M.P."

Now, first of all, it is quite clear he alludes to Mr. Lang. I believe no person knowing Mr. Lang can doubt that he is the best naval architect you have, perhaps the best in the world. But Mr. Lang is not, and never was, a constituent of mine. Mr. Lang never was and never will be, on the register of voters for the borough of Chatham. I trust the House will feel with me that a Member of Parliament ought not to be subject to attacks of this kind in the performance of a simple duty. I can assure the House, and Mr. Reed, that I have no ill-will whatever against him. I should be glad to see him rise in the profession, and if he is appointed by the Government, I hope he will succeed and be useful to the service. But if we are to be deterred in the performance of our duties in a matter of this kind, the House of Commons will be degraded. I, for one, cannot stand under the stigma of having used false and libellous words, when the exact expressions attributed to me by this gentleman never passed my lips. I can find no trace of them; but if I did not use them, then I am ready to do so now, therefore Mr. Reed will get nothing by his letter. I now say, what I said before, that if Mr. Reed has never constructed a ship his appointment is improper, because I believe he cannot be competent practically to carry out the business of the dockyards. I was about to move that Mr. Reed be called to the Bar. But my noble Friend has proposed that I should take no steps in the matter until I had waited for an apology, which the noble Lord says has been written. [Cries of Move!] If such an apology has been written, no doubt that will be satisfactory. [Renewed cries of Move!] If such be the wish of the House, I will move that Mr. Reed be called to the Bar.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having brought under consideration a document which he considers a breach of privilege, will be so good as to bring it to the table.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I do not think it is usual to make a Motion to call a gentleman to the Bar until the House has first decided that the document amounts to a breach of privilege. I express no opinion upon this point myself, but I think the first Motion should be that the document is a breach of privilege.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: I beg to move that the document is a breach of the privileges of this House.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, no one can, I presume, dispute, that a dis-

VOL CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

tingent breach of privilege has been committed, and that the letter was a most improper one. But my hon. and gallant Friend, before he brought the subject under consideration, was good enough to show me the letter, and also to state, that if I could get up and assure the House that Mr. Reed would be prepared to make a proper and ample apology, he would not push the matter further. My object in rising, a while ago, was to induce my hon. and gallant Friend to put off the matter until I should see Mr. Reed, and procure a suitable apology for such improper conduct. ["No, no!"] I again appeal to my hon. and gallant Friend.

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, the attack, such as it is, has been made upon this House, and the apology, if any, ought to be made at the Bar of this House.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the said Letter is a breach of the privileges of this House.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: I now move that Mr. Reed be called to the Bar of the House on to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That E. J. Reed do attend this House To-morrow.

THE NAWAB OF THE CARNATIC.

RESOLUTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he rose to submit the following Resolution:—

"That, whereas by a Royal Proclamation addressed to the Native Princes and Peoples of India, published the 1st day of November, 1858, it is stated 'That we desire no extension of our present territorial possessions, and while we will permit no aggression upon our Dominions or our Rights to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachment in those of others;' and again, 'We hereby announce to the Native Princes of India, that all Treaties and engagements made with them by or under the authority of the Honourable East India Company, are by us accepted, and will be scrupulously maintained;' so, in the opinion of this House, where differences of opinion have arisen with respect to the interpretation of such Treaties, the questions at issue ought to be referred for decision to Her Majesty's Privy Council."

He brought forward the Motion with much regret, because he was aware that Indian questions were distasteful to the House; but, believing that the honour of the Queen had been compromised by the conduct of the Government, it became a matter of duty to bring the subject under the notice of Parliament. When Her Majesty's Government were advised to assume the direct administration of Indian affairs, a great responsibility was cast upon the Crown. Her Majesty had no Parliament in India to counsel her in the administration of the government of that country. The Parliament of England was both disinclined to discuss Indian questions and unable to appreciate the opinions and feelings of the people of India. It was for these reasons that the Ministers who were in office when the transfer of the government of India to the Crown was made, advised Her Majesty to issue a proclamation to the Indian Princes and people, informing them not only that Her Majesty was about to assume the direct government of their country, but also what were the principles upon which, for the future, that government was to be conducted. That proclamation was issued at a time of great public danger, when the rebellion was still in progress, and when large bodies of Indian troops were still in arms against Her Majesty. The effect of that proclamation was very remarkable, and he did not hesitate to say that it had contributed very greatly to the pacification of the country, and he was sure the House would feel that the promises made by Her Majesty, under such circumstances, ought to be faithfully and honourably fulfilled. Now, what were the promises made in that proclamation? That proclamation promised to the people of India that their ancient laws and customs should be preserved to the native princes; it promised not only that no spoliation of territory should in future take place, but that all the treaties which had been made by the East India Company with the native princes should be faithfully and honourably maintained. Had those promises been fulfilled? He charged the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India with violating those promises. He knew it was a very serious charge, for it involved the honour of the Crown, and he should not make it lightly or without due consideration. He made it advisedly, and he was prepared to demonstrate its truth. The case which he was about to bring under the notice of the House was that of the Nawab of the Carnatic, but the House should not suppose that this was a solitary case. There were many cases of violations of treaties and of spoliations of territories, but they occurred during the administration of the East India Company, and there would be great difficulty now in going back to those transactions. But the case which he was about to bring under the notice of the House had occurred during the last days of the Company, had been since referred to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India, he had reviewed it, and confirmed what the Company had done. In taking that course the right hon. Gentleman had violated the promises made in Her Majesty's proclamation. The case of the Nawab of the Carnatic was this. The Nawabs of the Carnatic were princes of that part of India previous to the advent of the British. At the time when the East India Company's possessions were confined to the factories of Madras and Cuddalore, and when they were contending with the French for their very existence, the Nawab gave them the most effective aid both in money and troops, and continued to assist them in all their wars down to the close of the last century. In order that the House might appreciate the debt of gratitude the East India Company owed to the Nawab, he would read a few extracts from the official correspondence of that period. Sir Thomas Rumbold, in 1780, said—

"The first and most distinguished of our connections is that which has been long formed with the present Nabob of the Carnatic. Our influence in the Carnatic is founded on the free will and consent of the Nabob. It is unquestionably to his influence in the Carnatic that we are indebted for a great part of our prosperity—for our success against the French during the last war, to which, as affairs have since turned out, we owe perhaps our present existence in the East."

Such was the avowal of the Governor of Madras in 1780. In spite of that friendship and alliance, however, the Nawab was compelled by Lord Wellesley, in 1801, to sign a treaty by which he surrendered four-fifths of the revenue of his territory to the East India Company, on condition that the remaining fifth part should be secured for the maintenance of his dignity and that of his family. That violent proceeding on the part of Lord Wellesley was justified on the ground of some treasonable correspondence said to have been carried on with the Mysore Princes; but the facts were never proved, and the charge was denounced in the House of Commons in 1808 by Mr. Sheridan and Sir Samuel Romilly as frivolous and without the shadow of a foundation. Mr. Sheridan called upon the ex-Chief Justice of Bengal (then a Member of the House) to declare whether a man could be convicted upon such evidence in a court of justice, and he emphatically declared that he could not. It was upon such frivolous pretexts that Lord Wellesley despoiled the Nawab of four-fifths of his territory; and it remained for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State to despoil him of the remainder upon grounds still more frivolous and unjust. The Treaty of 1801 was faithfully and honourably maintained by the East India Company for a period of upwards of fifty years. At the expiration of that time, in the year 1855, the Marquess of Dalhousie, being Governor General of India, publicly proclaimed what has been called the annexation policy, which was eagerly adopted by the East India Company because it promised them a large accession of revenue. In his celebrated minute the Marquess of Dalhousie expressed the opinion that it was sound policy to take every opportunity of annexing the territories of native princes, so that India might be governed by one central authority. Acting on this principle, when the Nawab of the Carnatic died in 1855, he sent orders to the Governor of Madras to take possession of the territory, declare the nawabship to be at an end, and to seize on all the property, public as well as personal, of the family. The Marquess of Dalhousie justified this renewed act of spoliation on the singular ground that the Treaty of 1801 was a personal treaty, having reference only to the Nawab who signed it, and, as that Nawab had died, the treaty ceased to exist, and the Company could deal with the territory as they pleased. It did not appear to have suggested itself to the Marquess of Dalhousie, that if the treaty had ceased to exist, the Government had lost the only title by which it held any portion of the Carnatic territory, and that the whole must of necessity have reverted to the Nawab. That might be proved by the admission of the East India Company, for after the signature of the Treaty of 1801 the East India Company issued a proclamation requiring all the barons, noblemen, and gentry, the great officers of the Carnatic, to yield due obedience to them by virtue of the rights and powers acquired to the said Company by compact with the lawful Nawab of the Carnatic. That was a direct admission that their rights were acquired by the treaty. The interpretation put upon the treaty by the Marquess of Dalhousie did not convey the real meaning and intention of it; it was clearly intended by the Nawab to make over four-fifths of the revenue of the Carnatic to the East India Company for ever, on condition that the remaining portion should be guaranteed for ever to his family. And he would next proceed to show, by the most conclusive proofs, that such was the opinion of all the great officers of the East India Company up to 1855. The Nawab who signed the Treaty of 1801, Azeem-ul-Dowlah, died in 1819. Now, if the treaty had been considered as a personal one, that would have been the proper time for the East India Company to come forward and assert their rights. But what took place? His son, Azeem Jah, on the 11th September, 1819, was proclaimed as his successor, and on the 13th December of the same year the Nawab was informed by the Government agent, that in the opinion of the Governor General, a new treaty was unnecessary, as the Governor General considered his Highness to be ipso facto a party to the treaty concluded with his father in 1801. So that they had the Governor General of 1819, the Marquess of Hastings, directly at variance with the Marquess of Dalhousie in 1855. On the 3rd February, 1820, a few months afterwards, the Governor of Madras, Sir Thomas Monro, a great Indian authority, addressed a letter to the Nawab, in which this passage occurred—

"It is with infinite satisfaction I have the honour to congratulate your Highness upon ascending the musnud in the direct line of hereditary succession to your late father, of blessed memory.

"By the 10th Article of the Treaty of 1801 the rank of the Nawab as a prince and as an ally of the British Government is declared. No change in the political situation of the Nawab has taken place since 1801. He is still Prince of the Carnatic, and he is a party to the treaty by which one-fifth part of the revenue is secured to him; without a breach of the treaty we cannot, except with his consent, alter any of the articles."

That was a quotation from Gleig's Life of Sir Thomas Monro. Nothing could be more clear and decided than this opinion. Upon the death of this prince, who reigned but six years, he was in due course succeeded by his son, and this succession was announced as follows:—

"Mahomed Ghouse, only son of his Highness Azeem Jah Bahadoor, was on the 22nd December, 1825, proclaimed successor to his deceased father in the rank and title of Nawab Subhadar; during the minority of the Nawab the affairs of the Darbar will be conducted by his Highness Azeem Jah Bahadoor, brother of the late Nawab, with the title of Naib-i-Mooktar, or Regent."

And thus, with the consent of the East India Company, the present claimant was appointed Regent during the minority of his nephew. In a letter of the Honourable Court of Directors of January 14, 1829, it was said—"The Nawab being an infant and in declining health, and the Naib-i-Mooktar being next heir in case of his demise." That was a direct acknowledgment of his right of succession. Again, the Directors, on the 4th of July, 1824, expressed their approval of certain proceedings on the ground of the Naib-i-Mooktar being heir in case of the demise of his nephew, Gholam Ghouse Khan. He now came to a later period—namely, 1843. On the 20th of September, 1843, on the occasion of a question of precedence, the Governor of Madras, the Marquess of Tweeddale, again expressly recognised Prince Azeem Jah's right to the succession. His Lordship in Council observed, that—

"His Highness Prince Azeem Jah Bahadoor does not hold the place in list No. 1, to which he is entitled in consideration of the position he lately occupied in communication with the British Government, and of that he still holds in relation to his Highness the Nabob and to his succession to the Musnud."

He (Mr. H. Baillie) had now shown what was the opinion up to 1855, not only of the East India Company, but of all its officers, and yet the regent's claim had been set aside by the Indian Government. If that mode of dealing with native princes was to be tolerated, there was not a native prince in India who held a treaty which was worth the paper on which it was written. Take the case of the Rajah of Putteesala, who had rendered efficient services, and had perhaps saved India to the British Crown. The Rajah died a few months ago, and supposing the Governor General had been a disciple of the Marquess of Dalhousie, he would have written a letter stating that the treaty was a personal one, and that the death of the Rajah put an end to it, and would have seized his property on behalf of the Government. Had the Governor General done so, his conduct would, no doubt, have been severely condemned; and yet it would not have been a whit worse than the behaviour of the Indian Government in the case he had just cited. He was ashamed to be compelled to expose, not only to his fellow countrymen, but to the nations of Europe, the iniquities of that system of administration which so long prevailed under the East India Company, sanctioned by the Government of this country. It was a system of fraud, violence, and spoliation, carried on under the hypocritical mask of honesty and virtue, which for impudence and unscrupulousness was without a parallel or example in history. The day of retribution for the Company came at last. Let the House beware how, by its inattention to Indian questions and its disinclination to discuss Indian affairs, it allowed full scope to a Minister to continue a course similar to that which had been pursued. A day of retribution might again arrive. Even at that time, thousands of people in India were anxiously waiting for the decision of the House on the question. Last Session he presented a petition signed by 15,000 landowners of Madras, praying the House to allow cases to be decided by the Privy Council, a tribunal in which every confidence was placed. It was not only the people, but also the princes, who were waiting for the decision of the House, in order that they might know whether the treaties they held were worth the paper on which they were written; whether the gracious proclamation of Her Majesty was to be regarded as a reality or only as an empty form of words, issued at a time of great public danger, and intended to mislead and deceive; and whether for the future the government was to be conducted on just and honourable principles or like that of the East India Company. He did not call upon the House to decide anything, or to pronounce an opinion as to whether he had given a right interpretation of the treaty, or whether the right interpretation was that given by the Government. All he asked the House to do was to express the opinion, that when such questions arose, they should not be decided by the Minister for India, who was an interested party, but that they should be referred to Her Majesty's Privy Council, whose decision would give satisfaction, because it was admitted by the natives of India to be a fair and just tribunal. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he rose to second the Motion. He did so on the general principle that, for the last twenty years, the treaty engagements entered into with the princes of India had not been carried out faithfully by the British Government. It was of no use denying the fact, for it was notorious; that one of the principal causes of the rebellion of 1857 was the treatment which the native princes of India received from the government of the Marquess of Dalhousie, and the well-founded conviction that not the least reliance was to be placed on the faith, or the honesty, with which treaty engagements would be carried out under the Marquess of Dalhousie. Unfortunately, immediately after his inauguration as Governor General, the Marquess of Dalhousie laid down the preposterous dictum that it was the right of the British Government to take possession of any territory whenever a fitting opportunity should arise; and he constituted himself the judge as to the fitness of any opportunity. He acted upon this dictum consistently and invariably, and it was that policy, as he (Mr. Smollett) believed, which mainly contributed to the rebellion. He would not mention every lawless act, but he would briefly notice some of the prominent cases in which the princes of India were summarily and contemptuously set aside. Shortly after the Marquess of Dalhousie's arrival, in 1848, a "fitting opportunity" occurred. The Rajah of Sattara died, having on his death-bed adopted a son and successor from among his collateral relations; but the Marquess of Dalhousie repudiated the right of any native prince to adopt a son; and the Treaty of 1819, which defined our relations with the state of Sattara, and stipulated that the full sovereignty was vested in the Rajah, his heirs and successors in perpetuity, was set aside. The second case was that of the Rajah of Nagporc, who died childless, in 1853, and who had not adopted a son, probably because he knew the adoption would be set aside by the Governor General; but the Rajah left behind him one or more widows, several relations, and a considerable private fortune. In this case the Marquess of Dalhousie not only annexed the territories, but seized the private possessions, which he confiscated to the State. He seized all the jewels, bijouterie, and valuables, and sent them to Calcutta, where they were brought to the hammer at an auction mart. That act disgusted all the natives of India, and it was an act which was mischievous in itself and disgraceful to the British rule in India. The third case of the non-fulfilment of treaty occurred in the annexation of Oude. There was, in 1856, a reigning sovereign, and there was no chance of any lapse of succession. The state, however, was a large and valuable one, and the Marquess of Dalhousie considered the lax rule of the kingdom a sufficient cause for annexation. There was a treaty with the kingdom of Oude which defined our relations with that kingdom. It had been entered into and acted upon by Lord Auckland, in 1837. It laid down the rule that in all cases of sudden emergency, and if in cases of trouble the British Government should feel it necessary to interfere, they should do so and assume the administration; but the treaty bound the administrators to keep correct account of the revenues for the benefit of the reigning family. When the King referred to the treaty in answer to the demand that he would cede his territories, the Governor General asserted that the treaty was obsolete, and that it had been abrogated, because one of the clauses had been considered to trench too deeply on the rights of the native Royal Family and had been disallowed by the Court of Directors. It so happened that that very treaty had been laid on the tables of the Houses of Lords and Commons by command of Her Majesty, in 1853; and when the fact was stated, the Marquess of Dalhousie replied, that it must have been done through the inadvertence of a clerk. On that pretence the treaty with Oude was set aside, and the country was annexed to the Crown, on the broad ground that the people were sighing for British rule, whereas in the year after the whole country rose as one man to put down the administration which the Marquess of Dalhousie had instituted, and to endeavour to recover their independence. The other cases he would refer to were those of the Rajah of Tanjore and the Nawab of the Carnatic. They were protected princes who had ceded their territories under treaties which bore the same date—1800 or 1801. Both treaties were based on the same principle. The Rajah of Tanjore ceded his dominions on condition that his debts should be paid, and that he should receive one-fifth of the net receipts of his principality; and a similar bargain was made with the Nawab of the Carnatic. In 1855 the Rajah of Tanjore died, leaving behind him several wives and two daughters, but no lineal heirs male. The Marquess of Dalhousie was in Madras at the time, and he gave immediate orders to the Government of Madras to declare the Raj extinct. He would not allow that heirs female came under the words of the treaty—"the Rajah and his heirs and successors." But he did a great deal more than declare the Raj extinct. Under the arrangements of the treaty the Rajah and his family had been receiving £60,000 or £70,000 a year for fifty-five years, and they had acquired a large amount of private property in lands, houses, jewels, &c., valued at £400,000 or £500,000. The Marquess of Dalhousie declared that all these were confiscated, and that the Rajah had no right whatever to private property. The government of Madras sent an officer to take an inventory of the property, with a view to its being sold and the proceeds applied to the public account; but the family had recourse to the protection of the British Law, and obtained an injunction from the Supreme Court of Madras to prevent the sale. The Government of India appealed to the Privy Council, the case was argued in London, and Lord Kingsdown, in giving the decision, stated that the authorities in India had acted in a violent and unjustifiable manner; though, as their agents had proceeded professedly under a treaty, a court of law had no jurisdiction in the matter. Fortified with that decision, Sir Charles Trevelyan proceeded to dispose of the property, but his council luckily interfered; the course of spoliation was stopped; the case was brought before the House of Commons, where the Secretary of State promised that justice should be done to the family, and he had now great pleasure in stating that all the private property of the late Rajah had been returned to its rightful owners. In the case of the Nawab of the Carnatic, the family had received an allowance under the treaty; and three generations passed without any mention being made of the treaty being a personal one. The last possessor of the allowance was a young man who had been our ward from the age of two years, and whose education had been entirely neglected, the allowance having been wasted during his minority. He died childless in 1855; but an uncle of his had been received by us with regal honours at the Government House at Madras for twenty-five years, and recognised as the heir presumptive of his nephew. Notwithstanding, his undoubted claims, the Marquess of Dalhousie set aside the treaty on three grounds. The first was the alleged treason of the great-grandfather and grandfather of the claimant; and the second was that it was a personal treaty, that the last possessor had died without heirs male—for he would not admit that the uncle could succeed to the nephew. The third, and most probably the true reason, was that the late Nawab had been a spendthrift, and had set a bad example to his dependents by the manner in which he got rid of his allowance. On these frivolous pretences, the treaty, which had been observed for fifty-five years, was set aside, and the family turned adrift to starve. It was no wonder, then, that the people in India had come to have no faith whatever in our adherence to treaty obligations, seeing that Governor Generals could arbitrarily set aside successions in this way. He therefore hoped the Motion, if opposed, would be pressed to a division. It might be said that it was of no use closing the stable door when the horse had been stolen, and there was some truth in that; or it might be said that there was no use in referring these questions to the Privy Council, because the treaties were so clear that "he who runs may read;" but there was a want of honesty in men of high position, and it was because he had no confidence in men like the Marquess of Dalhousie when invested with large arbitrary power, because he wished to see such cases as those he had mentioned decided by legal gentlemen who would not be moved by the breath of faction or actuated by political motives, that he had the greatest possible pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire.

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "whereas by a Royal Proclamation addressed to the Native Princes and Peoples of India, published the 1st day of November 1858, it is stated 'That we desire no extension of our present territorial possessions, and while we will permit no aggression upon our Dominions or our Rights to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachment in those of others;' and again, 'We hereby announce to the Native Princes of India, that all Treaties and engagements made with them by or under the authority of the Honourable East India Company are by us accepted, and will be scrupulously maintained;' so, in the opinion of this House, where differences of opinion have arisen with respect to the interpretation of such Treaties, the questions at issue ought to be referred for decision to Her Majesty's Privy Council,"

—instead thereof.

Mr. Smollet

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it was a convenient practice in that House, when a Motion was about to be introduced, that some intimation should be given of the matters which were to be brought under consideration, but certainly by the words of the present Resolution little intimation was afforded him that the hon. Gentleman intended to enter into details relating to the Carnatic from the year 1760 downwards, and still less that he should be called upon to defend, not his own acts, but acts that had been the subject of debate in that House for thirty or forty years past. It was true that the hon. Member had informed him, a short time before he came down to the House, that he should refer to the case of Azeem Jah; but he (Sir C. Wood) had not had time since then to acquaint himself with these former matters, nor did they bear much upon the question they had to discuss, and it would scarcely be expected that he should go into the Sattara and other cases on which the House had, on former occasions, expressed its opinion, and on which he did not think much could be added to what had been said before. But, first, with reference to the general question, what the Queen undertook by Her Proclamation to do was correctly stated in the Motion. The words were—

"That we desire no extension of our present territorial possessions, and while we will permit no aggression upon our dominions, or our rights, to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachment in those of others, and we hereby announce to the Native Princes of India that all treaties and engagements made with them by or under the authority of the Honourable East India Company are by us accepted, and will be scrupulously maintained."

The treaties entered into before the assumption by the Crown of direct authority over India were simply put on the footing of all other treaties made with the Crown, and he apprehended they must be treated precisely in the same way. If, therefore, it was proposed that all treaties—when a question arose regarding their construction—should be submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for interpretation, all he could say was he did not think that would be a convenient or constitutional mode of determining such matters. All treaties must be left to be dealt with, as they now were universally, by other nations as well as our own. The Judicial Committee of Privy Council were not responsible advisers of the Crown in cases of this kind. Ministers referred in such matters, if they thought it necessary, to their Law Officers, and in any particular instance the House might express its opinion on the conduct which the Government pursued. But on all questions arising with other Powers, independent or quasi-independent, the Government must act on their own responsibility, subject to the control of Parliament, and they could not shift that responsibility to the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. He apprehended, then, that on the general ground, the House could not possibly accede to the principle that the interpretation of treaties should be subject to the opinion of that tribunal. He now came to the main case brought forward by the hon. Gentleman. From the observations of the hon. Member it might be supposed that the prince in question was a native ruler exercising rule and authority in some part of India, and that he really had some territories which the Marquess of Dalhousie could have directed to be seized. But the fact was that the Government of India in 1801 took possession of the territories of the Carnatic, and the then Nawab was reduced to the rank of a pensioner at Madras, where he and those placed in a similar situation for the last fifty-five years had resided under superintendence—a mode of life not very advantageous either to the State or to themselves. As to their having the slightest control over any portion of the territory of India, with any single person to govern in any way whatever, it was a total and entire mistake. The House, therefore, might dismiss at once all question of the annexation of territory. There were many reasons why he thought we should not annex native States. It was for our advantage that such States should be left in India. It was undesirable to annex those portions of India which were happy under the native rule of their princes. But there was no sort of similarity between putting an end to native rule over a native State, and the doing away with the very anomalous position of the pensioned princes, whether at Madras or Calcutta; and he frankly avowed that he thought, if that could be fairly done, without injustice or breach of faith, it was desirable to do it. The representatives of the Nawab of the Carnatic were in precisely the same position at Madras as the pensioned princes of Delhi had been at Calcutta. The late King of Delhi was, in some respect, connected with the mutiny and accessory to the murder of many subjects of the Queen at Delhi. For that he was tried and punished with exile, in which he died. Could anybody suppose that it was of the least advantage to that prince, his family, or the State, that he should have lived in a position in which he was exempt from all law, amenable to nothing but his own will and pleasure, with a certain number of dependents around him over whom he exercised a certain power and control? It was notorious that crime of every kind was rife in the palace at Delhi. He did not think the position of the Nawab of the Carnatic at Madras was very much better. Lord Harris in a despatch said he was convinced that a serious moral evil was caused by the continuance of this semblance of the pomp and state of an effete Royalty, which, while it did no good to these persons themselves, was capable of being made the nucleus of intrigue. That opinion was borne out by what occurred not long ago at Delhi, where the name of the Emperor was invoked by the mutineers, and the King, if not actually forced, was, at any rate, led into a participation in their schemes, whereas, if he had been in a different position, merely as a great nobleman with a large income, he might have now been living in peace and prosperity instead of dying in exile. With regard to the treaty to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, the expression he had spoken of referred to a great number of things, to personal property and other matters, but not to the territory or the right to the territory of the Carnatic. It was, he thought, of no use going back further than the year 1801, when we took possession of the Carnatic, and the treaty, which must be the basis of all that could be claimed, was concluded between the Nawab and the Indian Government. The treaty of 1801 was distinctly a personal treaty with the then Prince Azeem alone, and the Indian Government stipulated to provide him for his life with a certain income. The Marquess of Dalhousie distinctly stated that as an indisputable fact. The hon. Member said that in the Sattara case the stipulations were to the heirs and successors for ever. These words were not in the treaty of 1801; nor was their omission unintentional, because the Madras Government at first proposed that there should be some recognition of the hereditary successors, but the Indian Government decidedly refused to consent to it, and the terms were ultimately confined to the life of Azeem-ul-Dowlah. Thus there was no direct or indirect obligation entered into by the Government beyond his life. When he died, in 1819, the Government of Madras or the Government of India determined, as a matter of favour, to put his son in the same position as Azeem had occupied. The Government of Madras thought that a new arrangement was necessary for that purpose—that, the old treaty having expired, a new one should be entered into. But the Indian Government said “No;” and all they required was that the successor of Azeem should conform to the conditions imposed on his predecessor. In 1855 the second prince died, and the question arose whether it was desirable to continue that state of things any longer. He must distinctly say he believed that the existence of these pensioned princes, without power and authority, fancying that they had rights which some day or other they would enjoy, was the most inconvenient state of things, both for the Government and the princes themselves, that could possibly be conceived. And Lord Harris recorded deliberately his opinion that it was desirable to put an end to that state of things, making a liberal provision for the princes. The Marquess of Dalhousie took exactly the same view, not because there was territory to annex, for there was no territory to annex, and he determined to put an end to it. The hon. Gentleman had made an attack on him, as if he had contravened the Queen’s Proclamation. But what had been done took place in 1855, long before he acceded to his present office. Undoubtedly, he had not taken active steps for reversing the state of things which he then found. The Queen’s proclamation was a very wise proclamation, and the pacification of India might be, to a considerable extent, attributable to it. But he did not think that that proclamation called upon him to undo what was done fifty or sixty years ago, and thereby throw everything in India into confusion. He was happy to say that he believed the princes of India were pleased and contented with what had been done for them of late years, and we had now a prospect of tranquillity in India such as had not been enjoyed for many a year back. He might also remark, that as his hon.

Friend took so strong a view of this case, it was strange that something was not done during the time that he was Secretary to the Board of Control. Azeem Jah, the person to whom the hon. Gentleman chiefly alluded, had not been illiberally treated. He was put by Sir Charles Trevelyan in the position of a great Indian nobleman, with an income of £15,000 a year assigned to him. The obligations of the treaty expired in 1819, and whatever had been done since was an act of grace and favour. The Government was under no obligation to do what they had done, and he thought they had made an advantageous arrangement for the State and for the individual. That, however, was not the question before the House, but the question was whether the meaning of treaties was to be determined by the Privy Council, and he sincerely trusted that the House would not take so strange a course as to refer the treaties to the Privy Council.

COLONEL SYKES said, he concurred entirely in the opinion of his hon. Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. H. Baillie) that in all questions of litigated rights an interested party should not have the power of decision, and least of all when one of the parties possessed great political and military power. Unfortunately, however, the reverse had been the case in all our proceedings with the native princes of India. But his hon. Friend having been at the Board of Control, knew perfectly well that the obloquy which was sought to be attached to the East India Company was in nine cases out of ten undeserved. That Company was represented by a Court of Directors who had the initiative and nominally the administrative power, but they were really overruled by another Board which had absolute power to control them, and that Board represented the Government of the day of the country. He agreed that in many cases the East India Company lent themselves to oppression, but he could bear testimony, from a seat in the Direction for nineteen years, that there were multitudes of instances in which they protested in the strongest manner against such cases of oppression as had been brought before the House by the hon. Member. The gravest case of oppression was practised towards the Ameers of Scinde. He raised his voice against the injustice that was done to those princes. If the secret records of the Court could be produced, they would show that there was a very strong protest on the part of the India Company against the appropriation of the territory of Scinde. He might say the same with regard to Sattara, and also with regard to Oude, a transaction which had cast a stigma upon the country. Many of the difficulties had arisen from the utter ignorance of those who overruled the Court of the real relations between the dependent princes and the paramount Power. He had frequently, at the discussions of the Directors of the Company, advocated earnestly that there should be some tribunal provided to arbitrate between those who considered themselves oppressed and those who ruled.

HASLAR HOSPITAL.—EXPLANATION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to state that upon further inquiries he had ascertained that there was no trace at Haslar Hospital of the loathsome disease, which he had referred to the other night as existing among the boys in training for the navy at that Hospital and in the training ships.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £165,322, Admiralty Office.

MR. LINDSAY said, he desired to offer a few remarks in regard to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, in which there was something wrong—perhaps more so than in any other department of the State. Hon. Members might not be aware what a vast machine the Admiralty was; certainly a large proportion of the public were not aware of the gigantic nature of its duties. The Admiralty was by far the greatest ship-builder in the world, and there was evidence that they were the most expensive, if not the most extravagant, ship-builder in the world. They were the greatest buyers of timber and ship stores. They were blacksmiths upon a gigantic scale. They were manufacturers of anchors, and a Committee had decided that the Admiralty anchors were the worst of any. They were constructors of boats and masts, and sails, and blocks, and ropes, and of innumerable other articles. They were great engineers, both civil and military. They were in one sense land-owners, as they had the control and charge of the beds of all navigable rivers. They were great carriers by sea; and during the Crimean war the Department expended no less than £16,000,000 sterling in the transport of troops and stores. The Admiralty were also bakers upon a large scale. They were meat-curers—in fact, they were great provision merchants. They were, at the same time, iron-founders, joiners, builders, and architects. They constructed their own buildings and excavated their own docks. They had the largest shipping office in the world. They were also bankers, for they received deposits from seamen, and paid them by monthly orders to the seamen's wives, relations, and friends. In fact, the Admiralty was a most gigantic department, and therefore it behoved the Committee, before voting the money for its maintenance, to know how it was conducted. It was managed by a First Lord, four Lords who were always naval men, and one Lord who was usually a civilian, and by a Parliamentary and a Permanent Secretary. There were, besides, a Comptroller of the Navy, an Accountant General, a Storekeeper General, a Comptroller of Victualling, and the Director General of the Medical Department. All these were subordinate to the Board, though some of them received a larger remuneration than any member of it, save and except the First Lord. The question was whether such a constitution was best adapted to the management of these various matters. As a man of business he should say not. He had read the evidence taken before the late Committee and also the Royal Commission of 1861, and the conclusion he had arrived at was, that if unfortunately this country should suddenly be thrown into a great war with any European Power, the machine which controlled those great establishments would fall to pieces. Practically there was no one upon whom they could fix responsibility if things went wrong in any particular department. The Admiralty were only known as a Board, and although the duties might be subdivided there, they all knew how shadowy the responsibility of a Board was. There was no great department of the State in this or in any other country in Europe which was governed as the Admiralty was; and after careful consideration and study of the Reports of Committees he threw out as suggestions, whether they ought not to have one head at the Admiralty, just as they had one head for the Colonial, the Home, the War Departments, and for India. That head might be called the Minister of Marine; he should be a Secretary of State, and responsible to that House and to the country. He should have the appointment of six gentlemen—whether civilians or naval men would not matter, provided they were the best men who could be found. The first should be Controller of the Navy, whose duty it would be to superintend everything connected with the construction of ships, with hulls and spars complete. Under him, again, there should be some able men to analyse all the inventions which appeared available. Then would come a Storekeeper General, invested with control over all provisions, stores, and medical comforts. Next would come some person doing the duties of the present Sea Lord, to man the ships. The next officer would be a Director of Engineering and Works, who would be responsible for the construction of docks, &c.; the next would be an Accountant General, who would have the control of the finance and accounts; and, last of all, there would be an officer who should have the control of all matters which did not fall within the scope of the duties of the other five, such as the enforcement of foreshore rights, the protection of navigable rivers, &c. The Secretaries would remain as at present—one Parliamentary and the other Permanent—and they, together with the six members of this Committee or Council, would be subject to the Minister somewhat in the same way in which the members of the Indian Council were now subject to the Secretary of State for India. He would extend the system to the dockyards, the Admiral Superintendents of which had at present no power and no stimulus to induce them to study economy, and would also carry it out with regard to the Estimates. Although the form of the Estimates had been greatly improved since the noble Lord had become Secretary to the Admiralty, it was still far from perfect. Those Estimates were now presented to the Committee under seventeen heads. If his plan was carried out, as there would be six departments of the Admiralty, so there would be six heads of the Estimates, under each of which there would be divisions and subdivisions. The adoption of such a system would, he was sure, increase the control of the House over the Admiralty, and lead to increased economy and efficiency in that branch of the public service, while it would fix the responsibility upon one head.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, that though he must decline to commit himself to details, he could not but agree with the hon. Member that some change in the constitution of the Admiralty was necessary. Since 1828 there had been no fewer than fifteen First Lords, and no fewer than a hundred other changes in the Board. The work of Admiralty reform—like the stone of Sisyphus—was always falling back; or, like the web of Penelope, the Board was always pulling its own work to pieces. They had heard of late much of the discontent and discouragement abroad in the naval service, and he was of opinion that much of that discontent would, on inquiry, be proved to exist. The service required some assurance that equality of appointment and that equality of reward should be shown to all. Let every one see his own way to the admiral's cabin, and let no one feel that he needed anything beyond his own merits to earn honours and distinction. That was the only mode in which to put down the feeling of discontent that unhappily prevailed.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call the noble Lord's attention to the very heavy increase in the item for extra clerks. He would suggest that as many as were necessary should be taken into permanent employment.

MR. WHITE said, he did not think the inquiry he was about to make could be more applicable on any other than on the Vote before the Committee. He wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty to inform the Committee by whose authority her Majesty's gunboats had been handed over to the service of the Emperor of China, and by whose authority stores and supplies of ammunition had also been furnished? If any one was inclined to be captious, he might take the objection that the Estimates were framed on false pretences if a large portion of the expenses voted by the Committee were to be diverted for foreign objects. He thought, therefore, a full and complete explanation was due to the Committee as to the cost of the ammunition and stores supplied. If paid for, they ought to be set on the credit side of the account. A large number of arms had been furnished by the Government of India, which had been paid for by the Chinese Government. He wished to know if the same were the case with the stores and ammunition to which he referred?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The arrangement to which the hon. Member refers was one sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government upon considerations which they deemed sufficient; it being very desirable, with a view to the security of our commerce and the safety of British subjects, that tranquillity should be restored in China. The whole expense of the operations to which the hon. Member refers will be defrayed by the Chinese Government, and will not entail pecuniary liabilities on Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had listened with great attention to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) and he agreed with that hon. Member as to the want of responsibility of the Admiralty; but when the hon. Gentleman said that the country would be indifferent as to who was the head of the Department, he must join issue with him, for he was of opinion that no civilian could possibly perform the duties of head of the Admiralty satisfactorily. Would the hon. Member, whose fleet was one of the great ornaments of the mercantile marine of the country, dream of intrusting its management to any one but a person practically conversant with nautical affairs? A civilian First Lord was incapable of forming an opinion with regard to questions of a technical character, or inventions which might be submitted to him, and hence the country might be deprived, through his incompetence, of some really valuable improvement. He would suggest that the head of the great naval Department of this country should be the best officer that could be obtained, and that his appointment should not be subject to the fluctuations of political caprice in the House of Commons.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that during the last year, he had called attention to the subject of Admiralty management, in the hope that something would be done to give practical effect to the numerous inquiries which had been made, by Commissioners and Committees, during the last few years. He ventured to think that enough had been ascertained to show that it was impossible, with a Board of Admiralty as constituted, to have the work of the country well done. During the thirty years from 1829 to 1859 there had been seventeen First Lords of the Admiralty, and the average time of their term of office was one year ten months and two weeks. During the same period there had been a hundred other changes in the Lords of the Admiralty. Within the last eight years there had been four general changes of the Board—five First Lords and thirty-four other Lords of the Admiralty. Now, he asked, how could any business be properly performed where the Department connected with it was subject to so many changes? From the Dockyard Committee's Report, and other Reports, it appeared to him that there was something rotten in the administration of the Board of Admiralty, and until it was reconstituted he believed it would be ridiculous to expect anything like good order in the Department. He hoped that the noble and gallant Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty would avail himself of the present favourable opportunity to consider the question, with a view to a radical improvement of the system.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the variety of opinions expressed as to the constitution of the Admiralty showed the difficulty of dealing with the subject. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) was in favour of a sort of council, composed of the principal officers, presided over by a responsible Minister. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) objected to a civilian First Lord. Then it was proposed by another hon. Gentleman that the Board of Admiralty should be permanent. But he (Lord Clarence Paget) should like to know, in reference to the Constitution of this country and the control which the House of Commons ought to exercise over the Admiralty, what was to become of that control with a permanent Board. The Board would, practically, be responsible to nobody, and the result, he thought, would soon show itself in a great addition to the expenditure. But his hon. Friend proposed a council consisting of professional officers. Well, that was very much the present constitution of the Board. The First Lord was really responsible. He (Lord Clarence Paget) had watched the action of the Board very narrowly, and he could see no difference, practically, between the responsibility of the First Lord of the Admiralty and that of the Secretary of State for War. He really believed, that if by some good fortune the name of a "Board" were discontinued, and another designation employed, much of the prejudice on the subject would disappear. The Admiralty was not, in practice, a Board. Its affairs were administered by a responsible Minister, with a council of professional officers. No doubt the system had defects, like every other human institution; but he could think of no better means of getting through the mass of complicated business which they had to discharge than that of a body of men sitting round a table, where each member had his own specific function to perform. One of the Sea Lords, for example, had charge of the stores; another was placed over the movements of the ships; a civil Lord had the entire charge of the public works; another Lord was in charge of the manning of the navy; another of the whole of the vast department of armaments and guns. He could assure the Committee that every one of these branches was under the control of a Lord, but the whole business was transacted in concert. Thus, for instance, if the Lord who had the control of the movements of the fleet said, "I am going to send such and such a ship to South America," another says, "I have stores I want to put on board," and thus these gentlemen worked together, and got rid of the confusion which must prevail if people were working in separate rooms, and a combination of result and action was attained. He believed that system was in practice in the War Department, and that it was the custom there to carry on the various branches separately. Such a plan introduced into the Admiralty would lead to immediate confusion; their work was so interlaced, that continual communication with each other amongst the different departments was essential. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) seemed, like other people, to entertain the notion that the Board of Admiralty was an irresponsible Board, and that they were inattentive to their duties; but he felt quite sure, that if the hon. Baronet could see the practical working of the Department, his prejudices against it would vanish and cease. But he would ask, had their plans for the manning of the navy been so unsuccessful? Two or three years ago ships were in harbour six months waiting for a crew, to the opprobrium of the navy. Now, they might be manned in a day.

Sir Morton Peto

Was that a proof of maladministration? Then with regard to iron ships. We were passing through a period of transition, and the Admiralty had been compelled to try various systems; but great progress had been made in the construction of a fleet. These were not proofs of want of energy and inaction on the part of the Admiralty. He should have hoped that the vast reductions which the Admiralty had been enabled to make in the Navy Estimates, without injury to the service, would also have helped to vindicate the Admiralty from the imputation of being inefficient. As to the question of the pay and promotion of officers, did hon. Members suppose, that if the Admiralty consisted of one Minister, there would be no complaints from any branch of the service? That, he thought, would be rather too much to expect. Such matters as those did not depend upon the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. Coming now to the Vote before the House, he would point out to the hon. Member for Lambeth that he was in error in supposing that there had been a large increase of temporary clerks. A change had been made by separating the Director of 'Transports' from the Controller of Victualling's Office, and the increase on one side had been balanced by a decrease on the other. The Admiralty had, however, been obliged, in consequence of the increase of business, to add a first-class clerk in the Secretary's Office. Then, some clerks that had been temporary were made permanent, because when it was found that those clerks had duties to perform that were permanent, it was bad policy to keep them in a temporary position. They had, therefore, put those gentlemen upon the establishment, with a view to their rising in pay and having a claim to superannuation allowance. In the Transport Department they had now got a military officer to sit with the head of that Department, which he thought would be found to work well and economically. He hoped the Committee would now agree to Vote 3.

Mr. LINDSAY thought it objectionable that in the Transport Department there should be now two heads, while the amount of work to be done was the same as before. Last year some hon. Members objected to the sum proposed in the Vote as too large, and therefore there was an apparent reduction of £5,000 to make things look pleasant. But the fact was, certain items had been transferred to other Votes, and, instead of a reduction, there was really an increase of £1,576.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished to impress upon the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty the great importance of concentrating the offices of the Admiralty. The noble Lord had more than once acknowledged the grave character of the difficulties which existed at the present moment. The Admiralty had plenty of time; there was nothing to disturb them; and he trusted the Committee would receive some assurance that during the present year some steps would be taken towards centralization of the offices under one roof, instead of their being divided between Somerset House and Whitehall.

MR. BENTINCK said, that no one paid a more willing tribute than himself to the ability with which the noble Lord had brought forward his Estimates. But as regarded the argument which the noble Lord used in reply to the suggestions made to him, he (Mr. Bentinck) was not disposed to compliment him. The noble Lord said, that the present was not the right time to discuss the subject. Now, that was always the argument used by the occupants of the Ministerial benches whenever they found the subject inconvenient or they wished to avoid it. When his noble and gallant Friend said that a permanent Board would be under no control, he (Mr. Bentinck) must dispute the assertion, because he could not see any reason why a permanent Board should be freer from the control of that House as regarded its expenditure than any other Board. The noble Lord said that the Department, with several heads, was under the control of one first Lord. Now, that was what they complained of. The Department was really under the control of one person who was not responsible. He would remind his noble and gallant Friend of an answer given by the late lamented Sir James Graham when a question was put to him about the administration of the Board of Admiralty. That right hon. Baronet was asked this question—

"If you, while at the head of the Board, had a decided difference of opinion with the naval officers under you, would you hesitate to act upon your own judgment, or defer to that of the other Lords?"

The answer given by Sir James Graham was this—"Unquestionably I should act upon my own opinion." Now, that reply of the late right hon. Baronet showed the inconvenience of the present system, under which a civilian would think himself justified in overruling the opinion of naval men. He hoped, at a future time, his hon. Friend would bring this subject forward again. It was a mistake to suppose that the Board was attacked. It was not the Board but the system that was complained of. The country, willing as it was to contribute any amount of money which might be necessary for the support and maintenance of the naval service, did not, under the present system, get what he called its money's worth. It was a system of wasteful and useless extravagance, and hence arose those occasional bursts of economy which in the end, he believed, led to extravagance.

MR. WHITE said, that the defence of the system of the Admiralty which had been offered by the noble Lord was singularly unfortunate. The noble Lord said, that it was meritorious, because the functions performed by the First Lord of the Admiralty were analogous to those performed by the Secretary for the War Department. Now, he believed that the part of their administration which gave least satisfaction to the House and to the country was the functions performed by the Secretary for the War Department. On more than one occasion, attention had been called to the anomalous connection that subsisted between the Secretary of War and the Horse Guards. The comparatively irresponsible authority of the Horse Guards overrode the authority of the Secretary of War. So persuaded was the House of the fact, that on the Motion of the then Member for Bodmin (Captain Vivian) the House had solemnly resolved that an humble Address should be presented to her Majesty, praying that as the present system gave great dissatisfaction, she would place the Horse Guards under the control of the Secretary at War.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was of opinion that whatever might be the defects in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, there was no lack of zeal on the part of the individuals of whom it was composed—the fact, he believed, being that the illness and absence from that House of one of its Members was attributable to overwork in the discharge of his duties in the Department. It was also believed that the death of Admiral Dundas was caused by overwork.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Bentinck

(2.) £299,695, Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, and Royal Naval Reserve.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to take that occasion to congratulate the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty on the manner in which the Estimates under discussion had been framed. A saving of over a million was effected, as compared with the Estimates of last year, and yet it was the result of no unwise economy. He expressed satisfaction at the statement made by the noble Lord, on Monday evening, to the effect that 17,000 seamen were enrolled on the Naval Reserve, adding that while he was glad to have such evidence of the readiness with which merchant seamen made themselves available for service in the navy, he hoped the Government would not, as a consequence of the success of the scheme, be led to make any hasty reduction in the number of men-of-war's-men. Such a reduction, he contended, would be as imprudent as if the Secretary at War was to diminish the number of Her Majesty's land forces because of the existence of the Volunteers. He was of that opinion, because, notwithstanding that the best class of merchant seamen might be secured for the Naval Reserve, and notwithstanding that they might be most attentive in going through the necessary training, yet no admiral would like, for obvious reasons, to go to sea with a fleet composed solely of such men. There was, he might add, some discrepancy between the official Returns, which gave the number of men on the Naval Reserve list at 15,272, and the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, who had given a higher number; but be that as it might, he thought the noble Lord was over-sanguine in his estimate of the extent to which the Reserve would be available if a sudden emergency were to arise. Commander Brown, late Registrar of Seamen, an officer of great experience, who had been examined before the Commission to inquire into the best mode of manning the navy, had set down the strength of the Reserve required at 20,000; but he was more cautious than the noble Lord, because he did not calculate that more than one-fourth of that number would be forthcoming at a moment's notice. The great merit of the scheme, there could be no doubt, consisted in its capability of furnishing the means to meet a sudden demand upon our resources, and he should, therefore, like to know whether monthly or quarterly returns were required from the various shipping offices giving information as to the whereabouts of the men, so that the noble Lord might be able to lay his hands upon them when he wanted them. He would express his approval of the plan of engaging seamen for continued service in the navy, but there ought to be no hasty and indiscriminate reductions, such as took place at the close of the Crimean war, even on the grounds urged by hon. Members opposite, namely, the strength and efficiency of our Reserves; for it was a breach of faith with the seamen, which could not be repeated with impunity. He should also wish to know, whether the Admiralty contemplated any change in the regulations of the Royal Naval Reserve? As the organization of that valuable force depended on the exertions of the shipping masters, he would also ask whether they, as public servants charged with onerous duties, would have some fixed payment assigned to them proportionate to the important services rendered to the country?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET thought he could give a satisfactory answer in reference to most of the points touched on. With regard to the Royal Naval Reserve, what he stated on the previous night, though he might not have expressed himself clearly, was that from the beginning there had been upwards of 17,000 men enrolled. The number was, of course, diminished by deaths, by desertions (though of the latter there had been very few), and by vacancies arising in various ways; and the present strength of the Naval Reserve amounted to 14,556 men. According to the last Return, it appeared that the number of volunteers available from the coasting trade amounted to 7,213, and that was the number he (Lord Clarence Paget) quoted to the House. Therefore, his hon. Friend would see that the great mass of the men were at home. The Admiralty hoped to be able to enrol at least 18,000 men. His hon. Friend had asked, whether any alterations were about to be made in the regulations? In reply he (Lord Clarence Paget) might state, on the formation of the Reserve, the age had been extended, five years beyond the limit recommended by the Royal Commission; but, now that the body had nearly assumed its necessary strength, it would be desirable to draw back to the former age. [MR. LIDDELL: That will apply to future entries only?] Yes; to future entries only. In reference to the payment of the shipping masters some complaints had been made, and he thought it was well worthy of consideration whether it should not be a fixed payment; but the Government did not intend at present to make any alteration. The Return which the hon. Member had alluded to was a monthly Return.

MR. LYGON asked for an explanation of the increase in the item of cottages built for the Coast-guards.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that there had been a considerable increase in the Coast-guard stations, and new cottages had been built. The increase of the force on shore was from 4,000 last year to 4,300 this year.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he desired to have some explanation respecting the efficiency of the gentleman who had been appointed to succeed Captain Brown as Registrar General of Seamen.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the appointment rested with the Board of Trade, and the Admiralty had nothing to do with it.

MR. LIDDELL observed, that last year £5,000 were voted for subsistence allowances for officers of the Royal Naval Reserve under drill; and though the House was led to believe that the number of these officers was largely increasing every day by accessions from the mercantile marine, yet, under the same head in the present Estimates, only £2,184 were asked for.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that the Admiralty were gradually becoming acquainted with their actual necessities in reference to that portion of the Naval Reserve, and that they had taken for the first year a much larger sum than was requisite.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the Reserve, added to the 76,000 men voted the other night, would give a force exceeding 90,000 men. The question, therefore, was, had they efficient ships which they would dare to send to face an enemy if the country were involved in war into which they could put them. He believed that they had not, and that they had a far greater number of men than they could possibly use in efficient ships. He also thought there ought to be some distinguishing mark upon ships officered and manned by men belonging to the Naval Reserve.

MR. BENTINCK said the hon. Member for Sunderland, when he complained that they had more men than we could possibly employ in ships in case of a war, seemed to forget that in war there was a large expenditure of men. He had been told that some of the owners of large merchant vessels, whose officers and crew were composed almost exclusively of the Royal Navy Reserve, were exceedingly anxious that those vessels should be permitted to carry the blue ensign. He wished to know, whether under proper restrictions, that permission might be given?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, with reference to the question of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), and backed by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), whether ships commanded by officers of the Naval Reserve, and manned to great extent by men of the Naval Reserve, would be allowed to hoist the blue ensign, he (Lord Clarence Paget) would communicate to the Admiralty the wishes of hon. Gentlemen, and he was sure that anything that could be done with propriety in the matter would be done.

MR. LINDSAY said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, who had been appointed in the place of Captain Brown, lately Registrar General of Seamen. He also desired to know, whether any increased remuneration had been given to the shipping-masters for their extra services consequent upon the formation of the Naval Reserve?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that Mr. Mayo had been appointed to succeed Captain Brown, who had retired after long service. He would inquire as to the shipping-masters and let the hon. Gentleman know.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he presumed that the appointment of Mr. Mayo had been made by the right hon. Gentleman himself. He wished to know, whether Captain Brown retired on his own accord, whether he wished to retire, whether he retired on full salary, whether he was entitled to retire on full salary, and whether any hint was given that his retirement would be agreeable? Captain Brown was the first person who held the office, so he could not appeal to any precedent as to the practice of appointing a person conversant with maritime affairs; but he thought the Registrar General of Seamen should be such a person. Was Mr. Mayo conversant with maritime affairs, and what were the antecedents of Mr. Mayo?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he understood that Captain Brown asked to retire. If he had had some little notice, he would have taken care to be furnished with particulars. He was quite sure that it was by Captain Brown's own desire that his retirement came about, and that the cause of it was failing health and conscious inability to discharge the duties. Upon his retirement, Captain Brown had received, on the part of the Admiralty and on the part of the Board of Trade, the fullest acknowledgments of the manner in which, during a long period of years, he had discharged the duties of the office. It was quite true that Captain Brown was the first Registrar, and that he was a naval officer, professionally conversant with maritime affairs. At the outset that knowledge might be of advantage, but the duties were such as could well be performed by a civilian. Mr. Mayo had already performed many important duties in the Board of Trade in connection with the management of the seamen's savings-banks and collecting the effects of deceased seamen. Mr. Mayo had a fair claim to promotion on the vacancy occurring, and in appointing that gentleman he believed the Government had consulted the public interests, at the same time that they did justice to a meritorious public servant.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £71,961, Scientific Departments of the Navy.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to know if the Admiralty would have any objection to publish the results of Captain Denham's exploring expedition to the South Seas? Captain Denham had been away ten years, and had made some most important discoveries.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that Captain Denham had been absent ten years, and had done good service to his country. The charts, surveys, and remarks he had made, particularly with regard to that very intricate part of the world, which hitherto was considered almost impassable—Torres Straits—were of the greatest value. By his great ability, and the zeal and energy of his officers and men, he had succeeded in making a survey which would tend to render the navigation of Torres Straits not more than of ordinary difficulty. The Government were publishing the charts and remarks, which were extremely valuable, but he could not undertake to say that the journals of the voyages would be published at the public expense.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the noble Lord had done no more than justice to Captain Denham in what he had said. Captain Denham had rendered most important services to the country, and he (Sir John Pakington) would have been glad to hear that some substantial mark of the approval of the Admiralty had been given to him.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the right hon. Baronet's intimation should be conveyed to the Admiralty.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that last year a sum of £1,000 was voted for rewards for experiments, and only £300 of that sum had been expended. Out of such a fund as that the services of Captain Denham might be rewarded.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £183,316, Naval Establishments at Home.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed, that if the Government had determined upon building large iron ships of war, it would be better that the work should be offered to competition. In that case there would be a large saving in the number of artificers employed in the dockyards, as wooden ships, for the construction of which they were chiefly employed, were going out of use. In the present Vote, however, he noticed an increase of £6,692, as compared with last year.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the hon. Baronet ought not to suppose that, because they were building iron-cased ships, therefore the wooden ships were to be done away with. Corvettes, sloops, and gunboats must continue to be built of wood till some better material was found, and shipbuilding must go on in the dockyards. There was an increase of £4,000 in this Vote for clerks. That was caused by the changes which the Admiralty were making. Hitherto each naval establishment had had a staff of its own, but they were now going to amalgamate the different staffs, so as to be able to command the services of each clerk at any station they chose, without interfering with the course of promotion.

MR. DALGLISH said, he was glad to hear of the change, and he hoped that all the clerks would be placed under the control of the Accountant General, instead of being under the different departments of the dockyards.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that had been partially done. There was an Audit clerk in each dockyard who represented the Accountant General, and was under his control alone as regarded auditing accounts.

MR. LINDSAY said, he had a suspicion, from the maintenance of such large establishments, that Government were about to build iron ships in their own yards and withdraw them from private contract. If they did this, he warned them that they would have much worse ships, and they would be much more expensive. As to their requiring to build wooden ships, what purpose could they be built for when we had already more wooden ships of twenty guns and upwards than all the world besides? He was not satisfied with the explanation of the noble Lord.

MR. LAIRD said, he was under the impression that stock was not taken in the dockyards; and if so, it was impossible that the accounts could be properly kept. There was an item of £10,000 for Deptford dockyard, though the last time he visited it he found it almost deserted, and only one or two ships building there. It would be wiser to sell Deptford and build all ships where the materials were more easily obtainable.

MR. CHILDERS observed, that there were certain changes in the allowances to Wesleyan chaplains in some of the dockyards. He did not mention the matter by way of disapproval, but he wished to hear from the noble Lord on what principle these allowances were grounded.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the principle upon which these allowances were granted was taken from the army regulations, so that the remuneration for services was regulated by the number of marines attending each service. He would explain the discontinuance of the Wesleyan allowance. This allowance having been followed by demands from other Dissenting Churches, they were obliged to go to the War Office to know the course pursued in regard to the army, which was this:—The War Office considered that there were three national Churches—the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic—and to each of these they made allowances when requisite. The Admirally adopted this scheme. They were very sorry to cease the allowance to their Wesleyan friends, but they could not continue it without extending it to other denominations.

MR. CHILDERS said, it was a new theory that there were three established Churches in this country. If the principle were carried out consistently, something might be said for it. On a question on which religious bodies were so touchy, it was most important to adhere to some rule.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I did not say established Churches—I said national Churches. Perhaps I should rather have said predominant Churches.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, that with regard to the alleged superiority of iron over wood, it appeared the Alabama was built of wood, and therefore it was not so clear that the efficiency of the navy depended altogether on our ships being constructed of iron.

Vote agreed to; as was also—

(5.) £86,870, Naval Establishments Abroad.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,112,878, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Wages to Artificers, Labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's Naval Establishments at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had to complain of the total absence of any information on that important Vote. During the last two years they had spent £15,000,000 in stores and wages alone. Taking wages and stores together, the amount voted last year was, in round numbers, £3,500,000; and yet the Committee was in total ignorance as to how the money was spent. It seemed that about 14,000 workmen were employed, but how, why, or where nobody appeared to know. Such was not the way in which the Committee should be treated, and he hoped the noble Lord would favour them with an explanation.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that every year a detailed statement was laid before the House of the cost of every ship built during the previous twelve months. He regretted that that annual account had not yet been completed for the past year, but it would be produced in a fortnight, and he invited the criticism of the hon. Baronet upon it. Meanwhile, he might state that he believed that by the end of the current year the Admiralty would have built 3-8ths of the iron armour-plated ship the Achilles, 19-8ths of wooden armour-plated ships, 1-8ths of corvettes, 7-8ths of wooden armour-plated sloops, 8-8ths of despatch vessels, and 7-8ths of yachts and other light boats. The annual account next year would show what they had done in the way of repairs during the current year.

MR. LINDSAY said, they appeared to have got very little for their money last year, and he would therefore suggest that the Vote should be delayed until the detailed statement had been laid on the table.

MR. P. W. MARTIN (Rochester) said, that three successive Boards of Admiralty had issued orders in which they endeavoured to impress upon the employés in the dockyards, and the public at large, that they retained no patronage in their hands whatever. A belief still existed, however, that the patronage of the dockyards was largely exercised for political purposes. He would, therefore, suggest that the orders should be converted into an Act of Parliament.

MR. DALGLISH said, it appeared from the statement of the noble Lord that 47-8ths were built by the Admiralty last year. The produce of the year was six ships, and as the wages amounted to £1,147,000, it resulted, after deducting half for repairs, that about £100,000 had been paid per ship for labour alone.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the hon. Member had made out a very neat sum, but he had not allowed a sufficient sum for repairs. Owing to the war in China, and other matters, the Admiralty had been obliged to repair nearly the whole fleet. They were doing, in fact, what should have been done long ago—bringing our ships into a course of repair, which would put the navy in an efficient condition. If his hon. Friend would wait until the accounts of the year were presented to Parliament, he would find that a much larger sum than half the Vote for Wages had been expended on repairs.

MR. LINDSAY: Wait till next year! Does the noble Lord mean to say that over £600,000 were spent in wages for repairs last year?

MR. LAIRD said, it was utterly impossible to understand the accounts in the shape presented to the Committee. If the sum of £600,000 had been expended in one year in repairs, it was time they looked out for another material with which to construct their ships.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in a Report presented to the Admiralty it was stated by Admiral Robinson that the number of seamen and marines voted for the service of the navy told directly on the number of men required in the dockyards. For every man so voted there was an average expense in the dockyards of at least £10 for fitment, refitment, and repairs. That would give a sum of £760,000 for the wages of artificers alone.

MR. LINDSAY said, if the Government had expended £600,000 in repairs, there must be something radically wrong. The country was not getting value in labour for the money expended. It was the duty of the Committee to stop the Estimates until further information was obtained; and therefore he would move that the Chairman do report progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. LAIRD said, the Estimates for artificers' wages and stores for the year amounted to the sum of £4,000,000. Taking £1,500,000 for repairs of the fleet and management, and £230,000 for repairs of the dockyards and machinery, there was left for new ships £2,000,000, which would give 30,000 tons of iron shipping at £70 a ton. He would like to see a correct statement of these outgoings, so that they might arrive at the cost of new ships built in the dockyards.

MR. DALGLISH suggested that it was not desirable to stop the progress of the Estimates. He believed the present Controller was doing everything in his power to establish a proper system; and he arrived at that conclusion from the result of the Devonport election. If the Admiralty were not doing their duty there, the Government candidate would not have been defeated.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY WILLOUHYBY asked, whether there was any manner of distinguishing that class of dockyard business which did not belong to the building and repair of war ships? A large sum was spent on yachts.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET observed, that the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) was acquainted with the endeavours of the Admiralty to put these things on a proper footing. There was an annual account of the expenditure. It was true the Admiralty did not take an annual survey of stores for the purpose of making a balance, because such a proceeding would be attended with enormous expense.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he could assure his noble Friend that he had given the Committee a fair idea of the total want of arrangement which prevailed at the dockyards, when he told them there was no annual valuation of the stores on account of the expense. The firm with which he was connected had a larger stock in hand than the stores of the Board of Admiralty to go over. Some £16,000,000 or £17,000,000 of engagements in every part of the world must entail on the part of his firm some amount of labour in taking stock, and yet they did not shrink from it, because otherwise they would not know their position. There ought to be an accurate statement at the close of every year of the whole of the stock of every kind.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he could not understand why a stock-taking should cost so much money. He supposed the Government had officers competent to the task; and, if so, it might be performed easily as a part of their ordinary duties, and without any expense.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he believed that the officials in the dockyards were at present overworked.

MR. SEELY said, he was anxious that the system of accounts put forward by the Admiralty should be improved; but, from experience, he knew that taking stock was a costly operation; however, its expense, in time, trouble, and money, was fully compensated by the advantage it afforded of knowing how they stood. He believed that stock-taking by the Admiralty would occupy a fortnight or three weeks. Having himself inspected the accounts at Portsmouth last year, he found no double entry practised there, or, at any rate, none was produced. The Committee ought to know what each ship cost for building or repairs, but their present information was most delusive, because it did not show on one side what they got for the money they paid on the other.

MR. LAIRD said, he saw no difficulty, not only in taking stock, but in keeping a correct account of the cost of every ship built or repaired, for he had done it himself in his establishment for thirty years. The men usually got holydays at Christmas, and the operation might be got through in a week or ten days. It was most essential that the Admiralty should know by taking stock, like private firms, what was the first cost, and what the expense of repairs, for every ship.

MR. AYRTON said, that having himself visited a Government dockyard and looked at the accounts, he must say he found the entries to be most carefully and precisely made, showing how each man was employed and every article appropriated.

LORD LOVAINE said, he thought the information which hon. Gentlemen opposite sought might be easily obtained by having duplicate accounts for every separate dockyard.

MR. LINDSAY said, the description of the system of accounts in the dockyards, given by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, certainly did not tally with the report of the Royal Commission.

MR. AYRTON said, he spoke of a period subsequent to that Report.

MR. LINDSAY said, he should be glad to see the accounts which were presented to the House, drawn up so as to show the cost of the labour, the material, &c., of each ship. He was at a loss to know how the Admiralty could balance their books, as they were said to do every year, without taking stock. It would not be necessary to turn over large materials, such as timber, of which a stock account ought always to be kept; but it was all important to have a proper annual balance-sheet.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he thought, if stock were to be taken at all, it must be taken with minute exactitude, otherwise it would be fallacious. It must extend to every article they had in the yards. That was done at present once every three years. The accounts were now kept by double entry under the Accountant General; and the documents which would be placed before the House would give, in a complete form, the expenditure on every ship and every manufactured article in the dockyards. When they had these accounts in as perfect a state as the cash accounts of the navy, it would become a question for consideration whether it would be worth while to take stock annually instead of triennially. The accounts now kept would furnish every particle of information for which hon. Gentlemen asked.

Mr. Laird

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought hon. Members opposite were expecting a little too much. In the Government dockyards the stimulus to care and economy which existed in private establishments, was wanting, and though an alteration of the system might partially remedy that defect, it would not wholly eradicate it.

Original Question put.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £69,957, Wages to Artificers, &c., abroad.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to inquire the cause of the increase in the number of hired men (133) employed in the naval yard of Bermuda.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it arose from the substitution of free for convict labour.

SIR JOHN HAY asked if all the convicts had been withdrawn.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: They have all been withdrawn, I believe.

SIR JOHN HAY: Where have they gone?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I do not know.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,334,051, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Naval Stores for the Building, Repair, and Outfit of the Fleet, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864."

SIR MORTON PETO said, he rose to move that the Vote be reduced by £250,000. He did so on two grounds. The first was that it was not required; and secondly, because the Government had improperly taken that amount from a Vote destined for another purpose. In the year, 1861 the Vote for timber was £995,000, and his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland proposed, and I seconded his Motion, that it should be reduced by £300,000, but did not meet with very extensive support in the Committee. In the year 1862 the amount of the Vote was £560,713, and again his hon. Friend proposed its reduction by £100,000, but did not meet with the support which he had reason to expect. The Government had at present 112,000 loads of timber in the dockyard, which was equivalent to five years' consumption when timber ships only were built. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had given his pledge that no more, or at least very few more, wooden vessels would be constructed; and if that was the case, and with 112,000 loads of timber in hand, was it necessary that they should come and ask for £266,000? But his second reason for proposing the reduction was that the Admiralty had taken the sum of £250,000 from a distinct Vote and appropriated it to the purchase of timber. From the Report of the Committee on Public Accounts, printed in July, 1862, they found that in the early part of the year there had been a somewhat sharp dissension between the Lords of the Treasury and the Board of Admiralty in regard to this sum. The sum of £250,000 had been taken from a Vote for the construction of iron ships, and he asked why the Admiralty had taken that sum and devoted it to the purchase of timber? The auditor objected, but the Admiralty defended themselves, and said they were at liberty to take the sum voted for the construction of iron ships to purchase wood, inasmuch as the sum was taken under the Vote of Stores, and they could devote the sum to any branch of the stores they pleased. If that could be done there was no use of Parliament voting money for separate and distinct purposes; their sitting there was a sham and a farce. They gave Votes of money for the purposes which they thought best for the interests of the country, and he held that the Admiralty had no power, without not only showing marked disrespect to the House, but acting in a most unconstitutional manner, to appropriate any Vote of that House for any other purpose than that for which the House sanctioned it. He must refer to the exact words of the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty, when defending himself in Committee on this matter. He was asked, "In point of fact, did you not apply for the purchase of timber money which was voted by Parliament for the exclusive purpose of building iron ships?" and the noble Duke answered, "Yes I did. I did that on my own responsibility. I considered it a right thing to do. Parliament was not sitting when I bought the whole of that timber. I may have bought some whilst Parliament was sitting, but most of that timber was bought after Parliament was prorogued." When further asked whether it was while Parliament was sitting that he resolved to make the purchase, he answered, "Yes it was." The course which the noble Duke ought to have pursued was to have asked the House to reverse the Vote for building iron ships, and to have asked a quarter of a million for timber. He had given notice to his noble Friend that he would call attention to the subject, and it was but right that he should have a full opportunity of explaining the course which the Admiralty had adopted. He should take the sense of the Committee on the reduction of the Vote by £250,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £266,663, for Timber, Masts, Deals, &c., be reduced by £250,000.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that undoubtedly, on the occasion to which his hon. Friend alluded, the Duke of Somerset did take on himself the responsibility, when great exertions were required, of using every means in his power of procuring timber, and hence the very contracts he now asked the Committee to agree to. He was obliged to tell hon. Gentlemen this, year after year; timber contracts were taken two or three years beforehand. They could not get timber just when they wanted it. If he waited to contract for timber till he came down to the House for a Vote, he would get none. It was necessary to make contracts for timber two or three years in advance. Dantiac timber might be had as it was wanted, but the great bulk of the timber now estimated had been contracted for two or three years ago. On that occasion, when all the world were urging the Government to great exertions in ship-building, and when they were taunted over and over again for not having a sufficient stock of timber, it was the duty of his noble Friend the Duke of Somerset—to order a considerable stock of timber, and that was the reason why they found themselves in so satisfactory a position as regarded the stock of sound timber. He hoped the Committee, notwithstanding the appeal of his hon. Friend, would agree that it was the duty of the Admiralty to take these contracts, in order to procure a suitable supply of that important article.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the noble Lord had not answered the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury—Was the Duke of Somerset to overrule the decisions of that House?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that in order to show how anxious the Duke of Somerset was that the Vote should be brought under the consideration of Parliament in a distinct shape, and that there should be no transfer of a sum given for one purpose to another purpose, he might mention that His Grace had himself divided the Vote into two sections. The object of the division was to prevent the Admiralty from having the power of applying money voted for the first section towards the purposes provided for under the second section.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY remarked that a considerable change had lately taken place in the system of accounts. The House had made an important alteration in the Appropriation Act, which prevented any transfer of money from one Vote to another, and required that any excess should be surrendered to the Treasury. If an emergency arose, the Department could apply to the Treasury for a temporary advance, which must afterwards come under the notice of the House as a distinct Vote. If those regulations were disregarded, the House had the remedy in their own hands.

MR. LAIRD contended that before the Admiralty proceeded further in the construction of iron-plated vessels, the merits of the turret ship ought to be fully tested by experiments; and that if it was found to be superior, it should be adopted. They had two cupola ships building. Let them be tried, and let the ships on Mr. Reed's plan be also pushed on. The Admiralty should act as they did in France, where they did not keep on building all sorts of ships, but proceeded with their iron-coated ones and stopped the others, and thus did not require any larger estimates for the reconstruction of their navy.

MR. SEELY said, he wished to ask whether the Vote was required for timber already bought or to be bought?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: For timber contracted for in 1861.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LINDSAY said, he thought that more information was required. The noble Lord had told them that they must regulate their progress by that of other countries. The noble Lord had also told them that by April of next year this country would have eighteen iron-coated ships. It was desirable to know the tonnage of those vessels, and also what number of iron-plated ships France would have by April of next year. In order to afford the noble Lord an opportunity of giving that information, he would move that the Chairman report progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 74: Majority 61.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished for some information respecting the extent the Admiralty were building wooden ships covered with iron armour, and how far it was their intention to construct such vessels? That was a plan of building, the wisdom of which he very much doubted. They had been accustomed for the last year or two to make comparisons between the progress of the French navy in armour-plated ships and the English navy, and their consolation had been, and he always felt reasonably, that though the French were superior in point of numbers, England had the advantage in point of quality and construction. Now, he believed that one of the principal reasons why they were justified in claiming that advantage over the French ships, ship for ship, was that the majority of the armour-covered ships in England were built of iron, while the majority of the French were of wood. He understood the noble Lord to say, that the Admiralty were beginning to deviate, to some considerable extent, from that plan. They could not expect large wooden ships, carrying an immense amount of armour, to bear the wear and tear of every weather like iron ships. When they considered the large amount of machinery those vessels had to carry, they must see it was desirable that the best mode of construction should be adopted. He believed the best mode was to have iron ships covered with armour, and not wooden ships covered with armour. He begged to ask the noble Lord to explain to what extent they were preparing wooden ships to be covered with armour.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the position of the country was very peculiar. They had now a large and very fine stock of timber, and that to him was a source of unmitigated satisfaction, whatever might be thought by others. Having a very good stock of seasoned timber, the Government proposed, during the coming year, to cut out the frames of five ships. Their forms were not, in truth, yet exactly decided upon, but they would be ships very much like the Royal Oak, though, perhaps, somewhat larger. If it was found that the turret principle succeeded, the frames which were now to be out out would come in for turret ships, as there was no difference between the bottoms of turret and of broad-side ships. The Government also proposed to convert one line-of-battle ship, the Repulse, into a wooden armour-plated ship. Undoubtedly, there were great advantages in iron. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Then, why build of wood?] Because they wanted to build quickly and cheaply. Under all the circumstances, he thought the Admiralty were justified in cutting out those wooden frames.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he thought the Committee must have heard with great surprise the explanation of the noble Lord. It was true that, as far as experience went, it was very desirable between the iron frame and the armour to put a certain thickness of wood as a protection, and to have a wooden sheathing for the support of the copper. But the proposal to convert a certain portion of superfluous timber into frames, which could not be nearly so durable as iron frames would be, was a very extraordinary one. Nor did it follow, because other countries used the inferior article for their ships, that they should use it too, when they were able to use iron, which was so much better.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—No doubt iron-framed ships, covered with a backing of wood and then armour-plated, are, as far as experience has yet gone, on the whole the best, although everybody knows there is a difficulty about the iron bottom, which gets foul unless properly protected. But the Committee will recollect that last year and the year before a great pressure was exercised upon the Government to get an iron-cased fleet equal in number and in power to the iron-cased fleets of other Powers. The Admiralty, therefore, had to get these ships as fast as possible, and it was found that a given number of iron-plated ships could be got ready at a less cost and in less time by making use of the timber which was in store, and by plating wooden ships with iron, than if we had constructed the necessary number of ships of iron. Although the iron ships on the whole are the best, yet what my noble Friend has said is true—that, in comparing your armaments with those of other countries, you must not forget that other countries have cheap wooden ships covered with iron-plating. I believe the French have only one ship, the Cowronne, of iron. The Solferino and Magenta are of wood, armour-plated. Therefore, you are at least on a par with other countries, though if you have the time, and do not mind the additional expense, iron ships are preferable.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed, that he was sorry to say that the explanation of the noble Lord could not be considered satisfactory. It was perfectly true that it was desirable to increase the number of plated ships, and he should have felt grateful to the Government if they had applied wooden ships, which were in progress, for this purpose by having them plated. That, however, did not apply to what they were now told the Government were doing. What the noble Lord said was no justification for commencing de novo to build wooden ships, which it was admitted were inferior to those whose frames were of iron. He thought the course taken was a very serious mistake upon the part of the Admiralty. They had found out this at all events, that iron-framed ships were the best; and this being so, why should they build wooden ships? He was not one of those who thought that, with their extended territory and large commerce, wooden ships would be altogether superseded; but that had nothing to do with the proposition that when they were building plated ships they should build them in the best manner. From the form of the Estimate he was unable to say what portion of the Vote applied to the five ships; but if the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty would inform him upon that matter, he would move to reduce it.

MR. LAIRD said, that Spain, Turkey, Sardinia, Russia, and America were all building iron ships in this country, and in France private establishments were building large iron frigates, to be plated with armour. He did not agree with the noble Lord as to the facility of converting the wooden frames into turret ships; turret ships ought to be planned and built as such. There was an impression abroad that cupola ships could not be made sea-going vessels, but he believed that that was quite an erroneous impression. The Monitor was a totally different thing. She was built merely for coast service. He trusted that the Admiralty would push on the Prince Albert, which was now building, in order that it might be ascertained whether the views of practical men were correct, that we should have to a great extent to adopt these ships; and if the answer were in the affirmative, the country would save a large sum of money in the navy in future.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the reason why the Admiralty had decided upon cutting out these frames was that the wooden frames could be constructed a great deal more rapidly than iron ones. It would take two years at least to build a ship wholly of iron. It took two years and a half to build the Warrior. Another reason why the Admiralty thought it best to build wooden frames and coat them with iron, rather than convert wooden ships into iron-plated ships, was that they had used all the large wooden ships, with few exceptions, and the state of the remainder was not so good as to make it a matter of economy to convert them. Then they had a certain number of a smaller class of ships, but those ships had not flotation sufficient to carry iron plates. They could give them greater floating power, but that would be a costly operation, and, on the whole, it was more advantageous to build wooden frames, giving great capacity to carry these heavy plates. With regard to wooden sheathing, it was found that galvanic action took place, and the iron bottom became full of holes.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the Vote contained an item of £160,000 for armour-plates for wooden ships. Five-sixths of that would be for the plates for these five ships which were to be built, and, in order to take the sense of the Committee, he would move the reduction of the item by £134,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item £160,000, for Iron for Armour Plates for Wooden Ships, be reduced by £134,000.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he did not think that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman was calculated to attain his object. The objection entertained by some Members of the Committee was not to the plating of these vessels, but to the construction of the frames, and their desire was that the ships to be plated should be built of iron instead of wood. The effect of the Amendment, if adopted, would be, that there would be no plates to put upon either wood or iron ships. Old ships covered with armour-plates would not be as good as ships newly framed out of timber for the purpose, because the latter would be constructed on a different principle and would not contain unsound places. What the country wanted was the best ship that could be had. The best ship undoubtedly was an armour-plated iron ship; but it would cost more and take longer in construction, and we were in a hurry. It was quite clear that it would be cheaper to use timber already paid for than to use iron which would have to be paid for. It would take two years and a half to construct iron ships, and even then they would not be able to obtain as many as they required.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the arguments of the noble Lord had not reconciled him to the course taken by the Admiralty. He had no desire to check the progress of armour-covered ships. On the contrary, any wooden vessels, completed or in progress, ought to be armour-plated. But where ships were about to be constructed de novo, they were bound to build them on the best principle in their power, and they certainly ought not to be made of wood. For these reasons he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET explained that the armour-plates, of which the Amendment sought to deprive the Government, had nothing to do with the embryo ships. They were intended for vessels already in existence.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would certainly vote as he had just stated unless he received an assurance from the noble Lord that the five new ships should not be built of wood.

SIR MORTON PETO thought the Committee had reason to complain of the conduct of the Government in the matter. In 1861 the noble Premier came down to the House, and asked a Vote of about £1,000,000 for iron ships; and that Vote the Government had used most improperly in the purchase of timber. In 1862 another large Vote (£600,000) was taken; and when that evening he proposed to reduce the Vote for timber by £250,000, he was told by the Government that the timber was ordered in 1861, and must be paid for. If the Committee failed to treat the question as business men, they might as well vote the Estimates in a lump, and go home to dinner. What the country wanted was not an iron fleet, but an effective iron fleet. There was an item in the Estimates under consideration of £750,000 for wages paid for the repair of the fleet; but if they had an iron fleet, scarcely any repairs would be needed. An iron hull, practically speaking, would only require repairs once in fifty years. The House had resolved that the fleet should be an iron one, and the Government were not justified in disregarding that Resolution, and continuing to build wooden ships. The noble Lord said, the best thing they could do with timber in their possession was to use it; he denied that. They had better let it lie where it was, or sell it.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he hoped the Government would make some concession to the feeling of the House on that point. It was obvious that timber, into which a saw had never been put, could readily be converted to purposes other than the construction of ships. As to the question of time, everybody conversant with the subject knew that iron frames could be rolled in a much shorter time than the most zealous and active shipwright could put together a wooden frame.

MR. LIDDELL said, he would be sorry to see the Government placed in a minority on a question of the kind. Opinions would be reconciled if something like a pledge were given that the five wooden ships would not be built without further consent on the part of the House.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the House had a right to ask for something more than a pledge. The Vote should be withdrawn, and reproduced in a shape which would admit of a definite Vote being taken with regard to these wooden ships.

MR. AYRTON said, that the Vote had nothing to do with the five wooden ships. All that was wanted, was for the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty to withdraw his statement of the intention to build these ships.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he would suggest that the Vote should be postponed. At present the Committee were about to Vote without understanding the subject.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he begged to add his recommendation to the Government to postpone the Vote. At the same time, he would not take it upon himself to dictate to the Admiralty how these ships were to be built.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the Committee had the same object in view as Her Majesty's Government, which was that the country might obtain, at the smallest expense and in the shortest time, an effective fleet able to compete with the fleets with which, under certain circumstances, they might—he trusted at a distant day—have to come in conflict. Let the Committee first examine the course intended to be pursued by the Government, and then the course recommended by his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend proposed to omit from the Vote the cost of the iron plating which it was proposed to provide. He seemed to think that by cutting off that part of the Vote he would open up that part of the question which related to the five ships it was intended to prepare. But he would do no such thing. The Admiralty did not come down to the House for a Vote for armour-plating until the ships were in a state to receive it. In this Estimate the Government did not ask the Committee to vote for armour-plating for ships until they were begun. The iron plating now to be voted was for ships that were ready to receive the armour. He (Viscount Palmerston) did not suppose his hon. Friend, or the House, meant that ships which were now ready to receive the armour-plates should not receive them. That would not be the way to provide the country with an adequate fleet. Whether ships in future were to be built of wood or iron was another question. The right hon. Baronet, he believed, thought it better that old ships should be converted. He (Viscount Palmerston) believed that the present ships had new frames, and his hon. Friend asked that they should be deprived of the armour which they were ready to receive. He thought, that if his hon. Friend saw the actual result of this Amendment, he would not press it. Then came the question of the future. That was a question to arise between the House and the Government. There were three descriptions of armour-plated ships which they had to consider. One was the class of ships with iron skin-plates, backed by teak, upon which the iron armour-plates were fixed, such as the Warrior and Black Prince; and he (Viscount Palmerston) thought it very possible experience would show they were the best. But experience had also shown that they were by far the most costly, and took the longest time to complete. The Warrior, Black Prince, Resist- ance, Revenge, and others were a very long time in building, and experience showed that it was possible to cut out timber and construct wooden ships and put iron upon them in a much shorter time. Therefore, if the Committee wanted, within the shortest period, to equal the number of ships possessed by foreign Powers, they would arrive at the result by pursuing the course the Admiralty were taking with regard to these five ships. Then there was another consideration which the House was not always disposed to keep out of view, the consideration of expense. According to the calculation made by the Admiralty a certain amount of expense only would be required. If, on the other hand, his noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty consented to build these ships of iron instead of wood, as some hon. Members wished, they would cost more money, and his noble Friend would have to come down with an additional Navy Estimate. The Committee must, therefore, consider whether the advantage to be gained by building iron ships was such as to induce them to urge the Government to come down with an increased Naval Estimate. The Government had proposed an economical arrangement, by which the object in view would be gained at an early time and at a moderate cost. The House of Commons had been urgent, during the last two Sessions, in recommending the Government to practice economy. Hon. Members had declared that the cost of the navy was greater than it ought to be, and they were gratified by the reduction of £1,000,000, which the Government had effected in the Navy Estimates. But if the House, instead of the Admiralty providing five ships at an early period and at a cheap rate, insisted on the ships being built at a greater expense, and in a longer time, it was not for the Government to be more economical than the House of Commons. The Government were quite ready to take these views into consideration if they were not permitted to take their own more economical course. But that question was not involved in the Vote now under consideration. There were seven or eight ships ready to be plated with iron; and if the present Amendment were carried, the Committee would only refuse the necessary plates for those ships without accomplishing the prospective object they had in view. He hoped his hon. Friend would not persist in his Motion. Another point that had been raised had been fully answered by the right hon. Baronet. A sum estimated for iron ships was applied to a different purpose, but that was perfectly legitimate and was owing to the difference between an Estimate and a Vote. The Estimate that was submitted to the House showed the different elements of which the aggregate Vote was made up; and when the House resolved upon the aggregate Vote, nothing prevented the Admiralty from applying to one portion of the Vote what was estimated for another. But when the House is asked for a Vote for a specific purpose, it is not competent for the Admiralty to apply the money to a different object. But, with regard to the point now at issue, he begged to say, on the part of the Government, that the question of the relative advantage of iron and wooden ships should be considered, and that the Government would, at a proper time, state to the House, after full consideration, the conclusions at which they should arrive.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not quite understand by the last words of the noble Lord whether the Government would consent to withdraw the Vote, or whether he wished to have it passed on the ground that the point which had been raised did not strictly apply to the item in question, and that the Government would afterwards take the question of the wooden ships into their consideration, and state the result at which they had arrived. But he would warn the House, that if the doctrines which the noble Lord laid down were to pass without protest, the House of Commons would lose all control over the Supplies. They were told that Government intended to proceed in a certain way which many hon. Members on both sides of the House thought objectionable. When hon. Gentlemen were asked to vote a large sum for the Navy Estimates, they were bound to consider whether the money was to be properly applied. Well, they objected to applying it to the putting of armour-plates upon wooden ships. First of all came the Vote for wooden ships, and hon. Members were told they could not diminish it; and next came the Vote for armour-plating, and again they were told that that did not apply to wooden ships. It was absolutely necessary, then, that the House of Commons should make a stand. The House did not wish to refuse the money if they received a pledge that the Government would not proceed with those other wooden ships without the sanction of the House. But if they got no pledge, but had the matter put in such a way as to prevent their expressing any opinion upon it, they would be obliged to stop the Vote until such a pledge should be given by the Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought the best arrangement would be to pass the Vote, and he would pledge himself that no steps should be taken with respect to the five wooden ships in question until the matter had been submitted to the House. The Government would submit a statement to the House showing what would be the cost of the five iron ships, and the time that would be required to complete them, and also the cost of the five ships intended by the Admiralty, and the time when they would be ready, and then the House would be able to judge. But it should be understood that the present Vote had nothing to do with those ships, but was intended for ships already completed.

SIR JOHN HANMER said, he had no objection to the course proposed, but he thought there was no pressing necessity for building our navy in such breathless haste. He had heard the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird) say, that it would be very easy to furnish twenty Alabamas in a very short time and for a very small sum of money. The worst thing they could do, however, was to build inefficient ships. When they remembered what happened in 1814, how English frigates were sent to compete with American vessels of the same name but of greater power, and how British seamen were obliged to haul down their pennons, though their hearts almost broke in doing so, they would see the necessity of taking their time, and when they put a ship upon the sea that it should be one that would be able to maintain the honour of England against any opponent in the world.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he understood the pledge to be this, that no steps should be taken in building those five wooden ships, of which they had heard that night, until a statement had been laid before the House, showing the comparative time and expense of building those ships, or of building iron ships instead, and until the House should have an opportunity of distinctly expressing its opinion upon the subject.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: That is distinctly the pledge I intended to give.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, put, and agreed to.

(9.) £857,349, Steam Machinery, also agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

[BILL 22.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LYGON said, he rose to express a hope that a postponement of the second reading would be agreed to, in consequence of the absence of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) who took great interest in its proposed enactments.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Bill had been in the hands of Members a considerable time, and he did not think the neglect of an hon. Member to be in attendance was a good reason for the proposed postponement.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the preamble confined the Bill to those savings banks which wished to wind up; but the clauses referred to all savings banks in the kingdom, and would affect the regulations of some of the best of the old banks, restraining the transfer of the accounts of minors, unless it were shown to the satisfaction of the directors that there was good reason for the transfers, such as the advancement of the minor, emigration purposes, and so on, which restrictions had been found to act very favourably to the interests of the younger depositors.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if any attempts had been made to discredit the old savings banks by persons over whom the Government had no control, the Government could do no more than regret the circumstance; but, if otherwise, the Government would express a regular official opinion on such conduct in conformity with that expressed by the hon. Baronet. He could not accede to the demand to limit the operation of the Bill to cases of the deposits of minors in savings banks about to wind up. He proposed that minors should be allowed to transfer their accounts backwards and forwards between the old savings banks and the Post Office savings banks, because the principle was laid down that there should be perfect freedom of choice for all persons between one class of banks and another. It was not a question of drawing out the money altogether, but of the transfer of money between establishments sanctioned by law and approved by the policy of the State.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Monday next.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES (METROPOLIS) BILL—[Bill 33.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he would suggest that the Bill should extend to Tuesday, the 10th, as well as Saturday, the 7th of March. It would be a great boon to clerks and persons in that station of life, who desired to make the 10th of March a general holiday.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the reason for the present Bill was, that on the 7th there would be great crowds in the streets, and it had been represented to him that there would be great risk in bankers' clerks going about on that day. The same remark would not apply to the 10th—the marriage day—because, although the day might be observed as a general holiday, there would not be great crowds in the streets. The holiday would be purely a voluntary one, and it was not desirable that Parliament should make it compulsory.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Tomorrow.

MARRIAGES REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MONSELL said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the Registration of Marriages in Ireland. The object was to provide for the registration of marriages which were not at present registered—namely, the marriages of Roman Catholics, and he had no intention to touch the separate question of the Law of Marriage in Ireland. Care was taken in the provisions of the Bill not to make the priests in any way servants of the State, and to adopt the principle of the Scotch law for the registration of Roman Catholic marriages in Scotland. The parties to the marriage would be bound, within three days after its celebration, to send a schedule to the registrar of births and deaths, under a penalty of £10, and the registrar would forward it to the Registrar General.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that as to mixing up the questions of the registration of marriages and the law of marriages, they had the authority of the hon. Member for Dundalk that the two questions were intimately blended together. He trusted some provision would be made to prevent the possibility of forged schedules being sent to the registrar. It was very desirable that some Bill should be passed, and he should be happy to give any assistance in his power. But he hoped some little time would be given for the consideration of the Bill before the second reading.

MR. M'CANN said, he doubted whether the Bill would work at all.

MR. MAGUIRE was sure his hon. Friend would give ample time for the consideration of the Bill before the second reading.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he retained the opinion that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had acted wisely in not including marriages in his Bill for the Registration of Births and Deaths. The great desideratum was to have a register of the bare fact that marriage between certain parties was solemnized on a certain day, without regard to the validity of the marriage. It would be difficult to keep the legal question separate, but he wished the hon. Gentleman every success.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the Registration of Marriages in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONSELL, Lord NAAS, and Mr. HERBERT.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 39.]

MARRIAGES, ETC. (IRELAND) BILL.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Marriages in Ireland, and to extend the provisions of the Act of the twenty-second year of Her Majesty, chapter twenty, to the Consistory Courts of Armagh and Dublin, ordered to be brought in by Sir EDWARD GREGAN, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. LONGFIELD.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 40.]

DISEASES PREVENTION (METROPOLIS) BILL.

Bill to regulate the removal in hired or public Carriages of Persons labouring under infectious Diseases in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Dr. BRADY and Sir FITZROY KELLY.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 41.]

SALMON EXPORTATION BILL.

Bill for prohibiting the Exportation of Salmon at certain times, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRUCE and Sir GEORGE GREY.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 42.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

POLAND—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I have observed that the Minister of the King of Prussia has stated in the Prussian Parliament that the Government of the King has not concluded a Convention with the Emperor of Russia, such as the expressions of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in this House on a former evening could be applicable to. I do not think it necessary to put any question to the noble Earl upon this subject. I remain in the continued belief that the noble Earl had full authority for making the statement which he made in this House, and that it is correct; nor do I think it necessary to take this opportunity to say anything further upon the Polish question. The speech of the noble Earl the other evening satisfied me that the question may be safely left in the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers. I believe that they will in their communications with foreign Powers use language in conformity with the general feeling of this country. And I trust I may add, that if these deplorable events should result in any more serious complications, Her Majesty's Ministers will not hesitate to come at once to Parliament for support.

EARL RUSSELL: With respect to the telegram to which my noble Friend has alluded, I can only say that it does not appear very clear what it was that Count Bismark meant to convey when he contradicted the statement relative to the Convention between Prussia and Russia which

I made to your Lordships. The statement which I made in this House was, that I had spoken to the Russian and Prussian Ambassadors with respect to the rumour that such a Convention existed, and that they said—both of them—certainly the Russian Ambassador—that they were not in possession of the text of the Convention; but I gathered from them that the substance of the Convention was, that in certain cases if the Russian troops should pursue Polish insurgents into the Prussian territory, the Russian troops should be allowed, with arms in their hands, to follow them into the Prussian territory. I believe that that was a correct statement; and I may add that the Russian Ambassador told me that he had no objection to give me the nature of the terms of the Convention. All that I have since learnt goes to show that there is an article, of which I was not aware, which requires that in some way or other the permission of the Prussian authorities shall be obtained before the Russian troops are allowed to enter the Prussian territory; but it does not appear clear whether this permission is to issue from the central Government at Berlin, or whether it is to be given by the local authorities.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: I wish to ask the noble Earl whether he has received any confirmation of the statement that certain Polish students were arrested by the Prussian authorities and handed over to the Russian Government.

EARL RUSSELL: I can only speak upon the authority of local newspapers. I cannot say more than this—that certain persons—Polish students—were arrested in the Prussian territory, and sent across the frontier into Russian Poland; but whether they were handed over to the Russian authorities, or merely put across the frontier, I cannot state.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA—TRANSPORTATION.

ADDRESS FOR A PAPER.

EARL STANHOPE, in rising to move an Address for Copy of a Memorial presented to the Duke of Newcastle by a deputation of Colonists from Western Australia, and of the Answer thereto, said, they had had several short discussions this Session upon the system of tickets of leave, and the treatment of prisoners in gaols; and they were much indebted to his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) for the able manner in which he brought the subject forward, and to the President of the Council for the practical suggestion of a Committee. The Committee was now sitting, and he trusted that good would result from its deliberations. But he contended that, whatever might be their recommendations, the root of the evil could not be reached without a return, with some modifications, to the system of transportation. The subject of penal discipline had been referred to a Royal Commission, and it would be for them to say whether convicts should be sent to colonies which, after a long interval since they formerly received them, might be ready to receive them again, or whether new penal settlements should be founded. But, in the mean while, they should remember that the colony of Western Australia had never ceased to receive our convicts, and only complained that they were not sent with due selection and in sufficient numbers. Their Lordships were entitled to inquire how far the recommendations of the Committee of that House, which sat in 1856, had been carried out; and he desired to know how far the Government were prepared to accede to the prayer of the memorial which had recently been presented by colonists from Western Australia. He first called attention to this subject in the other House twenty-two years ago, when the Government at that time, in which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) was Home Secretary, were abandoning the system of transportation, and resorting to the system of confining criminals in the hulks. It appeared to him that the hulk system was open to every possible objection. In April, 1841, he had carried an Address to the Crown against it by a majority of the House of Commons. The hulk system was, in consequence of that Vote, abandoned; but some years later, and from a train of other circumstances, transportation to New South Wales and to Tasmania came to be abolished. In 1856 he had moved for a Committee of their Lordships' House, which was appointed, and made some special recommendations, to which he hoped their Lordships would direct their attention. It was said, that under the existing system prisoners were not reformed, and that they only waited to be free in order to revert to evil courses. He would concede, if it were necessary, that every convict was desirous to live honestly; but in an overcrowded country like this, where the demand for labour did not equal the supply, there were insuperable difficulties in the way of men obtaining employment in the absence of good character. In the case of women the difficulty was much greater. Every one knew how unforgivingly women regarded those of their own sex who had fallen from the paths of virtue; and a woman released from prison, if she desired to get her living honestly, had but two courses open to her—either she had to assume some name and character which was not her own, or she had to take employment in her own, at the risk of seeing all those who worked with her rise up against her, and declare that they would leave unless she were immediately dismissed. The state of the labour-market in this country was a serious obstacle to persons in this position getting employment. In the colonies, however, the case was very different. There was always a demand for labour there, and it was the recognised system to ask no questions as to anybody's antecedents in the old country. The difficulty of which he had spoken had been so much felt, that at various times numerous institutions had been set up for the purpose of assisting persons released from imprisonment to obtain employment. No sooner, however, had they begun to work well than they were assailed by the cry that they were interfering with honest labour, and were seeking to place convicts in the stations which honest labourers would have filled. There could be no doubt as to the advantage to this country of a well-organized system of transportation. On this point he would cite only the opinion of the late Lord Campbell, who had said that—

“He had passed a good deal of time in continental cities, and had conversed with the most eminent jurists there, and he had found a general concurrence of opinion as to the inestimable advantage enjoyed by this country in having colonies to which to send her convicts.”

But then it was, or should be, a necessary and indispensable condition, that a system so beneficial to the mother country should also be beneficial to the colony in which it was applied. This point was very well stated by his Committee of 1856, which came to this general conclusion—

“That a continuance of the system of transportation to some colony or colonies, with such improvements as experience has suggested or may suggest, would be highly desirable, provided that the system can be carried on with advantage to the colony and with satisfaction to the colonists.”

The colony of Western Australia had always been willing to receive our convicts; in 1855 there were grievous and general complaints of the class of convicts sent out in the ship Nile. Since that time a better system of selection had prevailed. There was, however, stated to be of late one exception to the general discretion of the system on which convicts had been sent out to that colony; and this was a point on which he should be glad to receive some explanation from the noble Duke. Her Majesty's Government had lately decided to break up the convict establishment at Bermuda. That might be a very wise decision; but he understood that the Government had disposed of the convicts by sending them all en masse to Western Australia. If that were so, they had departed from the principle they had hitherto adopted with respect to convicts sent to that colony; for the practice had been to send out selected convicts only. Another point was as to the upset price of land in Western Australia. According to the recommendation of the Committee of 1856 the upset price of land had been reduced from 20s. to 10s. per acre, but there still remained the question whether, as to the gradual payment of that upset price in successive years, the system might not be assimilated to that in the colony of Victoria. On this point also he should be glad to receive some information. The noble Earl then moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of a Memorial presented on the 12th of February 1863 by a Deputation of Colonists from Western Australia to the Duke of Newcastle, and praying for a more extended System of Transportation to that Colony: Also, "Copy of any Answer to the same."

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he was sure his noble Friend did not expect that on this occasion he should enter into either the general question of the best system of punishment for offenders, or that of the comparative merits of imprisonment at home and transportation to the colonies. These questions were before two bodies at the present time—a Committee of their Lordships' House and a Royal Commission. Their Lordships would feel that it would be unbecoming in him, as a Member of the Government, to prejudice either of these questions after gentlemen of station, position, ability, and knowledge of the subjects, had consented to give much time to the investigation of the important problem of the treatment of our convicts. But before he proceeded to the subject of Western Australia, he wished to undeceive his noble Friend as to the circumstances connected with the transfer of convicts from Bermuda to Western Australia. Three years ago a discussion was raised in reference to the prisons of Bermuda. After full consideration of the whole question the Government came to the conclusion that it would be desirable to diminish the number of convicts sent there, and ultimately to abandon the practice of sending convicts to that island. This was a most important element in the consideration of the question—that transportation to Bermuda was not like transportation to Western Australia—Bermuda was nothing but a colonial prison. But under the system adopted several years ago the number of prisoners available for removal from this country had been greatly diminished, and the Government had to consider which of three places—Western Australia, Gibraltar, or Bermuda—they would abandon as a place for convicts under sentence of transportation. Bermuda appeared to them to be the least desirable place of the three, on the grounds of climate and facilities for enforcing discipline; and, in addition to these considerations, the fortifications and other works on which convicts had been employed there were nearly finished. It was therefore determined that the establishment there should be abandoned, and that such of its inmates as had not completed their period of punishment should be removed to Western Australia. His noble Friend, however, seemed to be mistaken as to the number of convicts so sent to the latter colony. The fact was, they only amounted to one shipload; and though there was no selection, the convicts at Bermuda, when the removal took place, were by no means of that extremely bad class which his noble Friend was led to suppose. The sending away of those convicts was hastened somewhat by the fact that the colonists of Western Australia were asking for more convict labour. In sending out convicts from this country, though some care was taken, it was impossible under existing circumstances to be so careful as to avoid sending out some very bad cases. Of the convicts sent to Western Australia in 1860 15 had been convicted of murder, 23 of manslaughter, 29 of assaults with intent to murder, 95 of robbery with violence—garotters and others of that very class respecting whom there had been so much discussion of late—31 of robbery without violence, and 16 of cutting and wounding. His noble Friend seemed to think that it would be advisable to adopt the regulations respecting land introduced in the colony of Victoria; but if he had made inquiries from persons who had had experience of that system, he would have found that the changes lately made in Victoria had not proved so successful as they were expected to be, and a wish was now expressed that they had never been adopted. At any rate, it would not be prudent to introduce such a change in the colony in question without more consideration than the subject had yet received. With regard to the cost of conveying the families of convicts to the colony, a change had been made in the repayment of this cost, and with good effects. He did not think it would be desirable to charge such an outlay upon the parishes to which these families belonged, because it was not for the sake of the parishes that they were sent out, but for the sake of morality and good order in the colony; and the Government, therefore, thought it right that that expense should be defrayed out of the Imperial Exchequer. In order to counterbalance the convict element in Western Australia, it was necessary to carry out a system of free emigration; and therefore while the number of convicts sent there during the last eleven years was 7,000, there had been a simultaneous introduction within the same period of 7,300 free labourers. It was necessary to take care not to overdo transportation in Western Australia, and this was one of the chief dangers to the continuance of the system. It was this overbalancing the free by the convict class that led to the outcry in Tasmania, and the ultimate abolition of transportation thither; and if the same system were pursued in Western Australia, precisely the same results would ensue. He could not agree with his noble Friend that the time for action had arrived, for he thought they ought to wait for the Report of the Commission; and even then it would be requisite to proceed with caution, in order that the danger he had alluded to should be avoided, and that the fears entertained by other Australian Colonies should be dispelled. As regarded the memorial lately presented to him, he should, of course, have no objection to lay it upon the table, as indeed it appeared in The Times on the day after its presentation. As his answer to this memorial was not in writing, having been made verbally to the deputation, he could not produce it; but the substance of the answer was, that although Her Majesty's Government desired to do all that they could to continue and improve the present system of transportation, he could give no pledge on the subject until the Report of the Commission was forthcoming; pending which time it was not the intention of the Government to make any important alteration.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES'
ANNUITIES BILL—[No. 24.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to move the second reading of this Bill. In consequence of the manner in which the announcement of the Prince's marriage was received by your Lordships the other evening, I venture to anticipate that the provisions of this Bill will prove very satisfactory to your Lordships. What has passed in another place, and the feeling shown by the public, has tended to confirm that anticipation. It is hardly necessary in your Lordships' House to advert to the general topics which make your Lordships desire to give to the Prince of Wales an annuity suitable to the dignity of the Heir to the Crown. I believe there never was a country which has had so much reason to rejoice in the form of monarchical Government which has existed in this country; and it is not merely a sentimental or traditionary feeling, but is founded on what we do feel—namely, affectionate loyalty to the Sovereign on the Throne, and a desire to honour her in every possible way. In the last century, in 1715 and 1745, Parliament granted to the Prince of Wales, exclusive of the revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall, £100,000 a year. In 1795 a larger income, under peculiar circumstances, was given, amounting to £138,000; but a portion was applied to the payment of debts unfortunately contracted before by the Prince of Wales. In 1806 those debts were paid, and the Prince of Wales came into the receipt of the whole income. When your Lordships consider the different value of money, and the fact that many of your Lordships possess larger incomes, it is quite clear that the proposed provision is not immoderate. After careful examination, it appears that the net income of the Duchy of Cornwall is £60,000 a year. By this Bill it is proposed to add £40,000 a year. It is further proposed to grant £10,000 a year to the Princess of Wales as a personal annuity, and to grant her a dower in case of the decease of her husband of £30,000 a year. I believe that the Bill will meet with the cordial assent of your Lordships, and I beg to move that it be now read a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER, who had given notice—

"To move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her Assent to the Sixteen Ordinances framed by the Durham University Commissioners, on the 13th of June 1862, for the Government and Administration of that University," said, he felt himself in a position of great difficulty, because the observations he should feel called upon to make, would seem to demand an answer which their Lordships could not give or understand, unless they had read the Ordinances, and made themselves masters of the whole subject. The right rev. Prelate, whose name stood first in the Commission (the Bishop of Durham), and who would probably think it his duty to reply on behalf of his brother Commissioners, was absent, not having had notice of his Motion; and he (the Bishop of Exeter) should be most unwilling to proceed in his right rev. Brother's absence. This, however, was the last day on which the question could be brought forward within the forty days limited by the statute; and he wished to know, therefore, whether, if the matter were now postponed, the Government would give further time for the consideration of the subject, as though it had been discussed within the forty days specified? The right rev. Prelate then formally made his Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was impossible that the Government could agree to the Motion, the effect of which, if carried, would be to render absolutely null and void the Ordinances agreed upon eight months since by the Commission, which was now extinct. That Commission was appointed, not by the Government, but by the Act of Parliament — which received the assent of the Legislature. The Commissioners were named in the Act, including the Bishop of Durham, the late master of Harrow, Dr. Vaughan, and four Members of the other House of Parliament selected from either side of the House. He had been told that the recommendations of the Commissioners were unanimously adopted. There could be no difficulty in raising the question as to these Ordinances, because by the Act it was expressly provided that any person connected with the University might appeal to the Privy Council. It was also provided that the Ordinances should be laid before Parliament for forty days, and upon an Address from either House within that time they should at once fall to the ground. The right rev. Prelate on the previous evening had questioned the legality of including within the prescribed period of forty days the sixteen days of last Session during which the Ordinances were upon the table of Parliament; but the Law Officers of the Crown had given an opinion upon the point which was quite in accordance with the view stated by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. The Government were required by the Act to lay the Ordinances at once before Parliament; and there was no hardship in reckoning the sixteen days of last Session, because the public had had the advantage of considering the Ordinances during the whole of the recess. Upon the first day of the Session an hon. Member of the other House connected with the county of Durham asked a question, which was answered; but no further steps were taken. As he might be called upon to act in this matter, as presiding over the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he did not wish to form or to express any preconceived opinion. The right rev. Prelate asked, whether, Parliament having by its silence given its consent to these Ordinances, if at any future time a Motion upon the subject should be made, the Government would be influenced by the views of the majority. Their Lordships must exercise their veto now or never. Of course, if Parliament at any time expressed a distinct opinion upon the subject, it would be the duty of the Government to give it a careful consideration; but he could not take upon himself to say what would be the course of Government without knowing what arguments would be used in the course of debate. It was with reluctance that he found himself unable to answer the appeal of the right rev. Prelate in the affirmative; but their Lordships must exercise their veto now or never, and he trusted they would not take the strong step of rejecting the Ordinances without knowing anything of the facts.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he thought the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had in some degree misapprehended the appeal made to him by the right rev. Prelate. He heard with surprise portions of the reasons why the noble Earl could not comply with that request; for, as he understood them, they were opposed to the general views entertained by the noble Earl. The noble Earl said it was impossible to comply with the request which had been made, because the Motion, if successful, would overthrow the whole of the labours of the Royal Commission and their recommendations. Of course, the result would be that the Ordinances would become null, and therefore the labours of the Commission would be rendered useless; but if it was not intended to give Parliament the power to exercise such a veto, what was the object of allowing the forty days within which Parliament should have the power of moving an Address for the rejection of the whole or part of the Ordinances? This power would be quite useless if they were to be told that they could not agree to such a Motion because the Commissioners had unanimously agreed to those Ordinances. When the noble Earl said that Parliament ought not to decide this question without being acquainted with the merits of the case, he (the Earl of Derby) quite concurred with him; but they were not, as the right rev. Prelate rightly observed, in a position to discuss Ordinances which were only placed in their Lordships' hands that morning. Without expressing any opinion as to the construction of the term of forty days, he would remind the noble Earl that the mere laying papers on the table without calling attention to them and without printing them, was no notice at all. It would have been much more convenient if at that time the Motion for their being printed had been made, and then the Members of both Houses would have had them during the six months' recess. The noble Earl was mistaken in the representation which he gave of what occurred in the other House. He said that at a very early period of the Session a question was asked by an hon. Member nearly connected with Durham; that having received an answer, he took no further steps; and that therefore it was to be assumed that it was not then thought convenient to discuss the question in the presence of four Members of the Commission. That is not a correct representation. The fact was, the hon. Gentleman asked the question as to those Ordinances, and followed it up by a question asking the Government to allow the evidence taken before the Commission to be printed, so that the House might form a better judgment on the merits of the case. Was that refused? Certainly not; it was assented to, the Government acknowledging the reasonableness of Parliament having the evidence before them, and they promised to lay that evidence before the House; but it had not yet been printed, so that all the cause of the delay was not attributable to those who questioned the excellence of these Ordinances. The question of the right rev. Prelate was simply whether the Government would undertake not to decide, notwithstanding the expiration of the forty days, to recommend Her Majesty to give Her sanction to these Ordinances. He was aware that if Her Majesty confirmed these Ordinances Parliament had no longer any power to overthrow the whole or part of them; but he was fully convinced, though their legal power might have ceased to exist, that any Address to the Crown from either House of Parliament would not be treated by Her Majesty's Government or any other servants of the Crown, who knew their duty to it and the country, with indifference. He thought the request of the right rev. Prelate a most reasonable one, and one which should be acceded to; more particularly when they remembered that there was a petition on this subject before the Privy Council, and that the Crown could not give its assent till that petition was disposed of. He did not therefore think they were asking much in requesting that the Royal Assent should be withheld until they had an opportunity of acquainting themselves with the facts and discussing the question. He begged to call their Lordships' attention to what the circumstances were under which this Motion was made. The right rev. Prelate who made this appeal was, he believed, the sole survivor of the original founders of that institution, which was now about to be remodelled. Thirty years had not yet elapsed since its original foundation, and some of the donors to that foundation were still living. The right rev. Prelate was a member of the Chapter when the foundation took place; and he must say that a very strong case was necessary in order to justify them in overriding the intentions of the founders within a period of thirty years, and in the lifetime of the donors to divert to purposes wholly alien the funds they had subscribed. He would mention one case:—A lady was still living who had founded a fellowship and a scholarship; the fellowship was, he believed, of £100 a year, for ten years; but the amount of the scholarship he had forgotten. These were by the Ordinances to be thrown into the common fund, and during the lifetime of this lady a scheme had been proposed by which the funds were to be diverted from the purposes she had intended. The Commissioners, however, had had the kindness to assure her, as a matter of grace and favour, that no alteration should be made during her lifetime; but the moment of her death, her intentions were to be wholly disregarded. He would not enter into the merits of this question, his only object being to show that the application of the right rev. Prelate to have these Ordinances discussed was not an unreasonable one; while, on the other hand, there seemed something gratuitous in the noble Earl's refusal.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought the noble Earl opposite had stated this question rather unfairly. He (Earl Granville) had already stated, and he was ready to repeat, that not only on this question, but on all others, it became the duty of the Government, after the lapse of the specified period, and in absence of any Address in either House of Parliament, to advise Her Majesty to give effect to the Ordinances which had been issued. The Government were prepared to give the most respectful consideration to any decision of their Lordships' House—but the noble Earl asked them to go beyond the period limited by Act of Parliament. He could not help saying that would be making a most dangerous precedent. A certain time was given by Act of Parliament during which either House might interpose; it was perfectly clear that all parties were cognizant of the Ordinances for seven months; and it would be unwise in such a case for Government to exceed the limit prescribed by Parliament. But beyond this the question was really a most useless one; for the noble Earl had proved that practically the matter was in the hands of the Dean and Chapter of Durham, because until every one of the petitions before the Privy Council had been withdrawn, or had been discussed, it would be utterly impossible for the Government to advise the Queen to give her sanction to these Ordinances. Both the question and answer therefore appeared to him the most delusive that could well be proposed.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had said very truly that it was no surprise upon him (the Bishop of Exeter) that the consideration of these Ordinances was to take place before the Privy Council. But he had never professed to be surprised at all. He had only wanted that their Lordships should have an opportunity of exercising their constitutional power when they should be properly informed of the merits of the case. He must, however, be permitted to say that these measures which delegated Parliamentary powers to Commissioners seemed to him, who was an old-fashioned fellow, to require very cautious consideration. He would say that he did not think that he was speaking in an unconstitutional spirit when he said that they demanded a special jealousy. A Commission was issued, and the Commissioners were to make inquiries, and upon these inquiries to make Ordinances, which Ordinances were to obtain the absolute stringency of law unless Parliament assumed its power in proper time of addressing the Crown to withhold its sanction.

THE EARL OF DERBY, interposing, said, that the Ordinances would not have the force of law if simply Parliament did not interpose. If Parliament did not interpose, it would then be lawful for the Crown to give or withhold its sanction.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER thanked the noble Earl for correcting him. The Crown was permitted, in the event of Parliament not interfering, to legislate without the co-operation of Parliament. He had no fear of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) exercising any such power unconstitutionally or unfairly, but they were bound to look to possibilities when the prerogative and the interests of the people were concerned; and it seemed to him that they were also bound to be extremely cautious in suffering power to be given to the Crown to issue Commissions which were to frame ordinances and to exercise corresponding powers. The noble Earl said there would be an opportunity for them to take cognizance of this matter. But had their Lordships at present had time to do so? The other House of Parliament was interested, and the whole country was interested; and yet, he would ask, did the country or even their Lordships know anything about the matter? These Ordinances had only been put into their hands that morning, and beyond himself, he did not believe that any other Member of their Lordships' House had previously been in possession of them. As far as that House was concerned, they had not had the evidence printed, and therefore it had been kept from the knowledge of their Lordships. He agreed that it would be unfair to the right rev. Prelate who was upon the Commission (the Bishop of Durham) to discuss this question in his absence, especially as he was the only Member of the Commission who was in their Lordships' House, and he therefore felt that it would be much better to leave the discussion to take its course before the Privy Council than at present to induce their Lordships to come to a vote upon the subject. He would, therefore, not press his Motion.

THE EARL OF DERBY hoped that the noble Earl would not object to lay upon the table the evidence taken before the Commission, and which had been laid upon the table of the other House.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

COMMERCIAL TREATY BETWEEN FRANCE AND ITALY.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office has in its possession a Copy of the Commercial Treaty between France and Italy now waiting ratification by the Italian Parliament, and also a Copy of the new Italian Tariff; if so, whether he is prepared to lay these documents upon the table of the House; and, if not, whether he is aware that several days ago these documents were laid upon the table of the Italian Chambers by the Italian Minister?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, the Commercial Treaty between France and Italy, as soon as it was ratified by the Italian Chambers, would be communicated to Her Majesty's Government, and by them be laid before Parliament at the earliest practicable moment. Her Majesty's Government had recently received a confidential communication with regard to the Treaty, but it was not of a nature which could be communicated to the House.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he must remind his hon. Friend that he had not answered the latter part of the Question.

MR. LAYARD said, there was no doubt that the Treaty had lain for some days on the table of the Italian Chamber, awaiting ratification.

CONVICT ESTABLISHMENT AT BERMUDA.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the Convict Establishment at Bermuda has been broken up, and where the convicts have been sent to?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would refer to the Report of the Select Committee on Transportation, he would find all the reasons stated in detail which induced the Government to think that the establishment ought to be broken up. Since the early part of 1859 no convicts had been sent to Bermuda. Between 200 and 300 were conveyed last year from Bermuda to Western Australia; and at present the number was so small that in the course of the present spring the establishment would be wholly discontinued.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. REED.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped that both for the public interest and for the satisfaction of the House, the question which had been twice raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith) would now receive an answer. He wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he can inform the House that Mr. Reed, previous to his employment by the present Board of Admiralty, had ever drawn the lines, or prepared the models, or superintended the construction, of any man-of-war or other ship? In putting that Question it would be understood that he referred to the models of ships which had actually been built and completed.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: As Mr. Reed is just about to appear before the House, I hope it may be thought better that I should defer answering that Question.

ARRANGEMENTS AT THE RECENT LEVEE.—QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, in the absence of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Sturt), he hoped an answer would be given to the Question put to the Government on the previous day respecting the crowding at the Levee on Wednesday last.

SIR GEORGE GREY: When the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dorsetshire put his Question yesterday, I had no notice of it. He has since told me that he had given notice to a member of the Household of his intention to put his Question; but at the time I knew none of the facts. In consequence of that Question, I wrote to the Lord Chamberlain for information on the subject. He has informed me that the Levee of Wednesday must be considered an exceptional one. No less than 3,000 gentlemen attended, and the accommodation ordinarily available on such occasions is not calculated for more than 1,500; but he adds that a large room, where seats are placed for the accommodation of ladies attending Drawing-rooms, was thrown open, and efforts were made to induce gentlemen to wait there till their turn came for presentation. But I believe that in their anxiety to reach the presence of the Prince of Wales they all pressed forward towards the Throne-room. The Lord Chamberlain assures me that every effort will be made on future occasions to prevent the disorder which then prevailed, and I only hope gentlemen attending these Levees will endeavour to co-operate with the Lord Chamberlain and his officers in effecting their object.

RECEPTION OF THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT CLIFTON said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is any truth in the statement in The Times of yesterday, that he has written to the authorities of the City as to changing the ceremonial upon the reception of the Princess Alexandra?

SIR GEORGE GREY:—No, Sir; I have not given any instructions for changing any ceremonial that I was informed had been adopted for the reception of Her Royal Highness in this country. But I will state what has taken place. My endeavour has been, acting in obedience to Her Majesty's commands, and in concert with those whose duty it is to take a share in making arrangements for the reception of Her Royal Highness, that those arrangements should be such as best to gratify the very general and laudable desire to do honour to Her Royal Highness on her arrival. Some time ago, I informed the Lord Mayor that the Princess Alexandra, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and her Royal parents, the Prince and Princess of Denmark, would drive through the City of London and the metropolis, en route from Gravesend to Windsor Castle. I may state that this is not intended to be what is technically called a State Procession; Her Royal Highness and suite will drive from the railway station in six open Royal carriages, if the weather should fortunately permit, attended by an escort of Life Guards. When this became known, a very general desire was evinced, not only by the authorities of the City of London—who are always prominent in every loyal demonstration—but by the local authorities of other parts of the metropolis through which the route will lie, to take a part in the demonstration which would express their loyal attachment to the Throne, and their desire to do honour to the Princess. With this view, it was proposed that the civic and municipal authorities through whose respective jurisdictions Her Royal Highness will pass, should, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions, be allowed the fullest opportunity of co-operating in the proceedings of the day. In consequence of a request urged upon me by a deputation from the Borough of Southwark, it has been arranged that the High Bailiff of Southwark, attended, as I have no doubt he will be, by the two representatives of that borough, and by some other official persons, should be present on the arrival of the Princess Alexandra at the Bricklayers' Arms station of the South Eastern Railway, which lies within the precincts of the borough of Southwark. The Lord Mayor having expressed a wish that he and the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex should also be present at the station, that wish was at once acceded to, subject only to the condition that the long line of carriages that it is understood will convey the other authorities of the City, and the representatives of the different London Companies, should not join at the station, which is beyond the municipal boundary, but should meet the Royal carriages at the limits of their jurisdiction at London Bridge, and should accompany them throughout the whole line of the City to its western extremity at Temple Bar. It is also proposed, in consequence of another request, which it seemed only reasonable to grant, that the Court of Burgesses of the City of Westminster—headed, as I am informed, by the Duke of Buccleuch, the High Steward of the borough, and accompanied by the Dean and other dignitaries, should take the place of the City authorities at this point, and attend Her Royal Highness during that further portion of her route which lies within their jurisdiction. In compliance with other applications, the carriages of a limited number of representatives of the different parishes through which the Royal procession will pass, will be afforded the opportunity of taking part in this loyal demonstration. A difficulty, no doubt, arose in consequence of the wish of the civic authorities not to stop when they reached the western limits of the City at Temple Bar. On the other hand, if they are suffered, with a long line of carriages, to precede the Royal Procession throughout the western portion of the route, there must be a material interference with other authorities beyond the City limits, who had an equal desire and an equal right to take part in the proceedings of the day. It has, however, been intimated to the Lord Mayor by the Lord Chamberlain, that provided arrangements can be made—and no doubt they will be made, if all parties heartily concur—whereby on their arrival at the western confines of the City the metropolitan authorities, having led the way so far, give place to the other authorities, who will then take up the procession at that point, no interference at all will be made with the order in which the civic dignitaries may wish to follow. I believe, under these circumstances, the arrangements will be such as not only to secure to the inhabitants of the metropolis generally the best opportunity of witnessing and welcoming the arrival of the Princess in London, but will also give to all parties concerned, without favour or partiality, the full advantage of sharing in the proceedings of the day, which I trust will be as gratifying to the Princess Alexandra as I am sure they will be to all the loyal subjects of Her Majesty in the metropolis.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked whether the City authorities would be allowed to go beyond Temple Bar?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Not as preceding the procession. I should state that an application was made on the part of the Sheriffs of London, who are also Sheriffs of Middlesex and have jurisdiction beyond the City, to continue in their place in the procession, and their request has been acceded to.

MR. LOCKE said, unfortunately he was not in the House when the right hon. Baronet made his statement. He wished clearly to understand what would be the position of the Borough he had the honour to represent relatively to the authorities of the City of London, and with regard to what the City of London is to do there.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I thought I had already sufficiently explained that the High Bailiff of Southwark, attended by some of the authorities of that Borough, and I believe by my hon. and learned Friend who has just sat down, and his colleague, will be in attendance within the station at the Bricklayers' Arms, there to receive Her Royal Highness. The details are, of course, to be arranged with the Directors, but full information will be given them; and I believe a number of carriages, not to exceed six in the whole, will accompany the Royal carriages as far as London Bridge. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, having been present on the arrival of Royal personages at that station on previous occasions, will also be permitted to attend. I do not know whether the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs claim to have any jurisdiction in Southwark; but, I believe, they appoint the High Bailiff of Southwark, and as their claim to be present has been conceded in former instances, I have thought there could be no objection to their being in attendance at the station on the arrival of the Princess. The same permission has been given to the Lord Lieutenant of Surrey and the Representatives of that county.

MR. LOCKE: The question of precedence does not appear to have been settled. It is not stated whether the Borough of Southwark is to lead the cavalcade to the bridge.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I have no doubt I shall be able to satisfy my hon. and learned Friend if he will communicate with me out of the House.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.—ATTENDANCE OF MR. REED.

Order for the attendance of Mr. E. J. Reed read,—And the House being informed that Mr. Reed attended accordingly, he was called in; and, having acknowledged that he had addressed the Letter complained of to Sir Frederic Smith, a Member of this House, Mr. Speaker acquainted him that his Letter had been adjudged to be a breach of the privileges of this House, and asked if he had any explanations to offer in respect of that Letter.

MR. REED: Sir, I was not aware that I was committing a breach of the privileges of this House when I wrote that letter, or I certainly should never have written it. Finding now that I have committed an offence, I beg to tender to the House the most ample apology that I can offer, and I beg the pardon of the House for having offended against its rules. To the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham I beg to tender a double apology—in the first place, for having written any letter at all to him concerning remarks made by him in this House; and, secondly, for having employed in the letter I did write phrases, I confess, of great impropriety. I am quite confident now that I wrote that letter under great irritation; that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was entirely misunderstood by me on Monday evening, and that he did not intend to do me any injustice. I hope, Sir, that this apology will be deemed satisfactory by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and the more so as I have a very deep sense of the estimation in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman is held by the public, by this House, and by his honourable profession.

Then he was directed to withdraw.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: It was in the performance of a public duty that I brought this question before the House. I am gratified that the House has shown by its vote that it is satisfied that I have so acted. I think that the course I have taken was a proper one in all respects; and there is no better proof of this than the satisfactory apology—most satisfactory to my mind—which has just been made by Mr. Reed. I hope the apology made by Mr. Reed will be as satisfactory to this House as it is to myself. I think that I have vindicated the honour and dignity of the House in the course which I have taken. As a humble Member, of this House, and little acquainted as I am with its forms, I trust I have done that which my hon. Friends here will approve. And, Sir, being satisfied as I am with the apology which Mr. Reed has made, with its manner, tone, and expression, I should not think I had performed my duty to this House, to my own feelings, and to Mr. Reed if I did not express a hope that the House will consent to Mr. Reed's being discharged from further attendance. I therefore beg, with the permission of the House, to move—

“That Mr. Reed, having duly apologised to the satisfaction of this House, be now excused from further attendance here.”

MR. ARTHUR MILLS seconded the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That Mr. Reed, having fully apologized to the satisfaction of this House, be now excused from further attendance on this House.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

AFFAIRS OF POLAND.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. HENNESSY :—Mr. Speaker, In the Session of 1861, when I presumed to ask the attention of Parliament to the state of Poland, I was met by the stereotyped reply, that Poland was not a practical question. In the following Session, when I had the satisfaction of co-operating with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tiverton in again calling attention to the state of Poland, we received the same answer. Sir, I venture to affirm that, whatever tone may now be taken by the Government, the old reply will not be given to-night. Since 1861 Poland has become, in the estimation, I believe, of every Member of this House, not only a practical but a momentous question. In 1861 events were taking place in Poland that were little understood in other parts of Europe. It was then said that the endurance and passive attitude of the Poles were an indication that under the pressure of three great Powers the heart of Poland could not beat. I thought, on the contrary, and I ventured to express the opinion here, that the great forbearance of the Poles was a proof of implicit trust in their leaders, of confidence in their cause, and of faith in the future. Now, we see that all is changed. Universal forbearance has suddenly been transformed into universal revolt. How has this happened? Not because of domestic conspiracies or foreign influences. No; it is due to the Russian Government that the attitude of the Poles has been changed; it is in the conduct of the Government that we are able to discover the proximate cause of the national outbreak.

Early in the year 1862 an Imperial ukase was issued which promised reforms, and appeared to confer privileges on the Poles. On the 10th of June, 1862, the Emperor appointed the Grand Duke Constantine his Lieutenant in Poland, and the Marquis Wielopolski to assist him. The Grand Duke Constantine solicited the Polish nobles to confer with him on the wants of Poland. The nobles, the great land-owners, and the municipal bodies responded to that appeal. It was not alone from the Emperor of the Russians and from his Lieutenant the Grand Duke that words of advice were addressed to the Poles, telling them to petition for a liberal form of government. When I called the attention of the House to the state of Poland, there was seated in the Peers' gallery a Pole of high rank and influence from the province of Podolia, who overheard the words spoken from the Treasury Bench by Lord John Russell. That noble Lord was then making his last speech in this House, and he said to the Poles—

"I believe your interests point to tranquillity, and to petitions and requests for a more liberal form of government, and for institutions similar to those which were granted from Vienna."

What was the consequence of following that advice? The maréchal de noblesse went back to his own country shortly after the noble Lord had made that speech. The ukase to which I have referred was published, and the nobles of Podolia assembled; 300 of them met, the maréchals de noblesse at their head, and an address to the Emperor was drawn up, in which they said—

"Rejecting all thoughts of the predominance of any particular race or class, the Podolian nobles remain true to the fundamental Polish idea of giving to all classes the same political rights, and they require union with Poland because they see in such union the foundation of free institutions. The situation of the country is very bad—a people without means of education; the laws opposed to the customs, traditions, and interchange of opinions; the execution of the laws rendered nugatory by an administration foreign to the country, and concentrated beyond the pale of the national wants and interests, and, finally, a population without organs selected from its own body for the purpose of directing its affairs."

What was the result of that address? I hold in my hand three letters describing the fate of the nobleman who had heard the advice of Lord Russell, and had followed it. One of the letters is dated from a prison at St. Petersburg, and the other two from Warsaw, describing what had happened. The last letter is dated the 16th of February, 1863, and is written by a near relative of the unhappy nobleman in question. It says—

"The maréchal de noblesse whom you have seen in England is now immured in the prison of Petropaulovski, condemned for fourteen months, with eleven of his companions, to cruel and inhuman treatment."

So much for following the advice given to the Poles by Her Majesty's Ministers; so much for accepting the hypocritical counsel of the Russian authorities. I mention this incident mainly for the purpose of illustrating the conduct of the Grand Duke as far as it affected the higher classes in Poland. But every class in Poland felt the pressure of the Russian Government; because during the time of which I am speaking, and since October, 1861, a state of siege prevailed. I have said that the Grand Duke Constantine also invited the municipal authorities and town councils to confer with him upon the condition of the people. The town council of Warsaw, acting upon that invitation, sent to the Grand Duke a report dated July 20, 1862, on one of the prisons of Warsaw. The report began by saying that—

"The total number of men and women arrested from the beginning of the year 1862 to the 19th of July, was 14,833."

The description of the room in which the political prisoners were confined was as follows:—

"Room No. 18, the same small size as the other two, except that it is but half their width, contains thirty men, arrested for not carrying lanterns at night. This room has no furniture and only one small barred window. There is so little space that the men in it can neither lie down nor move about with freedom. There is scarcely a breath of air, and the close packing of these thirty persons is an unprecedented instance of disregard of human life."

The report closed with this sentence—

"Considering, first, that the number of people arrested during the past half-year amounts to nearly one-tenth of the whole population of the town, and to one-fifth of such population, excluding children; second, that among those arrested are persons detained for the most trifling inattention to the decrees of the police, and mothers with little children, even children of four years old and children at the breast are often arrested—the Deputy President and the delegates of the Municipal Council consider it most expedient to take immediate steps to put a stop to this evil."

I am not quoting newspaper correspondents, or private letters, or any anonymous authorities—I refrain from relying on such information in a question so grave as the treatment of political prisoners, lest any person should accuse me of exaggerating; I have quoted from the report of the Town Council of Warsaw upon one of the prisons of the town. There were two or three other addresses from provincial councils in reply to the invitation of the Russian Government. The address of the provincial Council of Piotrkow, dated November, 1862, has a peculiar significance now—

"The Council also feels it its duty to call the attention of the authorities to one of the chief causes of the present position—the want of men qualified for the various kinds of labour. Between the years 1833 and 1856 many thousands have been recruited for the army from this province, constituting the cream of the population, and not leaving enough men for labour. These recruits were sent thousands of miles away, into strange lands, for many years, were attacked by a dreadful mortality in consequence of the climate, and returned, their numbers reduced to 498, not only useless, but a burden to their province. For these reasons the Council has felt it to be its duty to protest against any recruiting for the army which might be carried into effect on similar principles, and, above all, against a system which, by calling to the army the majority of persons belonging to the educated or mechanic class, would deprive the province of every means of self-development or progress. It is of opinion that the retention of recruits in their own country, with due protection for their language and religion, which are the only treasures left to a nation under foreign rule, could alone render a conscription tolerable to the population of this country; any other will always be considered as something worse than the heaviest of misfortunes."

I have read these extracts to the House as a statement of the Polish case by the only official element left in Poland. But that is not all. In accordance with the request of the Grand Duke Constantine, Count Andrew Zamayski in open day suggested the policy which he thought best suited for the country. Nothing could be more moderate than the document which was drawn up by that much respected representative of the country gentlemen of Poland. Nevertheless, for that act of petitioning Count Zamayski was summoned to St. Petersburg, he was exiled, and he is now in banishment with his brother Ladislaus. Sir, I have received authentic information of what passed at the remarkable interview between this illustrious Polish exile and the Russian Czar, and I beg to call attention to the extraordinary language addressed by the Emperor himself and by Prince Gortschakoff to Count Zamayski. The Emperor said, "The only way to govern Poland, I see now, is by terror." And, on leaving the presence of the Emperor, Prince Gortschakoff said to the Count, "If you force us to it, we will make Poland a heap of ashes and corpses." And, again, Prince Gortschakoff said, "It has long been the conclusion of the Imperial Government, and remains so, that the only course to be pursued in reference to Poland is a policy of extermination." That policy the Russian Government have endeavoured to carry out, and the means they have adopted for that purpose are boldly described by their own official organs. Of these the most notable was the conscription. That great idea of the Grand Duke may fairly be called a device for converting barrack-rooms and fortresses into political prisons. According to their own admission, they hoped, in this way, to seize and secure every person opposed to their policy. The conscription was directed against the towns alone, against certain classes alone, and its object was defined. And how had it been carried out? I hold in my hand numerous letters describing it. But the House will not need any such documentary proof in the face of the statements made in another place by an eminent authority (the Earl of Ellenborough), and in the face of the fact that those statements had received the sanction of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and had not been contradicted. It appears that the Russians at one o'clock in the night—the order having been made on the previous evening—surrounded the houses of the shopkeepers, middle classes, and professional people in Warsaw, dragged them from their beds and carried them off. The Russian official journal of Warsaw, on the 15th of January, thus described the time of the conscription:—

"Between the hours of one and eight o'clock this morning the levy of recruits for the army has been accomplished in the town of Warsaw."

The official journal, having stated that fact, went on to state what was not fact, but what was intended to produce, and did produce, a great result. It said that—

"Never in the course of the last thirty years had men so taken shown so much readiness and goodwill, and when lodged in the town hall they actually became joyful at being now freed from the influence of evil men."

That official notification concluded by stating that—

"It is likely that the same measures will meet with the same satisfactory results all over the country."

Sir, under these circumstances, I ask, what were the Poles to do? Here was this conscription, unprecedented in the history of civilization, and here was the official journal of Warsaw telling the people that it was to be carried out in the other parts of Poland. What were the Poles to do? It has been truly said that by "uncalculating despair" they were driven into insurrection. But, as surely as the conduct of the people was uncalculating, the policy of the Government was premeditated. The civil Governor of Warsaw, the Marquis of Wielopolski, has openly boasted that he drove the people into insurrection, observing that he had done his duty, and that it would now rest with the military authorities to discharge theirs. What do we now see? The whole Polish nation of one mind—a universal insurrection, or rather a universal resurrection of the people; and, though without arms and without the slightest previous preparation, the insurgents day after day extending the area they had opened in Poland. Day after day the Russian troops are defeated, and the heroic struggle is absorbing the admiration and anxiety of Europe. This success arises from two causes—First, because the whole nation co-operates with the insurgents; and, secondly—and this is not an insignificant fact—because among the troops of Russia there exists a spirit of inevitable insubordination. One Russian officer, leading on his men to attack a party of insurgents, when he came in sight of them, called his officers around him and said, "My conscience as a man points in one direction, and my duty as an officer in an opposite," and that unfortunate soldier committed suicide. Accounts also reach us of Russian troops leaving towns in the morning to attack insurgents and coming back in the evening unwounded and disarmed. What does that mean? It means that even the Russian troops to some extent entertain a friendly feeling for Poland, and are sensible of the disgraceful position which Russia has assumed.

It may be asked, why should a Member of the British Parliament presume to interfere in this matter, and what has the House of Commons to do with it? To such inquiries I answer, that not only is Poland a practical question now, but that it is beyond all doubt an English question. It is an English question, because England is bound by a treaty entered into between this country, Russia, and other Powers of Europe with regard to Poland. If I can show that England is bound by that treaty—that the treaty has never been abrogated with the consent of England, and that it has been violated by Russia—I must leave the House to draw its own conclusions as to what should be the policy of this country.

There has been a great deal of misconception about the precise value to the Poles of the Treaty of Vienna. That the treaty is of some value to Poland might be inferred from many well-known facts. Lord Castlereagh conducted the Vienna Conferences on the part of England, and in February, 1815, he laid down as the basis on which he entered into the negotiations of Vienna the wish constantly manifested by the British Government to see Poland an independent

State, more or less of considerable extent, over which there should reign a distinct dynasty, and which should form an intermediate Power between the three great monarchies. From that basis Lord Castlereagh was reluctantly driven, for he was not able to secure an independent Poland under a distinct dynasty; but he secured for Poland that which he deemed of vital importance to the Poles, and to the peace of Europe, a constitutional independence. That the first fourteen articles of the Treaty of Vienna should be devoted to that country, showed the importance the Great Powers attached to these obligations, and confirms the judgment of Talleyrand that Poland was the first, the greatest, and the most eminently European question that could be brought before the Congress of Vienna. I am not going to give my own interpretation of the articles of the Treaty of Vienna concerning Poland; but, for my present purpose, I will only rely on the interpretation of them given by two eminent authorities — the Emperor of Russia himself, and the noble Viscount on the Treasury Bench. After the treaty was negotiated, the Emperor of Russia, addressing the Poles, stated that they had received a constitution preserving in public enactments the Polish language, restricting public appointments to the Poles, and establishing freedom of commerce and a national army. In a few years the Emperor addressed the Poles again, and told them that their restoration was defined by solemn treaties and sanctioned by a constitutional chart; and that the inviolability of these external engagements, and that constitutional law, insured for Poland henceforth her place among European nations. The first address was delivered by the Emperor of Russia in 1815, and the second in 1818. During the negotiation of the Treaty of Vienna, the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government was a Minister of the Crown; and he was in the Foreign Office during the various infractions and final destruction of the treaty rights of Poland. I appeal, then, to the noble Viscount to say whether that treaty has not been systematically violated by Russia. In 1861 the noble Lord used remarkable words, to the effect that the course pursued by Russia constituted a complete and decided violation of the Treaty of Vienna; that the stipulations of the treaty were broken almost as soon as they were concluded, and that perhaps the greatest violation of a treaty that had ever taken place in the history of the world was that which had taken place in the case of Poland. Though these words were used when Poland was thought to be only an abstract question, they are of paramount importance now. Yet it is even more important to observe what was the language of the British Government on the occasion of the Polish insurrection in 1831, and to ascertain whether or not they then asserted that Russia had violated her treaty engagements. For thirty years the despatches which determined and defined the policy of this country in 1831 were concealed from the Parliament and the people of England. The distinguished General opposite (Sir De Lacy Evans), who I am informed will do me the great honour of seconding my address, moved three times for those papers. Motion after Motion was made to the same effect by other Members, but the Government persistently refused to produce them. Thanks, however, to Earl Russell, they were laid upon the table in compliance with a Motion which was made the Session before last. The noble Earl, then a Member of this House, in agreeing to my Motion, said that so many years had elapsed that there could no longer be any harm in allowing the despatches to be published. Those documents disclosed some very important facts. It appeared that in 1831 the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government, again and again told the Russian Government that they had not carried out the provisions of the Treaty of Vienna, and that they had violated that treaty. Indeed, in one despatch the noble Viscount distinctly protested against that violation. In writing to Lord Heytesbury, on the 22nd of March, 1831, the noble Viscount expressed himself as follows:—

“By Article 1 of the Treaty of Vienna it is stipulated that the Poles, subjects respectively of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, shall obtain a national representation and institutions regulated according to the kind of political existence which each of the Governments to which they belong shall think it useful and fitting to grant them. It is understood, that although this stipulation has been executed by Austria and Prussia, it has hitherto been entirely unfulfilled by the Russian Government. His Majesty's Government have been informed by the French Ambassador at this Court that instructions have been sent to the Duke de Mortemart to draw the attention of the Russian Government to this matter, and the French Government have expressed a wish that your Lordship might be instructed to support the Duke in his representations on this subject.”

But the next sentence renders all this nugatory. The noble Viscount, turning to his Russian vocabulary, says—

"Your Lordship will, of course, be careful not to take any step on this business which could lead to any unfriendly discussions with the Russian Government, with whom His Majesty's Government are, under present circumstances, more than ever desirous of keeping up the closest relations of friendship. But if the question should be agitated, your Lordship is instructed to state that, as far as His Majesty's Government are informed of the facts of the case, it does not appear to them that the provisions of the Treaty of Vienna applicable to the Polish provinces of Russia have been hitherto carried into execution.

"I am, &c.,

"PALMERSTON."

That despatch, though tinged with a Russian spirit and meaning nothing but words, and though from its reservations utterly valueless in 1831, is of value now; for it establishes the fact that at a critical moment, when the insurrection was raging, the noble Viscount stated that the treaty had not been carried out by Russia. In the same year another despatch was written by the noble Viscount, of which the people of England had heard but little, a despatch to which it was important their attention should be directed at the present moment. In 1831 the Government of Louis Philippe, a most cautious and peaceful Sovereign, addressed a despatch to the British Government, asking them to co-operate in endeavouring to secure for Poland those institutions which were guaranteed by the Treaty of Vienna. The note of Count Sebastiani, which was communicated by Prince Talleyrand to Lord Palmerston, was in the following terms:—

"Paris, July 7, 1831.

"Mon Prince,—The King, touched by the evils which the Polish war has already caused to two nations in which he takes so lively an interest, eager to insure the maintenance of peace, compromised daily by so prolonged a contest, and no less engaged in preserving the West of Europe from the fearful sufferings which this war entails, has addressed himself confidentially to the Emperor of Russia, in order to put an end to so many disasters, and to bring to an end blood-shedding over which humanity has only too long groaned. The King's intention was also to preserve the political existence of a people which has showed itself so worthy of it by so great courage and patriotism, and which has the guarantee of the Treaties of Vienna for its nationality. Up to the present time the King's efforts have not achieved the results which he had the right to expect. Notwithstanding their small success, His Majesty does not consider it his duty to renounce the generous and pacific mediation which his personal feelings recommend, and which the condition of Europe prescribes to him. He believes, especially, that were England to act in agreement with France for giving to this salutary intervention all the force of which it is susceptible, the effect might be made certain by the combination of these two Powers. The King is sufficiently acquainted with the feelings which animate His Britannic Majesty to entertain the hope that he will not refuse to give his frank and complete adhesion to our advances, and to join his powerful action to our efforts, at a time when the question of the welfare of humanity and of the general interest of Europe transcends all others. The desire of His Majesty, mon Prince, is that you should make immediate and pressing overtures to the English Government with reference to this subject: we are awaiting their result with much impatience.

"Accept, &c.,

"HORACE SEBASTIANI."

The noble Viscount, in replying on the 2nd of July, 1831, wrote as follows:—

"The object of the communication which it is now proposed that France and England should jointly address to Russia is an immediate cessation of hostilities, with a view to negotiations for the purpose of re-establishing peace between the contending parties by some lasting arrangement; and it appears from Count Sebastiani's despatch that a proposition to this effect has already been made to Russia by France, but hitherto without success. Can it, then, be expedient to make a proposal which there is no ground to hope would be accepted? The effects and bearing of the contest upon the security of other States have not hitherto been such as to warrant measures of such a description; nor has the conduct of Russia towards England been calculated to excite any unfriendly feeling; she has, on the contrary, performed towards this country all the offices of a good and faithful ally, and, in the late difficult negotiations for the purpose of effecting a settlement between Belgium and Holland, she has acted with perfect fairness in her co-operation with the other four Powers. Under these circumstances, His Majesty, deeply lamenting the calamities of a disastrous and desolating contest, does not think the time has yet arrived when he could be justified in adopting a proceeding which, however conciliatory in form, could not fail to alarm an independent Power, naturally jealous of its rights. For these reasons His Majesty feels himself under the necessity of declining the proposal which the Prince de Talleyrand has been instructed to convey."

The noble Viscount spoke of the "rights" of Russia; but the fact was Russia had long before lost any rights she possessed in Poland, by her violation of her engagements. I shall not at present presume to offer any opinion upon this memorable despatch of the noble Viscount in 1831. I simply draw the attention of the House to the possibility of a similar despatch being written in 1863, and of the noble Viscount again becoming the arbiter of the fate of Poland. Seeing what took place in 1831, and remembering that this despatch was concealed for thirty years, I respectfully put it to the House whether we ought not to press the Government to say distinctly what they are going to do?

Mr. Hennessy

There are many other considerations, besides those springing out of the Treaty of Vienna, which give us a direct interest in the independence of Poland, but I will not go into them now. I do not pretend to deal with the whole of the great Polish cause. I am only, as it were, opening the pleadings. I have no doubt other hon. Members, better able to do so, will state the case in full. I will merely add a word or two on the practical aspect of the question.

It is significant that the various Powers of Europe are no longer indifferent to Poland. In France there is a diversity of opinion among public men on every great question save one, and that is Poland. On that subject Legitimists, Orleanists, Imperialists, Republicans, all are united. I shall not venture to predict what will be the policy of France, but there can be little doubt that it may depend on that of England. For a long time past men have been in the habit of asking, what will the Emperor do? But the question now is, what will England do? If the policy of this Empire is to depend on the spirit of the people, if the Ministers are prepared to carry out the wishes of the people, I can have no misgivings about the diplomacy of 1863; for I believe we can say with truth that the feeling of this country is as unanimous and as friendly to Poland as that of France. And what has been the conduct of Austria in this matter? She has complied with the Treaty of Vienna, as far as Galicia is concerned, and within the last few weeks the attitude she has assumed has received the well-merited commendation of the highest authorities in the other House. It is the traditional policy of Austria to be friendly to Poland. True, she was a party to the great crime of the partition; but when the Empress signed the deed, she added these memorable words to it—

"Placeat, because so many great and learned men will have it so; but long after I am dead and gone people will see what will happen for breaking through everything holy and just."

"MARIA THERESA."

Again, during the insurrection of 1831 the Emperor Francis, then on his death-bed, sent the following message through Count Kolovratz, to the Envoy of the Polish Provisional Government—

"The Emperor feels that the time is drawing near when he shall have to appear before the great Judge; the possession of Galicia weighs on his conscience as a crime, and he would be ready to restore that province to Poland, provided it were not annexed to Russia."

If my words could reach his ears, I would, therefore, respectfully urge the present Emperor of Austria to maintain the attitude he has assumed, for it is not only in accordance with the public opinion of Europe, but it is interwoven with the best interests of the great Empire that he governs so well, and it is strictly consistent with the traditions of his house. There is another Power in Europe; some speak of it as a weak Power, but it is not so; which can exercise great influence on Russia. I mean the Sublime Porte. The present Sultan is a man of determination and ability, and I can tell the House, what the noble Lord at the head of the Government probably knows, that of all the Powers of Europe none will be more anxious at this great crisis to assist Poland than the Sublime Porte. There are many reasons why the influence of Turkey upon Russia is well worth our consideration. The policy of England would be a policy to vindicate her own public faith and solemn engagements; the policy of the Turks would be a policy to save themselves and preserve the integrity of their empire. Again, in the North of Europe, there are Powers which have ever been, and are at this moment, friendly to Poland. On the other hand stood Russia herself and the Government of Prussia. To a certain extent Prussia has fulfilled the obligations of the Treaty of Vienna, and I am therefore willing to hope that she is not now combining with the arch-violator of that treaty. To do so would be indeed a fatal step. I have heard with pleasure that the Prussian Minister has announced that the Convention concluded with Russia has been misunderstood, and its purport exaggerated. I cannot believe that Prussia has gone so far as the House has been led to suppose on a former occasion. She may have committed a fault—a fault which may, perhaps, be repaired—and I hope we shall hear from the Government to-night, some satisfactory statement as to the actual attitude taken by Prussia. What are the sentiments of the people of Russia? Even in Russia itself I see a ray of hope. Among the people of Russia there is, if I am rightly informed, a profound feeling in favour of Poland. The Russian Government is not a Government which sprang from the people or has any direct communication with the people; on the contrary, it has many of the characteristics of a foreign Government; and though the Czar and the Grand Duke are no doubt resolved, if they can, to crush the Poles, the people of Russia do not sympathize with the Imperial policy of extermination. I will not weary the House by reading passages from the Russian newspapers. It may be enough to mention that a journal printed in St. Petersburg recently published an argument in favour of an independent Poland, and urged the government to act upon that view. That paper has since been suppressed, but the fact that it ventured when in existence to publish such an article is significant. But my chief dependence is on Poland herself. I do not ask for armed intervention; I do not wish that a single foreign soldier should be sent to Poland. One Queen's messenger despatched from the Foreign Office to Paris, Vienna, or Constantinople, would be worth 100,000 foreign bayonets to the Poles. It is not armaments they want; but if the Powers of Europe, parties to the Treaty of Vienna, and the Sublime Porte, choose to act in diplomatic concert, then Poland is secure. Sir, the House to-night presents a very different appearance from that which it exhibited when I called attention to the state of Poland on former occasions. The contrast is, indeed, most striking. Nor is it confined to Parliament. From one end of the country to the other, the public mind has changed. Apathy and indifference have given way to the deepest interest and anxiety. Why is there this change? It is because a long absent visitor has returned. Many years ago, a long season and a sad season for Poland; but it is passed. Hope has returned—and I beg leave to welcome her to this House, and to mark her presence here to-night by moving this Address to the Crown.

"Hope for a season bade the world farewell;"

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to represent to Her Majesty that certain Treaty obligations have been incurred by England and other Powers with Russia in respect to Poland, and that these Treaty obligations have not been fulfilled by Russia, but were (in the words of Her Majesty's present First Minister) broken almost as soon as concluded:

That these joint obligations are set forth in the first fourteen Articles of the Treaty of Vienna, and that the Emperor of Russia, on the 13th day of May 1815, thus recapitulated them: 'A Constitution; the preservation in public enactments of the Polish language; the restriction of public appointments to Poles; freedom of Commerce; and a national army; and subsequently the same Sovereign, addressing the Poles, said, 'Your restoration is defined by solemn Treaties. It is sanctioned by the Constitutional Chart. The inviolability of these external engagements and of that fundamental law ensures for Poland henceforth an honourable place among European Nations.'

That for many years past not one of these engagements and conditions has been fulfilled:

That it appears from the diplomatic documents which from time to time have been laid before Parliament, that these external engagements of Russia in respect to Poland were avowedly intended by the contradicting parties, on the one hand, as a compensation for the loss of her independence by the dismemberment, and, on the other hand, as guarantees for the peace and security of Europe:

That the breach of the solemn engagements thus incurred between England and Russia has recently been described (2nd July 1861) by Her Majesty's First Minister in his place in this House, in the following words:—

'The course which the Government of Russia adopted towards Poland was a complete and decided violation of the Treaties of Vienna. The stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna were broken almost as soon as concluded. Perhaps the greatest violation of a Treaty that has ever taken place in the history of the world was that which occurred in the case of Poland.'

That for years past the Poles have borne with exemplary patience this deliberate violation of their national rights:

That whilst their endurance has attracted the admiration of Europe, it seems to have aroused the worst passions of the Russian authorities:

That the patriotic self-restraint of the unanimous people of Poland has at length given way under an accumulation of outrages unparalleled in these times:

That the Kingdom of Poland is now the scene of desolating conflicts between the troops of Russia and the people thus driven to desperation:

Humbly to submit to Her Majesty that these facts demand the interposition of England in vindication of her own public faith and solemn engagements,"

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR DE LAOY EVANS seconded the Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that having from first to last supported the Government of which the noble Lord at the head of the Administration was a Member in one Russian war, a war which had been carried to a successful termination, he was anxious at once to state that he would be no party to urging the noble Lord beyond his discretion in the sense of intervention for the sake of Poland, at the cost of another Russian war. The conduct of the noble Lord, and the expressions used by the noble Lord, which were quoted in the form of the Motion, were a sufficient guarantee to the House and the country that if it were possible by friendly offices to mitigate the present state of affairs in Poland, and the evils to which Poland for so many years had been subjected, the noble Lord would not fail to use the power of England in this sense. But, lamenting as he did the condition of Poland, and deprecating its partition, still he thought the House ought to ask itself—Are the Polish people in a condition to establish their own freedom? ["Yes."] In his opinion, Russian Poland by itself would not be large enough to constitute a free State, under existing circumstances; and if this insurrection succeeded as against Russia, was the condition of that part of Poland which belonged to Prussia such as to justify the active intervention of England to wrest that portion of Poland from her ally? The hon. Member for the King's County admitted that the condition of that part of Poland which belonged to Austria was satisfactory. [Mr. HENNESSY: No.] Then the hon. Member implied that England was to enter into hostilities with the object of depriving Austria also of certain dominions which she now held. That was rather a grave proposal, and he was actuated by this motive, for no one had ever seen him stand aloof from a movement in favour of rational freedom in any part of the world. What he feared was this, whether, if the Poles were now to succeed, they might not find that they had substituted one tyranny for another, because he doubted whether the condition of that country was such as to prove that the people were qualified for freedom. Let them glance for one moment at the history of 1815: The Emperor Alexander then participated in the feelings of England, and set honestly to work in order to carry out the dictates of the treaty that was to establish constitutional freedom in the portion of Poland which fell to Russia. But he was immediately met by a Roman Catholic movement, by a Jesuitical agency, stirring up disunion and strife, and what was the proof? The proof of it was this:—That in anticipation of establishing the state of things which England desired he was forced to expel the Jesuits from that country. This happy state of things, organized by the Emperor Alexander, in 1815, in the sense of England, lasted till 1820, and then the mischief that had been fomented broke out, and Russia had a right to say that she was forced to crush freedom. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members said "No, no!"—"Oh, oh!"—but he asserted that the conduct of the Parliament of Poland, in 1820, was totally inconsistent with the understanding upon which the Emperor made the declaration quoted by the hon. Member. Let not the House be deceived. There were agencies at work in Poland that were not in favour of true freedom. With whom had the Emperor of Russia remonstrated against the fomentation of the troubles which had now broken out? With Rome. And Rome had refused to aid in the pacification of Poland, but sanctioned the action of her ultramontane bishops in that country. Let the House not be deceived, but remember that brigandage in Italy was characterized in this House as a struggle for the restoration of freedom. He had only risen to protest against the House being deceived, conceiving that by any hasty action of their own in the case of Poland, they might be hurrying the Government into that which might become a most serious complication, without being likely to advance in Poland the cause of true freedom.

Mr. BUXTON said, that every one who took an interest in Poland must be exceedingly obliged to the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) for the able speech in which he had introduced this subject to the House. From no part of that speech had he derived greater pleasure than from that passage in which the hon. and learned Member said that he did not advocate intervention by war, but only by diplomatic means. Every man of sense and humanity would deprecate our going to war on behalf of Poland. But while he deprecated any steps being taken by the British Government that could have any semblance of a tendency towards war, he thought there were solid grounds why the Government of England ought to utter on her behalf an earnest protest against the crimes of which Russia had been guilty, and still more against the barbarities which she might be tempted to commit if she prevailed—as he feared she would—in the re-conquest of Poland. Not only, however, ought the British Government to cause the voice of this country to be heard, but it would be well for that Government to do its utmost to persuade every civilized country—at any rate, every country of Europe—to unite with England in the utterance of the same views. The force of any protest would be increased tenfold if it were a unanimous expression of opinion by every people within the same quarter of the globe. It was sometimes laid down as a maxim that a nation should say nothing when it meant to do nothing; and very often, no doubt, well-meant protests had seemed to be utterly without avail. The experience of England and France with regard to Naples was not encouraging. In fact, a Government that knew it was not to be interfered with by force could always affect to treat its neighbours' protests with insolent contempt. The matter, however, might not really end there. The Government, thus remonstrated with, might treat such interference with scorn; but the victims whom she was wronging would look with affection on those who, of their own accord, had stepped forward to aid them; and the feeling would be deepened in the hearts of all men that the country which breaks through the law of justice and humanity isolates itself from mankind, and exposes itself to the indignant aversion of her sister kingdoms. It seemed to him that more and more as mankind went forward, the nations that lived side by side ought to form one organized whole—a commonwealth of nations. It would, in reality, tend towards that result that they should abstain from meddling by force with each other's affairs; but it would be well that they should not stand aloof from each other, as if the deeds of one were not a shame to the whole, but should combine to withhold each other from the crimes and follies of which they might else be guilty. And if ever it could be right for neighbourly Governments to join hand-in-hand in condemnation of the acts of any one Government, surely such a case had now arisen? Poland had been treated by Russia with shameful insult and shameful brutality. The whole aim of Russia had been to crush out the national feeling and patriotism of the Poles. She had set herself with a resolute purpose to grind them down under the heel of her despotism, and to break the spirit of a most gallant people. It seemed, indeed, a short time ago, that the Emperor, whose policy in other parts of his empire had been liberal and humane, had become alive to the folly and wickedness of this tyranny over Poland. He seemed, at length, to be catching sight of the truth, so obvious to every bystander, that unless Poland was to continue to be the weakness and the disgrace of the Russian empire, she must be treated with the reverence due to her rights. It appeared as though the wisdom which of late years had come over the policy of England in her treatment of her dependencies had reached the Czar, and it was dawning on him that by allowing Poland to become once more a people, enjoying her own institutions, though still under his sceptre, he would not only be doing that which was just and noble, but raising the Russian throne to a height of glory in the eyes of mankind which it had never reached before. The path lay straight before him towards rendering his empire stronger, while at the same time winning for himself the purest honour. From his other acts we might have deemed him worthy of such a policy; but, whether it was by his own fault, or that he was misled by wicked counsel, the terrible result of this change of conduct was before them. There was no occasion for him to dwell on that new and iniquitous act of tyranny—the attempt of the authorities to seize on every man whose education and energy of character might render him an efficient representative of his countrymen, and to send him off in all likelihood to perish in Siberia or the Caucasus. He did not hesitate to say that, barring the massacre of the women and children, that attempt was closely parallel to the mode in which the King of Dahomey seized on the young men of a Fellatah village in order to sell them into slavery. But though the cup of Polish wrath was filled to the very brim by this brutality, they still held themselves in check, and it was not till the pride of the whole nation had been trampled upon by the official proclamation, which averred that these young men had gladly offered themselves to the Russian recruiting sergeants, that the nation had burst forth at length into a hurricane of rage, and had filled the land with insurrection. If ever the doings of tyrants ought to call forth the indignant protest of the nations around, our Government ought not to pass over in silence such iniquities as these. Such a protest would not be idle. He was assured by those who knew much of Russian feeling, that they were singularly sensitive to the opinion of Europe. They were, above all things, afraid of being thought barbarians, and would shrink extremely from the solemn rebuke of their more civilized neighbours. It might be said that public opinion had been expressed loudly enough by the press of this country and of Europe. He heartily rejoiced that the press of this and of all civilized countries had spoken forth with such tremendous emphasis in condemnation of these outrages. But, after all, the members of a Government like that of Russia could have little time and little inclination for making themselves acquainted with what the newspapers of other countries might be saying; whereas the combined protest of England, France, Italy, Austria, Spain, Sweden, Norway, Holland, and Belgium—he heartily wished he could add the name of Prussia too—could not but ring in the ears of the Russian Emperor. An additional motive for making such a protest had been afforded by that transcendent meanness of which the King of Prussia had been guilty, in eagerly assuring Russia that he would do his part towards crushing the unfortunate Poles, and that his sympathies were now, as they ever had been, with the oppressor against the oppressed. A baser action than that Europe had not seen for many a long year. The King of Prussia, by the narrowness of his views and the stupidity of his treatment of his own people, had already awakened feelings in which indignation was mingled with contempt. But even the King of Prussia could hardly have been expected to proclaim his zeal in the great cause of consigning to death and slavery those who were simply rising up against brutal cruelties. Since the King had thus come forward to give his countenance to Russia, it would the more become other nations to show what all men but he were feeling in the very depths of their hearts. The position of Austria, again, afforded a further motive for such a course of conduct. Austria had shown herself worthy of the respect of Europe in her treatment of that portion of Poland which had fallen to her share. She had not sought to trample out the nationality of the Poles, nor to crush them under her foot; and the result was, that although Galicia might have some cravings to join the kingdom of Poland, should such a kingdom ever be restored, her people did not complain of the treatment of the Government to which they were consigned. He thought it would encourage Austria, and make her position less difficult, if all her sister nations expressed their abhorrence of the policy of Russia, with which her own stood in such gratifying contrast. Above all, they knew that France was resolved no longer to look on with tacit acquiescence at these deeds. He did not see why our Government should wait for the lead of France; nor, on the other hand, would it be possible for those who represented the British people to stand by in silence while France was taking energetic steps towards impressing on Russia and on Prussia the sentiments by which she is moved. It might be, too, that our joining ourselves with France in remonstrances would tend to hold her back from war. On the whole, looking at the atrocities that had been done, and the dire likelihood of still fouler deeds—seeing the real bent of the Czar's mind towards humanity—seeing what power in these days the voice of Christendom must have, if uttered firmly—seeing the step which Prussia had taken, the position in which Austria stood, and the decision to which France was tending—the motives seemed strong for our Government not to linger, but to call upon every Power, great or small, of Europe to join with England to condemn what was past, and to press upon Russia a wise and gentle policy in days to come.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: Sir, although on former occasions those persons, Members of this House, who brought the question of Poland under discussion may be accused of having induced this House to go into a matter of theoretical polity rather than one of practical import, I do not think that my hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Hennessy) or any Member on the other side of the House, can be accused of doing so on the present occasion. I do hope the House will fully estimate the value of this discussion to-night; because I apprehend that on the sense in which the Government of this country conceives this House to speak will depend to a very great degree the line of conduct which that Government will take in regard either to following any proposition of the Government of the Emperor of the French, or in initiating any measures of their own. If I be right in this apprehension, I think Her Majesty's Government will do well to follow the opinion of this House. Because the question is one that has long engaged the attention of mankind; it is one on which no Government could be authorized to act entirely on their own impulses, or their own private opinions—it is one in which they can only act with safety and with honour by obtaining the full support of this House and of the country, not only to the measures which they adopt, but to the consequences which may result from them. Although I have no desire to suppose that the word "intervention" in the speech of my hon. and learned Friend opposite meant anything more than diplomatic intervention, and although I have no reason to believe that in the present aspect of Europe there is any immediate reason to suppose that diplomatic interposition would be accompanied by more serious measures; nevertheless I say that it becomes this House to look to the possible consequences of interposition; not to act blindly and one-sided in the matter, but to take a clear and comprehensive view, so as to feel, that if they do their duty in this matter by their country and by Europe, they may be perfectly at ease, whatever the consequences. It is no secret that this question at the present moment deeply agitates the French nation—it is no secret, because, and the fact may be gained from the history of Europe, the question of Poland does excite in the French people an interest so absorbing as to be altogether disproportionate to their interest in any other foreign affair whatever. It is very much as if all the sympathies which my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) feels for Italy were combined with all the sentiments entertained on the same subject by my worthy Friend the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer)—all the aspirations for liberty combined with all the ardour of religion. Therefore, I say, there can be no doubt the French people are ready to support the Emperor in any measures he may take with regard to Poland, even though these measures should ultimately induce an appeal to arms. It becomes us, consequently, clearly to understand, whether it is our duty in this case to support any proposals for peaceable interposition which may be made by the Emperor of the French. The first consideration is, are we bound to do so by the state of the treaties? I own that I cannot read the Treaty of Vienna in any other sense than as determining the common consent at that time of all the Powers that Poland should enjoy, in a certain degree, the advantages of a comparatively free government. The history of that negotiation is curious in itself. Lord Castlereagh—whose strong common sense comes out more and more as we grow familiar with his suggestions—was fully aware of all the difficulties which would encumber the question the moment free Poland was attached to despotic Russia. Therefore, all the interest of England was brought to bear with a view to constitute a large and independent Poland as an integral part of Europe. So far the conscience of England acquits her. She had taken no share in the partition of Poland, and at the great Congress of Nations she did all she could to rectify that wrong. But the other Powers were too strong for her, and the the arrangement was made by which Austria and Prussia each got a portion, and the Kingdom of Poland was constituted, with all the dignity of an independent people, and attached to the despotic empire of Russia. What Lord Castlereagh had anticipated naturally occurred; the difficulties of the position grew day by day, and were increased by the ill-will shown towards Poland by the Government of Russia. An intelligent and moderate Government might have surmounted the difficulties; but it was not in the power of human wisdom to combine the Government of Poland in an independent and liberal spirit with the increase and fostering of absolute despotism in Russia. I cannot agree with my hon. and learned Friend opposite that the insurrection of 1831 was not justified. It was provoked by a series of great insults, of dire cruelties, and of systematic oppression; and when the spirit of liberty broke out so freely, in some cases so wildly, as it did then in Europe, it was not in human nature that Poland should not have attempted to resist. The Emperor of Russia took advantage of that resistance; and though that view has not been distinctly formalized in any diplomatic document, yet I believe it is understood that the Russian Government consider that the Treaties of Vienna were cancelled, as regards Poland, by the insurrection of 1831, and that any power which Russia now exercises over Poland is no longer restrained by the faith of the Treaty of 1815, but that her dominion is held by the simple right of conquest. I cannot admit this doctrine, for several reasons, and mainly on this ground:—Whatever may be the immediate relations between Poland and Russia at the Treaty of Vienna, Russia nevertheless contracted towards the other Powers of Europe such obligations as would justify them in holding this language towards her:—"You have no right to keep in the centre of Europe a focus of continual discontent, when the wisdom of mankind has taught us that to hold a recalcitrant nation by the mere means of force is not only impolitic in itself, but intolerable in its consequences. You have no right to keep Poland in a state of chronic insurrection; you have no right to impose a condition of perpetual disturbance on your neighbours of Austria and Prussia; you have no right to threaten the peace of Europe, in which we are all concerned." The circumstances of history are very seldom parallel, but I would call the attention of the House to an instance bearing some resemblance to the mute appeal which is now made by Poland. In 1809 the people of the Tyrol were attacked by the combined armies of France and Bavaria. They made an appeal to England, at that time under a Tory Government, not supposed to give its countenance to anything favouring revolutionary designs, and with the leave of the House I will read a passage from the answer given to the Deputies of the Tyrol by Lord Bathurst. After expressing his regret at the event he says—

"When submission is in effect more hazardous than resistance, or when the dangers attending on each are nearly balanced, a brave nation may be encouraged justifiably to prefer the latter alternative; but when by resistance the sufferings of those engaged in it must be grievous, and the hopes of its success cannot possibly be great, it is not for those who are not to participate in the danger to counsel others to incur it."

But the despatch did not end here. Lord Bathurst added—

"If, however, the remembrance of past happiness, the sense of recent wrongs, the expectation of renewed oppression, the character of the country, the habits and spirit of the people, shall decide them to persist, His Majesty cannot but give some testimony of the interest which he takes in the issue of a contest too unequal, he fears, to be availing, but which he knows to be just."

I take that to be the spirit of the counsel which Her Majesty's Government ought to give on the present occasion. We must not delude ourselves by false hopes. The character of the Russian Government is well known, and their stern and cool-headed statesmen will estimate our interference at what it is worth. I think that it is worth something in two ways. It is worth something in itself, and my hon. and learned Friend has justly said, that Russia is not now unamenable to public opinion. The people and Government of Russia are now conscious that they are on the threshold of a new order of things. The emancipa-tion of the serfs and the comparatively enfeebled position of Russia as a military Power in Europe should impress on the Russian people the consciousness that they can no longer combine in their policy the astuteness of the West and the primitive barbarism of the East. The press is beginning to have its influence. Newspapers are no longer confined to her capital, but traverse the uttermost limits of her dominions. She knows, too, that the perpetration of perpetual injustice is not only viewed as a crime in the eyes of Europe, but that it will prove a great impediment to her internal progress as well as to her external policy. Russia also knows that the military strength of England, although physically inferior to that of France, will yet weigh considerably when thrown into the balance with that of France. Add to the enthusiasm of France the deep conviction of duty on the part of the people of England, and you will get a stress of public opinion that will not bear upon Russia in vain. Therefore, I believe that I am not inaccurately interpreting the feeling of this House when I say, that if overtures are made to the Government to express to the Emperor of Russia the strong opinion—I will use a stronger word, and say the indignation of this country at his persistence in a line of Government which can only be maintained by atrocities such as have lately occurred, they ought not to be ignored by this House or by Her Majesty's Government. I know that many excuses are made for these acts. There were plenty of good and learned excuses made for the Massacre of St. Bartholomew and for the Sicilian Vespers. There is not a coup d'état that does not find its apologists, nor one that has not, viewed from one side, its excuses. The Russian Government may say that they were compelled to adopt this larcenous oppression of carrying off thousands of men to serve in their distant armies by the fear of a national insurrection. But why did they provoke that insurrection? Why, when they got to a state of things in which the aristocratic element and good sense of the community were enlisted against them—why, when the movement was clearly seen to be one not of excited revolutionists, but was conducted by the most temperate, the richest, and the best men of the country—why did the Government take advantage of that moment to attempt to turn the perfectly constitutional proceedings of the people of Poland into violent and angry revolution? Therefore, do not let the Government of Russia represent that the state of Poland rendered this act one of State necessity. The future of Poland hangs in the balance. I have no hope that the mere military power of Poland will not succumb to the arms of Russia. But it will be well if by our interposition we try to modify materially so awful a state of things. The conduct of Prussia has been visited with deep censure not only in this country but throughout Europe. We have not only a strong dynastic, but almost a personal interest in the welfare of Prussia; but the wishes and sympathies of this House go with the rising liberty, the constitutional and moderate liberty of the Prussian people. I am sure that this is not a case in which we can interfere; but we may exhibit to the Parliament of that country that our interest and sympathies are with them in this hour of trial and danger, and we may assure them, that if by such means as their constitution allows them they show their just reprobation of the Government of Russia, they will acquire the esteem and admiration of this country. To Prussia at the present moment we should address the language of moderate remonstrance. To Russia we should speak in a tone of just and manly indignation; and I trust that Her Majesty's Government will rightly convey and express these sentiments. If they do this, they will not misinterpret the feelings of the House.

MR. WALTER: Sir, I listened with deep interest to the able and eloquent address of the hon. and learned Member for the King's County. But I am bound to say that the enthusiasm which the hon. Member excited in my mind with respect to Poland dropped down at once from boiling point to zero, when, at the close of his speech, he informed the House that the interference he contemplated was not of a military but of purely a diplomatic character. However strong our sympathies may be—and we have proof enough that the sympathies of the people of England are strongly in favour of Poland—we ought not to be misunderstood on so important a question. The Resolutions which the hon. and learned Member has moved consist of sundry recitals of the well-known state of Poland; but they end in a practical conclusion of so serious a character that I trust the House will permit me to read the last paragraph once more. The conclusion which the hon. and learned Member desires the House to adopt is as follows:—

“Humbly to submit to Her Majesty that these facts demand the interposition of England in vindication of her own public faith and solemn engagements.” Sir, that language, if it means anything, means war. It ought to mean war. England ought not to counsel her Sovereign to use such language, if diplomatic action alone is to be taken. I do not wish to prejudge the question at issue, or to give, at present, an opinion upon it. But I wish the House to understand that when the House of Commons asserts that England is bound to interpose in vindication of her own public faith and solemn engagements, it must be prepared to support the Sovereign in giving effect to that language. I trust that the Government will not be misled into believing that this Address expresses no other meaning than that which may be conveyed by a Queen's messenger. I think I may even say that it would be degrading to the majesty of England to place such language in the mouth of the Sovereign, if nothing more is to be done. I shall not pretend to go into the question which the hon. and learned Member has opened. I leave that for persons better qualified than I am to discuss it. The time may arrive, or, for all I know, the time has arrived, when it may be necessary for England to act. But whether that time has arrived or not, I trust that the House will believe that England is bound to give effect to her language, and not to place in the lips of the Sovereign words that say so much when the hon. Gentleman who proposes them means so little.

MR. DENMAN said, he also felt very strongly the objections just stated by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter). The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Hennessy) stated that he only contemplated diplomatic intervention; but he (Mr. Denman) agreed in thinking the House could not possibly agree to the last paragraph of the Address unless it were prepared immediately to go to war; and that to put upon the records of the House a Resolution pledging themselves to “interposition,” especially to “interposition in vindication,” if not followed up by a speedy declaration of war, would expose them to the charge of using idle words without any real intention of acting upon them. While however, he would counsel moderate action on the part of the Government, and while he deprecated the use of such language as that in which the last Resolution was couched, he differed from the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) in thinking that under no possible circumstances should any other than diplomatic action be resorted to by the Government. He could not approve of diplomatic negotiations commenced with an understanding that in no eventuality were they to be followed by war. Therefore, he should be anxious to pass such a Resolution only as would strengthen the hands of the Government in the proposed diplomatic negotiations; but he would not tie the hands of the Government by telling the Russian Government, that however atrocious their violation of treaties, however wicked and cruel the conduct of Russia towards Poland might be, the English Government would not be prepared to go to war with Russia. The necessary alteration in the Address might, he thought, be made by omitting the words of the last paragraph after the word "demand," and by substituting words which would make the paragraph read as follows:—"Humbly to submit to Her Majesty that these facts loudly demand the serious and immediate consideration of Her Majesty's Government." The House would then do in its collective capacity what every speaker (unless the hon. Member for North Warwickshire were an exception) had done to-night individually, and express its strong and ardent sympathy for Poland. He had felt, when the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) rose, that he would hardly be two minutes on his legs without saying something to show that the want of sympathy with Poland which he showed arose from the fact that she was a Roman Catholic nation. He could not help thinking that the hon. Member allowed his judgment to be warped by that fact; but it was to be hoped that—ardent sympathizer with liberty as he knew his hon. Friend to be—he would become a convert to more liberal views. It ought to be remembered that a down-trodden and oppressed country was the very country where plotters, Jesuits, and all the miserable engines of tyranny have a sway such as they never can have where freedom prevails. By an honest expression of opinion in favour of Poland, and by thus helping her to become free, the hon. Gentlemen would find that those things which now so much disquieted him would all disappear. Until she was free they never would disappear.

MR. NEWDEGATE explained that all he had said was that the speech made on a former occasion by the noble Lord at the head of the Government had convinced him that he required no prompting in favour of Poland, and to urge that the matter might be safely left to the discretion of the Government.

MR. DENMAN: He was glad to hear that that was the opinion of the hon. Gentleman. He imagined that the hon. Gentleman had spoken disparagingly of Poland, and of her right to freedom, because of the great number of Jesuits in that country. As to leaving the cause of Poland in the hands of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, there was no man in whose hands that cause was likely to suffer less than in his; but, at the same time, the influence of the Government would be greatly strengthened by a unanimous expression of the opinion of that House. He therefore hoped that, without either pledging themselves to go to war in this matter or declaring that under no circumstances whatever would they be prepared to go to war, the House would agree to a decided Resolution in favour of Poland.

LORD FERMOY said, he felt the full force of the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down; but he thought, that if they desired that debate to have any moral effect in Europe, they must not be nervous about putting on record a strong Resolution conveying their opinion of the conduct of Russia towards Poland. It had been said that this country was not responsible for the partition of Poland—that might be so—but England was, he believed, morally responsible for many of the unfortunate results to that country from the non-fulfilment of the Treaty of Vienna. It was not enough to say, as the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Monckton Milnes) had done, that Lord Castlereagh, our Plenipotentiary in 1815, advocated the independence of Poland at Vienna. To the final decisions of the Congress, England was a party in conjunction with the other Powers who signed the treaty. Poland herself was not responsible, for all through her history she had protested strenuously against her oppressors. Under these circumstances it was his opinion that that House—the oldest, freest, and most distinguished assembly in Europe—should now adopt a unanimous Resolution emphatically condemning the acts of Russia. When the hon. and learned Member for the Kings County placed on the paper the Motion which he had introduced with so much ability and moderation, he (Lord Fermoy) had thought that there could not be in the British House of Commons any other sentiment than one of unanimous condemnation of the conduct of Russia—how much, therefore, had he been astonished to hear the hon. Member for North Warwickshire vindicating that Power, and saying practically that the Poles were not worthy of liberty. His astonishment, however, was lessened when the hon. Member gave his reason for that, because when that hon. Gentlemen smelt something of the Pope in this matter, it was not so surprising, perhaps, that he should have come to such a conclusion. Still, could any man read in the newspapers the accounts of the atrocities committed by the Russians in Poland—the deeds of rapine, rape, kidnapping, and murder, and not be moved by them? The people of Poland were, indeed, of a different religion from the hon. Member; but was that a reason why the people of England should not sympathize with them in their sufferings. Our responsibility for the condition of Poland was heavy. She had never been a party to her own dismemberment and degradation. She had suffered three partitions and she had taken every legitimate opportunity to protest against them. Russia had done everything in her power to foment discontent among the Poles, to get up conspiracies among them and exasperate them to violence, in order to find an excuse for massacring and expatriating them. In 1831, when Poland carried out a partially successful revolution and formed a Provisional Government, the Powers who made the arrangements of 1815 should have met and admitted her into the family of nations. The contracting Powers ought, then, to have insisted on her freedom. That opportunity was, however, lost. Another now presented itself. After employing in vain every kind of peaceful remonstrance, and been subjected only to increased outrage, the Poles had taken up arms. It was incumbent, therefore, upon this country, in vindication of its own character and honour, to act, and to act promptly, on this occasion. He did not say that we should rush headlong into war; but the Government must be the best judges of the right mode of interfering, and the onus of doing so judiciously and effectually ought to be thrown upon them. If Poland were restored to independence, she would be a friend to this country in any European troubles, and an important trade with her might easily be developed. Looking back to the past history of Poland, it would be found that she had always exhibited a tendency towards free trade, while Russia was one of the most decidedly protectionist Powers of the day. With a free Poland, then, England would be likely to have secured a considerable increased custom for her manufactures, while we should have additional facilities for procuring those raw materials which we required. Setting aside, then, all feeling of sympathy or philanthropy, and looking at the question merely in a practical and commercial point of view, there was every reason why we should lend our aid towards the re-establishment of Polish independence. The line of conduct, he might add, which Prussia was pursuing in the case of the Poles was an eternal disgrace to her Government. She was, to use a vulgar phrase, holding a candle to the Devil, and he thought she would before long find enough to do in settling accounts with her own people. Meantime, however, with France on our side, and with Austria ready, as he believed she was, to assist us in bringing about a satisfactory solution of the Polish question, he had not the slightest doubt that we might in conjunction with those two Powers effect much in that direction. If in concert England, France, and Austria were to come to the resolution to insist that Russia should either take the alternative of adhering honestly to the Treaty of Vienna, or be prepared to see them come to the support of Poland in the endeavour to win her freedom, we might depend upon it that there would be no war—that Russia would either do justice to Poland or she would be set altogether free; and in contributing to the accomplishment of that result we should have acquired for ourselves not only the gratitude of Poland and the thanks of the world, but we should have done more to secure the future peace of Europe than if the House of Commons were to hesitate for ever about the mere drawing up of a Resolution.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, I should be sorry that this debate should be closed without my having asked permission of the House to address to it a few observations. My hon. Friend the Member for the King's County, has received a deserved tribute of admiration and gratitude from all those who have addressed the House this evening, for bringing under our consideration to-night, in a speech not more remarkable for its judgment and its discretion than for its information and ability, this important subject. I am sure he also deserves the thanks of every friend of Poland for his exertions in her cause, not only upon this but upon former occasions ; and he deserves the thanks of every one who has the peace of Europe at heart—that peace which I believe in my conscience can never be thoroughly secured so long as the ulcer of Polish oppression is allowed to fester in the heart of the Continent. I am sure also that he deserves the thanks of the House for the persistence with which he has, year after year, brought forward this question. He has now so impressed that question on the attention of the House, that instead of addressing a few Members scattered at frequent intervals upon the benches of this House ; he is this evening enabled to lay the wrongs of Poland before a full and attentive House. I say emphatically, he deserves most truly the gratitude of every friend of Poland. Sir, this question has certainly assumed a different complexion to-night from that which it has borne in former years. In former years this was a question that was classed among measures advocated by those who were by politicians spoken of as being of a rather enthusiastic turn. Every one who admires the bravery of the Polish nation, their love of country, which nothing has been able and nothing will ever be able to extinguish ; their patience under suffering, their enthusiastic resistance to tyranny—and every Englishman admires qualities like these—cannot fail to express his sympathy for the Polish cause whenever an opportunity occurs in this House. But now, as the hon. Member for the King's County, has pointed out, the question has entered into a different phase ; and I believe that, instead of its being a question reserved for the consideration only of the generous and the enthusiastic, there is no more practically urgent question at this time demanding the attention of the statesmen of Europe than the position of the Polish people. And this consideration becomes more important to us when we reflect that at this moment, I believe, the solution of this question rests, in a great degree, with Her Majesty's Government. I believe that at no time and upon no question, has there been among us a more solemn sense of responsibility than now presses on England with regard to Poland. Now, Sir, let us look for a moment at what is the position of France in regard to this question, and what is now passing in that country. The hon. Member for the King's County has pointed out—what we all know—the enthusiasm that has always been felt for the Polish cause among every class of the French people, the generous sympathy which has always been expressed at the sufferings of the Polish people. What has of late taken place ? Every one whom I have the honour of addressing, knows what, for a length of time, has been the position of the press in France. Upon no question either of internal or external policy had the expression of an opinion been allowed in the French press : reports had been criticised and curtailed before they were allowed to be published : if the rules and regulations of the Minister of the Interior were broken, a warning was sent to the offending journal, and, sooner or later, the result was its suspension. But those who have remarked what has been lately going on in France, must have observed that the tone and temper of the French journals has altogether changed. In the case of the Polish insurrection, from the first the papers were allowed to publish exact reports of everything that was said ; comments next made their appearance ; and now, so far from being limited to comment and report, there is scarcely a journal in France that does not express in burning language the enthusiastic sympathy of the French people with Poland, and call on the Government to give expression to that enthusiasm and to that sympathy. In this, I think a significant proof is furnished of what it may be assumed is the latent opinion of the Government of France. But let us consider for one moment what may be the possible effect of this stirring up these enthusiastic feelings in France upon the course of the French Government, and consequently upon the state of the affairs of Europe. It is perfectly possible that this sympathy and this enthusiasm in the cause of Poland, may give such impulse to the French Government, that instead of taking that position which, I think, the French Government is anxious to take, of acting in diplomatic concert with Her Majesty's Government, and giving the fullest support to the Polish cause, the French Government may find themselves in the position of having a public opinion in France too strong for them to resist ; and then consequences may occur to Europe of an importance that cannot be magnified, results that it is fearful to contemplate at this time ; and it would be a poor consolation for us to reflect that it was owing to the timidity of an English House of Commons, and the over-caution of a Liberal Administration, that such consequences had resulted. Again, let us look for one moment at the position of Austria. My hon. Friend the Member for the King's County has pointed out with the greatest truth what are the traditions of that empire. But this must always be remembered with reference to Austria and to the politics of that part of Europe—it can never be expected that on a question of this kind Austria should take the initiative. On the one side she has Russia, and on the other France ; and her whole policy has been a consideration how best to promote her own policy by acting in concert with the most powerful party. Therefore, there is nothing more important than that England should take the initiative and join with France ; and I am as firmly convinced as I can be of anything not capable of mathematical proof, that if we take such a course, in common with France, Austria will not only be willing, but will be anxious to give her co-operation on behalf of Poland. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman), the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes), and the hon. Member for Berks (Mr. Walter), now find fault with the Resolution of my hon. Friend because it is too strong. It meant war, said the hon. Member for Tiverton, or it meant nothing. I differ from that opinion. More than that—it appears to me impossible for any one to agree to the statement of facts contained in the Resolution and then to be satisfied with the lame and impotent conclusion at which the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton would have the House arrive—that we should conclude by saying that these things “deserve the early attention of Her Majesty's Government.” What does the first part of the Resolutions embody ? It contains a statement that the great Powers of Europe entered into a solemn compact and agreement intended for the pacification of Europe, and that to it all the great Powers were bound : it goes on to say that this compact has been flagrantly and notoriously violated by the Government of Russia ; that this conduct on the part of Russia has been stigmatized by the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government in the most solemn terms ; and having said that the treaty was intended to pacify Europe, that all the Powers of Europe were parties, and that its obligations have been violated, we are to come to the weak and impotent conclusion that Her Majesty's Government are to take these circumstances into their early consideration.

MR. DENMAN : The words I wished to introduce were much stronger. The words were—“the serious and immediate consideration of Her Majesty's Government.”

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD : It does not help the hon. and learned Gentleman much to say that when the law of Europe has been trampled upon for a number of years, the matter deserves the serious and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government. The objections that are taken to the Resolutions were two-fold. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton objects that our proceedings should take the shape of a Resolution, and not of an Address to the Crown. I must entirely differ from him on that point. In the first place, an Address to the Crown is a more solemn proceeding than a Resolution of this House ; and I wish the House of Commons to proceed in the most emphatic and solemn manner possible. But beyond that, Her Majesty is a party to the treaty which has been violated ; and it was against her that the most flagrant breach of public faith has been committed. And therefore I say the right form of proceeding is the Resolution for an Address to Her Majesty. But we are told that intervention necessarily means war. Why ? Surely there are solemn cases demanding the interposition of England which can be made without meaning war, or expressing, as an hon. Gentleman opposite said, a determination on the part of this country never to go to war. Here is a treaty to which all the Powers of Europe are parties, and by which they are bound. Would it not be a solemn interposition to call together the parties to that treaty, and in the face of Europe to charge the Russian Government with falsity to their obligations ? Would that not be an interposition on the part of this country that could not fail to have an immediate and important effect on the public opinion of Europe and, I believe, of Russia ? And is not the course proposed, that we should act in harmony with France, in harmony with Austria, in harmony with the great Powers of Europe—is not that an interposition of England in vindication of her own public faith and solemn engagement? I, for one, return my thanks to the hon. Member for the King's County, who has brought this question before us in the way he has done. I thank him personally for the opportunity which he has afforded me of expressing opinions which I deeply feel. Only this morning I saw one of the most distinguished Poles—whose name is a passport to the confidence of his fellow-countrymen and to the admiration of Europe as a pure and sincere patriot—and he told me that for years he had cherished the certainty in his heart that Poland would be restored to the family of nations. He said he felt her cause was just, and, being just, sooner or later Providence, in its own good time, would bring about its consummation; and now, he added, that time has arrived. I implore the House of Commons not, by refusing to assent to this Address, to daunt that hope and that expectation.

MR. STANSFELD said, that if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hordsham (Mr. Seymour FitzGerald) was justified, as he thought he was, in tendering thanks to the hon. Member for the King's County, he might be permitted to make his acknowledgments, not for the ability with which the hon. Member had spoken, but for the opportunity given to the right hon. Gentleman to utter those generous words which deserved all their sympathy. They had to deal with questions of fact, and with the grave question, what course, in this emergency, the House of Commons ought to pursue. There could be hardly any doubt about the facts, and, in spite of the opinions of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) he did not think there could be any serious difference of opinion upon the character of the proceedings of the Russian Government. The insurrection was caused—nay, was compelled by the conscription. The Poles had no choice but to rise. An ordinary conscription was levied on the whole male population of a whole country by lot, with protection against chance bearing too hardly upon the members of one family, and with the privilege of providing substitutes. This conscription for the Russian army was levied upon the population only of the towns of Poland, without any exemptions, and every man was, in fact, named by the Russian Police. They all knew how this conscription, if it could be so called, was carried out on the night of the 14th of January. It amounted, neither more nor less, to the wholesale deportation of the élite of the youth of Poland. It was a barefaced scheme—a barefaced device—for sweeping into one huge net all that was patriotic, all that was free-spirited, and all that was progressive in the country; a device for carrying away bodily all who were the promise of their country, and for consigning them to a doom which every Polish mother would feel was worse than death. To such a conscription it was simply an impossibility to submit, and the Poles had no choice but to resist. He would not dwell upon the heroism displayed by the Poles in the unequal struggle. It had been, in the beginning at least, almost an unarmed insurrection; for their cannons were made from the tree which but yesterday flourished in the forest, and their guns had been snatched from the hands of a soldiery very numerous, infinitely better disciplined and armed, against whom they had unhesitatingly marched, some with the national weapon, the scythe, but some—he spoke the literal fact—with only clubs in their hands. He would not stay to dwell on the well-known heroism of the Poles; he preferred to hasten onward to a question which it appeared to him of the highest importance that they should know how to regard in the discussion in which they were engaged that night. He wanted to know what were the motives of the conscription. He desired to ascertain how it was that Russia was tempted to pursue a course which had roused the indignant wonder of the whole civilized world. Was it wanton—was it an unreasoning and capricious act? Was it one of those acts of arbitrary blind cruelty which the possession of despotic power sometimes tempted its possessors to indulge? He thought that was not the real character of the act, and he considered it of the utmost importance that they should inquire as to the origin of such a proceeding. After the failure of the insurrection of 1830, and after the European movement of 1848 and 1849 had passed over without any overt response on the part of the Polish people, there were perhaps not many who did not begin at least to fear that the life of a nation had been too successfully crushed out. If they did entertain that fear, the movement of the last two years

must have convinced them that that fear was unfounded. And let him, in passing, ask the attention of the House to the new character of that movement—to the hopeful and vital character of a movement which included within itself, and which he might say originated with, and was directed by, the middle classes, for the first time coming upon the battle-field in that unhappy country. He said this movement which was now going on must have convinced them that that fear was unfounded. Well, if that were so, was it not clear that there were only two courses open to the Czar? If Russia were not prepared to retrace her steps, and to go back, if not to the constitution of the ancient kingdom of Poland, at least to what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) desired that she should do, the observance of the treaty stipulations by which she was bound—if, he said, Russia were not prepared to retrace her steps, it was necessary for her to meet this portentously rising movement by some definitive policy; and if she could not avert it, it must ultimately be quenched in blood. Now, the peculiar misfortune of the Polish people was this—that to execute that purpose a Polish nobleman had been found—a man of undoubted ability, a man of great force of character and will, but a man of arrogant and perverted views. He would now make a statement which he thought no one would be able to contradict; he ventured to say that when Count Wielopolski accepted the position of Civil Governor of Poland, the faculty in reserve of levying this conscription in the very manner in which it had been brought about was one of the terms of his appointment. If there should be any doubt as to the predetermination in this matter of the Russian Government, there was ample evidence to confirm the view which he took. In the month of November last a private circular was issued from the Department of Home Affairs in Poland to the civil Governors of that kingdom. With the permission of the House he would read one or two passages from that document—

"Considering," it said, "that the persons whose business it would be to select persons for the military conscription from the nominal lists drawn up with this object should possess the necessary information, not only respecting the social position and occupation of those included in such lists, but also of their political conduct; and inasmuch as one of the chief principles and objects of this conscription is to get rid of those people who by their conduct have disturbed public order, these functions are to be performed—"

Mr. Stansfeld

Then the letter went on to indicate the persons who were to make out those lists. A little further on was the following:—

"The Council of Administration also brings to notice that it will be the duty of every recruiting district to provide a certain number of recruits, who shall be especially chosen from among people having no permanent occupation, without work, and at the same time unfavourably noted as to their political conduct during the late events."

Then the document concluded by impressing the necessity of the closest secrecy in the preparation of the lists—

"Finally," so ended the despatch, "you will warn the employés concerned that the business relating to the conscription should be carried on with the greatest quickness, energy, and firmness of conduct, and that all instances of neglect or failure in this matter will entail severe responsibility on their authors."

If that were not confirmatory evidence enough of the predetermination in this matter of the Russian Government, he might refer to an article in the official journal of St. Petersburg of the 5th of February, in which the writer admitted that this measure of conscription was abnormal, in which he designated it as a political act, and in which he justified it on this ground:—That it not being possible to reach the heads of the insurrectionary movement, it was necessary to make an example, and to collect and remove their miserable instruments who still remained within reach of the Russian Government. He said, then, that this act of the Russian Government was no wanton and unconsidered act; he said it was not an act which admitted of facile reparation, or of avoidance in the future. On the contrary, it was the consummation of a predetermined and deliberate policy. He had almost said that it was the consummation of an inevitable policy. Three great Powers had combined in the original crime of the partition of Poland, and the rest of Europe looked on. Then, after the long wars of Napoleon, came the peace and the Treaties of 1815, when, if there had been virtue—he would say common sense—enough, in the councils of the great Powers, that great error and that great crime would have been redressed. But that occasion was also passed over. Hence they had the movement of 1830; and after a long and weary interval of apparent, but only apparent, submission, they had this new and still more promising and pregnant movement, this insurrection which now existed on Polish soil. That insurrection, it was too true, might, like former ones, he quenched in blood ; but it would without doubt leave behind it some spark of life, some smouldering fire, sooner or later to burst into a flame which might well become a European conflagration. He desired to take no mere enthusiast's view of this question. He did not, in any degree, ignore the difficulty which must be felt by statesmen to surround its solution ; but this at least he would venture to say, that it was impossible to state too strongly the claims of the Polish people on the ground of right, on the ground of treaties, on the grounds of their heroism and their sufferings. He would add, that it would be impossible for this House too loudly and too clearly to express its sympathy with the Polish cause ; and however great the difficulties of the solution of this question might be, he would say this to the noble Lord who presided over the councils of this country, that the Polish question had proved itself to be one of those great national questions of which it might be said, that until they were solved, they could have no sure and abiding peace. Now, there was another phase of this question upon which he would ask leave to say one or two words. Prussia had begun to play her part. He would not stop to apply to the part which Prussia had begun to play the epithets which would be necessary to define its character. Suffice it to say, that it constituted so flagrant an outrage upon what he would call the very decencies of international law and usage, and that no great Power could venture to overlook those proceedings without sharing in the shame. Prussia had been volunteering the part of spy and gendarme to Russia. She listened for the footfall of those noble Polish youths, who, urged on by an irrepressible instinct, hurried across her soil to seek their fathers' home ; she waylaid, she entrapped, she made prisoners of those young men ; and, without the slightest evidence even of the crime of a patriotic intent, she handed them over the frontier to the tender mercies of the Czar. Then there was the convention which had been recently concluded between Prussia and Russia. Was there ever such a degradation heaped upon an enlightened nation by those who should be the guardians and protectors of its honour ? Their own soil to be made human shambles, upon which a brutal and foreign soldiery were to come to pursue and slaughter defenceless fugitives ! If England could brook such acts as those, then, he said, the day of shame in England was come—the time was then come when it would be well that we should at once make confession of our impotence of power or of will, and turning our backs upon Europe, should sit down and count the profits of honour abandoned, and of the most sacred duties of a nation despised and set at naught. It seemed to him that some action on the part of the Government of this country, and some action on the part of that House were imperative in that emergency. Coming now to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he must admit that there were in his mind objections to its concluding paragraph. He did not know how they were in a matter of this grave importance to tie the hands of a Government, in which he presumed they all meant in this case to confide ; for to no Government in which they could not confide would he intrust the treatment of so difficult a question. But there was another objection, from his own point of view, to the conclusion of the Motion. He did not know how far they would commit themselves by going back upon treaties which had been so often violated, if not without notice, certainly with impunity, by all the Powers of Europe. If he might venture to suggest the course of action for the Government of this country, he would, at least with reference to Prussia, take his stand upon a different, a clearer, and, as he thought, a higher ground. He would appeal to the principle of non-intervention—a principle recognised but only partially observed in the practice of European nations. He had long thought, that if there were a direction in which the course of the future of this country was clear—if there were a function specially fitted for this country to fulfil, one suited to her character, to her position, and to her power—one conducive more than anything else to the freedom and the independence of nations and to lasting peace, it was the practical assertion of that principle, without which the intercourse of nations was but anarchy upon an extended scale. To that principle he would make his appeal, and he ventured to express a confident opinion that that appeal would not be made in vain. Whether the protest of this country were made in conjunction with foreign Powers—and in that case it was needless to say it would have to be made with certain evidently requisite guarantees—or whether it were made, as he confessed to his mind appeared preferable, in the name of this country alone—

must have convinced them that that fear was unfounded. And let him, in passing, ask the attention of the House to the new character of that movement—to the hopeful and vital character of a movement which included within itself, and which he might say originated with, and was directed by, the middle classes, for the first time coming upon the battle-field in that unhappy country. He said this movement which was now going on must have convinced them that that fear was unfounded. Well, if that were so, was it not clear that there were only two courses open to the Czar? former ones, he quenched in blood ; but it would without doubt leave behind it some spark of life, some smouldering fire, sooner or later to burst into a flame which might well become a European conflagration. He desired to take no mere enthusiast's view of this question. He did not, in any degree, ignore the difficulty which must be felt by statesmen to surround its solution ; but this at least he would venture to say, that it was impossible to state too strongly the claims of the Polish people on the ground of right, on the ground of treaties, on the grounds of their heroism and their sufferings. He would add, that it would be impossible for this House too loudly and too clearly to express its sympathy with the Polish cause ; and however great the difficulties of the solution of this question might be, he would say this to the noble Lord who presided over the councils of this country, that the Polish question had proved itself to be one of those great national questions of which it might be said, that until they were solved, they could have no sure and abiding peace. Now, there was another phase of this question upon which he would ask leave to say one or two words. Prussia had begun to play her part. He would not stop to apply to the part which Prussia had begun to play the epithets which would be necessary to define its character. Suffice it to say, that it constituted so flagrant an outrage upon what he would call the very decencies of international law and usage, and that no great Power could venture to overlook those proceedings without sharing in the shame. Prussia had been volunteering the part of spy and gendarme to Russia. She listened for the downfall of those noble Polish youths, who, urged on by an irrepressible instinct, hurried across her soil to seek their fathers' home ; she waylaid, she entrapped, she made prisoners of those young men ; and, without the slightest evidence even of the crime of a patriotic intent, she handed them over the frontier to the tender mercies of the Czar. Then there was the convention which had been recently concluded between Prussia and Russia. Was there ever such a degradation heaped upon an enlightened nation by those who should be the guardians and protectors of its honour ? Their own soil to be made human shambles, upon which a brutal and foreign soldiery were to come to pursue and slaughter defenceless fugitives ! If England could brook such acts as those, then, he said, the day of shame

in England was come—the time was then come when it would be well that we should at once make confession of our impotence of power or of will, and turning our backs upon Europe, should sit down and count the profits of honour abandoned, and of the most sacred duties of a nation despised and set at naught. It seemed to him that some action on the part of the Government of this country, and some action on the part of that House were imperative in that emergency. Coming now to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he must admit that there were in his mind objections to its concluding paragraph. He did not know how they were in a matter of this grave importance to tie the hands of a Government, in which he presumed they all meant in this case to confide ; for to no Government in which they could not confide would he intrust the treatment of so difficult a question. But there was another objection, from his own point of view, to the conclusion of the Motion. He did not know how far they would commit themselves by going back upon treaties which had been so often violated, if not without notice, certainly with impunity, by all the Powers of Europe. If he might venture to suggest the course of action for the Government of this country, he would, at least with reference to Prussia, take his stand upon a different, a clearer, and, as he thought, a higher ground. He would appeal to the principle of non-intervention—a principle recognised but only partially observed in the practice of European nations. He had long thought, that if there were a direction in which the course of the future of this country was clear—if there were a function specially fitted for this country to fulfil, one suited to her character, to her position, and to her power—one conducive more than anything else to the freedom and the independence of nations and to lasting peace, it was the practical assertion of that principle, without which the intercourse of nations was but anarchy upon an extended scale. To that principle he would make his appeal, and he ventured to express a confident opinion that that appeal would not be made in vain. Whether the protest of this country were made in conjunction with foreign Powers—and in that case it was needless to say it would have to be made with certain evidently requisite guarantees—or whether it were made, as he confessed to his mind appeared preferable, in the name of this country alone—that protest, endorsed as it would be known to be by the unanimous adhesion of the people—that protest could not, he repeated, be made in vain. It could not fail to be of some real service to a gallant and outraged people—it could not fail to result in one step gained towards that which he believed to be essential to the future peace of Europe—towards the real and practical recognition of the principle and law of non-intervention as binding upon all the nations of the world.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that when he saw the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) rise to address the House, he could not look without a feeling approaching to consternation at the prospect of being compelled upon that occasion to vote with the eloquent and accomplished pupil of Mazzini. He had no doubt that he should have to go into the same lobby upon that question with several Gentlemen with whom he did not ordinarily agree; and he was therefore desirous of explaining the grounds on which he should support the Motion. He had never before heard a debate in which so much unanimity prevailed. Every Member who had addressed the House sympathized deeply with the sufferings of the Poles. The debate had been all on one side, with the exception of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate).

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to explain. He had done no more than express a hope that the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), who he thought might be trusted on that question, would use all his influence for the purpose of mitigating the present state of things in Poland.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he was glad to be corrected, and to know that so far not one single voice had been raised to defend the conduct of Russia, or to express anything but the deepest sympathy for the sufferings of the Polish people. It was hardly possible, indeed, to conceive any assembly of free men, enjoying peace in their own homes, not sympathizing with such sufferings. It would seem as if the hordes of Zengis Khan had come to life again, and poured down upon the plains of unhappy Poland. If that were a rebellion of the ordinary kind, or even if it were a case of a Government striving to suppress a righteous insurrection of its subjects, however brutal might be the mode of its suppression, he should say it was not the duty of this country to interfere by word or deed. But this was not a case of ordinary insurrection, or of brutality practised by the governors on the governed. In the present case we had a direct locus standi, inasmuch as we were parties to a treaty by which the Emperor Alexander had solemnly engaged that Poland should obtain representative institutions. It was true that treaty had been violated as soon as it was made; but, nevertheless, it still existed. It was made under the sanction of England, and England was pledged in honour never to recognise any infraction, or to omit any legitimate opportunity of recording her indignation at the violation of that great act of international law. He had heard it remarked in the course of the discussion that the treaty had been too often broken to be of any value. That was a mode of arguing insulting to the honour and dignity of England. It was not our business to ask what had happened in other cases. We were bound by a covenant. Our honour was concerned in the fulfilment of a certain promise to which we were parties, and on every occasion when it was in our power we were bound to enforce that promise. It was asked what good could be done by a protest; and it was also said that the Resolution could only mean war. He could see no ground for that interpretation. In fact, even if justifiable, the idea of war was absurd. This country could not reach Poland, and a country which could not be reached by a maritime Power was not one for which we could properly make war. But the great point in this matter was that we were bound to record our protest against a great violation of public law. We were evidently on the eve of great events. The revolution in Poland did not seem likely to be soon suppressed. There was even a probability that it might pass into Russia; and there might possibly be a great disturbance of the European equilibrium. The policy which England now pursued would be that by which she would afterwards be bound, and which would ensure to her either the gratitude or the hatred of the populations concerned. No lapse of time could make a treaty nugatory. No neglect of the provisions of a treaty on former occasions could lessen the obligations of those who were parties to it. He would vote for the Motion, not merely because he sympathized deeply with the sufferings of the people of Poland, but because he desired to vindicate the honour, and dignity, and good faith of England.

Mr. Stansfeld

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he must confess that the arguments which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Cecil) had addressed to the House confirmed him in the belief that England was bound by treaty obligations to interfere; and if we abstained from interference on this occasion, we should make ourselves, to a certain extent, parties to the atrocities that had been inflicted by the Russians upon the Polish nation. Russia had proved, by the efforts of many years, her inability to govern Poland, and this was strongly felt by the Russians themselves. Russia was disorganized by the frequent attempts to crush the spirit of the Poles; the Russian army in Poland was far from being well-affected to the flag under which they served; and the civil service in Poland was so corrupt and unable to discharge the duties devolving upon it as to draw down shame upon the Government of the Emperor. Russia itself was tired of the strife, and this was evidently a time when the state of the country did afford considerable hope that any effort that was now made in the interest of Poland by the various Powers of Europe would be likely to prove successful; and, moreover, he thought it probable that Austria, the Northern States of Europe, and perhaps the whole of Germany, would be ready to combine to assist the Poles in resisting the Russian atrocities; for Poland, reconstituted into an independent kingdom, would form a most important barrier for Germany against Russia, which was at present advanced into the very heart of Germany. He thought that the part which Prussia had taken in this affair had drawn shame and disgrace—not upon the people, for he believed that the Prussian people disapproved of the conduct of the Government—but upon the Monarch and his Government. It should be remembered, with respect to the present strife in Poland, that there had been a fixed purpose on the part of the Russian Government to provoke the Polish nation into an insurrection. The Poles had acquired moral strength by the passive resistance which they had hitherto offered to the Russian rule, and the Russian Government had determined to break it. Domiciliary visits were paid to the inhabitants at the dead of night, in order that the police might satisfy themselves that the conscripts were in their places; and when the Polish noblesse, having been invited by the Russian Government to state their grievances, presented a respectful address, they were arrested and thrown into prison, and Count Zamayski, who presented it, was banished to England; and this must have been done by the Russian Government because they knew that these were the very men whose calmness and good sense would be exerted to prevent their countrymen from rising in insurrection. In fact, they must have desired to stir up the Poles to insurrection. He could not concur that the Polish insurrection was powerless against the Russian troops, but it certainly would be powerless unless it met with the assent and encouragement of Europe. It was his firm belief that that House had the power to induce the Government to unite with other Governments to give that encouragement to the Poles which would make the insurrection successful, or, at all events, enable them to prolong their resistance till the other Cabinets of Europe could intervene in a manner that was likely to be successful. It was our duty, alike from motives of policy and humanity, to try and put a stop to the horrors which were being perpetrated in the centre of Europe, and to demand that the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna should be observed. And if moral interference failed, the Government ought to show that they were ready to interfere in a material way, and to give assistance to those who were in arms to recover their rights. A doubt had been thrown out as to whether the Polish people were worthy of such assistance. He believed that they were; and that if liberty were granted to them, Europe would have no reason to regret it. The marked unanimity with which this subject had been discussed to-night ought to decide the Government to take that course. With them, in a great measure, rested the solution of this important question; and if they acted the part dictated alike by humanity and policy, they would be supported by the public opinion, not only of this country, but of every civilized nation in Europe.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he doubted much whether the part England had taken in this matter had been conducive to her character and high position. We had openly proclaimed our interest in the fate of Poland, and by words and the expression of public opinion had encouraged the Poles to look forward to the time when they might regain their liberty, and throw off the yoke of Russia.

which had for so long crushed them to the ground; but he had often reflected that all this was only outward display, and that we had never shown ourselves ready to act up to what we said. Poland's cup of bitterness was now full; and this was an occasion on which our Government might well come forward and say that the people of Poland should not drink that cup to the dregs. It would be for the noble Viscount the First Minister to tell them what had been done, and whether the Russian Government had offered any explanation of the course they took on the 14th January. What was the public opinion of Europe, the press had declared: it could no longer be concealed that this was a European question; and it depended on the course of our Government whether there should be an intervention to wrest Poland from her present difficulties and oppression, or whether these should some day be the cause of a general European war. They had been told that day that the alleged convention between Russia and Prussia was a mythical convention, and he hoped that that was so; but let it be remembered that the noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs, had said a few days ago in another place that he had understood from the Prussian Ambassador, that the Russians would be permitted by that convention to pursue the insurgent Poles, and take them prisoners if they could, on Prussian territory. From what had passed in the Prussian Chambers he hoped there had been some misunderstanding; but if such a convention had been made, he trusted that the Prussian Government, when it saw what were the opinions, not only of Europe, but also of the Prussian people, would withdraw from that convention before it was too late. In the able speech in which he had introduced the subject to the House, the hon. and learned Member for the King's County had referred to the Polish insurrection in 1831. At that time he (Sir Minto Farquhar) was attached to the Embassy at Vienna; and he remembered the interest with which he traced on the map the movements of the Russian and Polish armies. The Poles then had a large army, and the occasion was one on which European intervention might have led to satisfactory results; but neither England nor France was prepared to take active steps in favour of Poland, and the insurrection was suppressed. He had hoped, from the course that the Emperor of Russia had pursued towards the sorfs,

that he had made up his mind to adopt a more liberal policy towards Poland; and he could hardly believe it possible, when he heard of the proceedings of the 14th January, that they could have occurred in this civilized age. He was told that the invasion of the homes of Warsaw by the Russian soldiery took place in spite of the advice of Russians of high position. As this revolution had been well described as a revolution of despair, he trusted it would lead to the interference of Europe. He for one protested against the course which had been pursued, and he hoped that they would now hear from the Government that they too would protest against such acts of cruel oppression, and that, in conjunction with France, and, he hoped, Austria, a joint diplomatic intervention would take place which would show that Europe was not prepared to see the Poles oppressed any longer, and that thus at last the hopes they had always entertained would be fully realized.

MR. GRANT-DUFF said, many English and Irish Members have already risen in this debate. I rise as a Scotch Member to say that my countrymen also deeply sympathize in the Polish cause, and to express in their name the same sentiments which have been already repeated in every part of the House. I do not wish to say more upon the general question; but one or two points have incidentally risen in the debate about which I should like to say a few words. And, first, with regard to Prussia. I am extremely glad that every one who has addressed us to-night has drawn a strong distinction between the conduct of the Prussian Government and of the Prussian people. On a former occasion, when the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Cecil), drew attention to the misconduct of the Prussian Government, that distinction was unfortunately not so carefully made, and the result was an amount of bad feeling in Germany, which seriously for a time diminished our influence in that country, and did the greatest possible mischief. Sir, it is said that the Polish cause is not so popular in Germany as it is in England, and that is true to a certain extent; but here also a distinction must be taken. The Prussians think of the Poles chiefly as politicians, and as very impracticable, and sometimes very provoking, politicians; but, although disliking them as politicians, they know well, from their own experience, how to sympathize with brave men engaged in a struggle for their independence. Much has been said and written in Western Europe about Poland, but nothing, I think, that has been said or written upon that subject—not even those lines to which the hon. Member for the Queen's County so gracefully alluded at the close of his speech, have ever sunk so deeply into the heart of a nation, as those famous German lines which record the adventures, the achievements, and the fate of the 4th Polish Regiment. The hon. Member for Maidstone observed that, in the matter of this convention, it is the King who is to blame. That, Sir, is perfectly true, but he went on to say what was not equally correct. The King of Prussia has not always been the friend of the oppressor, and the enemy of the oppressed. During the Crimean war, he gained the greatest popularity, and put himself for a time at the head of the Liberal party in Germany, by opposing the Russian party, and protesting against the weak and vacillating conduct of his brother's ministers. It is since he came to the throne that he has fallen into the hands of bad advisers—of that detestable military clique which the people of Berlin so well call the 'Anti-intellect in uniform,' by whom he has been led to disgrace himself as a King, a German, and a man. I have only one other remark to make, and that is with regard to Russia. There is no doubt that this debate will be most carefully read at St. Petersburg, and it will have all the more effect there, from the fact that no expression has been used in it, which could lead any Russian to suppose that any of the irritation caused by the late war still lingers in our minds. In truth, Sir, we cannot too strongly express that we in England desire the prosperity, nay, even the aggrandisement of Russia. We desire to see her develop to the utmost her Greek and Slavonic civilization and we are well content to see her spread that civilization over the vast regions of Northern Asia; but we do not wish to see her, whilst she is still semi-barbarous, attempt to crush down the Latin civilization of Poland, a nation which has always been connected with the West, a nation which saved Central Europe in 1683. It is this which we think monstrous, and it is against this that we protest.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that the atrocious barbarities practised by the Russian Government, so revolting as they were to the sense of humanity, were only part of the Russian system, and the moment any country came under Russian rule, these cruelties followed in the natural course of things—the police dogged the steps of every man, and reported his doings in the secret bureau. Everything was ruled by the iron hand of despotism, and the possession of a constitution by an enlightened country under such a despotism was simply and radically incompatible with it. If, therefore, he were to treat this matter logically, he should be obliged to go further than the hon. and learned Member for the King's County, because these facts demonstrated that a civilized country like Poland ought not to be subjected to a barbarous Power like Russia. He was not at all inclined to take that favourable view of the Treaty of Vienna which had been taken by high authorities, and he much doubted whether any of their stipulations were worth much as a security for the liberties of the Poles. The expressions used were so entirely vague, and it was so entirely impossible to bring them down to any defined standard, that he attached very little value to them; and the circumstances under which the treaty was framed entirely confirmed that view. It was well known that it was the great object of Lord Castlereagh to exclude from the possession of Poland Alexander I., whose doctrine was that he was in possession, that he would restore the ancient limits of the kingdom, of which, being Czar of Russia, he would at the same time be King. Lord Castlereagh said it was impossible to have constitutional civilization separated merely by a national boundary from the despotism of Russia; and it was only after a secret treaty had been made in Lord Castlereagh's bedroom, during a ball at Vienna, between France, Austria, and this country, that any impression could be made on the Emperor Alexander. Unfortunately, those who were oppressed were always open to fallacious illusions held out to them by other people, and the Poles had always been open to them. They were the victims of the deception of Napoleon, who made use of their courage at every opportunity and then deserted them. They put faith in the promises of Alexander, welcomed the professions he made, and supported his power; but, by great efforts, Lord Castlereagh prevented the complete consummation of his views, and brought about that ineffective compromise which was to erect the duchy of Warsaw into a kingdom. But it was so inadequate to the aspirations of the Poles that it was a false and fictitious arrangement—like other fictions of the day, such as the suzerainty of the Porte over the Danubian Provinces, the British Protectorate over the Ionian Islands, and other similar expedients. Alexander did so far fulfil his promise to the Poles as to give them a nominal constitution, but he soon found himself in a collision with them which became perpetual; a revolution occurred, and it had since been held that that revolution annulled the treaty. At any rate, its arrangements were so insincere that it was impossible the Poles could derive any benefit from the treaty, and their aspirations were for the restoration of the original limits of the country. The whole question between Russia and Poland related to the province of Lithuania, and the offence in the address lately presented by the nobles to the Czar was the suggestion that Lithuania should be added to Poland, which was held to be treason. The Poles would not be content with the Duchy of Warsaw; they always referred to the treaty between Russia and Prussia supplemental to the Treaty of Vienna, in which the condition of the country previous to 1772 was referred to, although that reference only related to internal communication, and was, in fact, a mockery and an illusion; and to talk of anything less than that as likely ever to tranquillize or satisfy the Poles was perfectly futile.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that one fact stood out in clear relief in the debate—namely, that if the Government pursued a course consistent with the honour and dignity of England, they would receive the unanimous support and sympathy of the House, which, judging from the tone of the debate, reflected the unanimous feeling of the country. They had heard of conduct on the part of the Russian Government which brought a blush to every cheek, and of conduct on the part of the Prussian Government such as induced him to think that next to the Poles there was no people so much to be pitied as the Prussians. The conduct of the King of Prussia brought dishonour on the nation; and he hoped that the spirit of the Prussians would not be less than that of the Italians and the Greeks, and that they would vindicate in 1863 those principles which made them rise as one man in 1813; and he hoped that the first Protestant State in Europe would not be the last to accept constitutional government. England was, to a certain degree, responsible for the state of Poland. We were parties to the Treaties of 1815, and it should not be forgotten that England, France, and Austria agreed to furnish 150,000 troops each against Russia, in certain contingencies. It was that convention which saved the Grand Duchy of Posen from the grip of Russia, and preserved Saxony. The Emperor of Russia had obtained the large slice of Poland which was then allotted to him under false pretences, for he said he wished to unite all the Polish provinces under one Government and to give them a constitution; but the conditions under which he received it had all been violated. If he had given constitutional institutions to that country, the Czar would have secured not only an attached people, but he would have become the head of the Slavonic race, and advanced his own country to civilization. At the period of the revolution of 1831, the indignant protests of England had some influence on the Czar. Such a result should induce the House to support the Government in taking a vigorous stand upon this question; and if they could not procure the restoration of Polish nationality, which would be most difficult, and which must, he feared, be fought out between Russia and Poland, the united protests of England, France, and Austria would surely have an effect upon the councils of Russia and Prussia, and at least obtain for Poland some of those institutions which had been guaranteed by treaty. Every debate in this House ought to have, as far as possible, a practical issue, and the Government ought, in conformity with the feeling of the House, at once to protest indignantly against the conduct of Prussia, which had been quite contrary to the usages of modern international law. As to Russia, the Government should unite with France and Austria—not in demanding the performance of the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815, for they could scarcely expect France, whose cry for the last ten years had been, “A bas les Traités de 1815!”—but in protesting against the treatment of the Poles, and in asking that the nation should receive a constitutional government. If this were done, the revolution might have an auspicious ending, and the free institutions conferred upon Poland might open the way for the grant of the same privileges to Russia herself. With regard to the Resolutions, feeling the utmost confidence in the noble Viscount, he should be unable to vote for the last paragraph, and he hoped, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would substitute a paragraph expressive of that confidence, thus enabling the whole House to join in a unanimous vote on this subject.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he entirely adopted the last paragraph of the Resolution of his hon. Friend (Mr. Hennessey), and thought the House would come to a lame conclusion if, after admitting the preamble of the Address, and expressing a unanimous feeling in favour of this oppressed and afflicted nation, they did not come to something like a practical conclusion on the subject. It might be, that if there had been no treaties to which England was a party, it would not be our province to interfere; but there were treaties to which we were party, and which guaranteed certain rights to the oppressed Polish nation. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had formerly declared that there had been an infraction of treaties and a violation of rights, but since he made that declaration there had been a still grosser violation of those rights. It was not right to say that his hon. Friend asked the House to pledge itself to a vote of hostility against Russia, but he did ask the Government to interfere. And, surely, there was no Government which was more accustomed to interfering with other countries than the Government which now occupied the official benches. The noble Lord's Government was frankly invited not to send bayonets but to make representations of the strong and indignant feeling of the country against continued oppression, and to do on behalf of England what the other nations of Europe were doing to express sympathy with the oppressed, and to restrain the hand of the oppressor from further violence. They all knew that the noble Lord had interfered, and sometimes when it was believed by some persons such interference was not warranted; but if ever there was a case where interference was not only justified but commanded, the case of Poland was that one. There had appeared in The Times an important document, a confidential report of the civil Governor of Lublin to the authorities at Warsaw, seeking the protection of the Russian Government for the citizens against the troops sent to suppress the insurrection. That report showed a state of things which called for the interference of every humane Government. It stated—

"On the 5th, about 5 a.m., a detachment of the Imperial army, consisting of infantry and Cossacks, surrounded the town of Tomaszow on all sides. The insurgents, some of whom were on guard and the rest in the barracks, perceiving this, assembled, and, after pushing through the ranks of the troops, took up a position outside the town. After a few shots on both sides, the army, not attempting to pursue the insurgents, rushed into the town, and fired several strong volleys with their rifles at the houses occupied by employés and citizens, after which the soldiers scattered themselves over all the streets of the town, and began to rob and murder innocent and unarmed people."

The document gave a long list of victims, and concluded with a long and detailed description of the miserable condition of the whole neighbourhood, which had been desolated and deprived of its inhabitants, who, taking with them all they could, fled, no one knew whither, before the robbing and murdering soldiery. The Polish nation wanted no armed intervention, because they desired to achieve their own independence; but if the facts stated by his hon. Friend were true, and they were admitted to be so, then the Parliament of Great Britain ought to do something more than pass a mere vague Resolution. If the Government did not interfere now, they must never speak of sympathy for oppressed nationalities and struggling peoples. The Government would falsify all their past professions, and disappoint the people of this country, if they did not adopt some practical Resolution upon the present occasion.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I never listened to a debate in which I have heard more unanimity and more discord. There has been the greatest possible unanimity of sentiment, and the greatest possible diversity of opinion as to the nature of the practical resolution which we should adopt under the circumstances in which Europe is now placed. We are painfully unanimous in the deep sympathy expressed for the much-oppressed, much-suffering people of Poland. We are indignantly unanimous at the terrible oppression which has now been wrought upon that people more violently than ever—crushed as they are under the iron heel of Russia in a manner more cruel even than has been inflicted upon them before. And we are, I think, sadly unanimous in thinking that there is another Power, with whom we are nearly allied, which has been betrayed into what I could almost call a mean and infatuated compact with reference to a people over part of whom she reigns herself, and with the rest of whom she ought to sympathize by every feeling of honour. Thus far we are unanimous. The real question seems to be how we are practically to deal with this subject, and what is the practical test to which we should bring it. Now, here arises an amount of diversity equal to the unanimity which has been expressed by the House upon the former point. My hon. Friend the Member for the King's County, in a speech which does him infinite credit for its ability, for its information, for the knowledge it evinced, and for its extraordinary temper and moderation, concluded his Resolution with a paragraph concerning which two of his supporters can so little agree as to its meaning and purport, that while one of them, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman), thinks it so weak as to require strengthening, the other, the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. Fitzgerald), thinks it so strong, that if acted upon—and I confess I concur in that opinion—it must, if not necessarily, at least probably, lead to war.

MR. DENMAN: I certainly did not consider the Resolution too weak; on the contrary, I objected to it because I felt that such a Resolution could not be on the records of this House without meaning almost immediate war.

MR. WALPOLE: That observation was confirmed by the proposition of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter); and this should lead us to consider whether at this moment we are prepared to adopt a Resolution which will inevitably lead you step by step into war. Before we arrive at that conclusion we ought to pause. My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham, in one of those speeches which come home to the heart of every one, for the feeling and ability it displayed, has recommended us to press on the Government the propriety of offering, in conjunction with France and Austria, an immediate remonstrance; and, possibly, that would be the most effective course. But I apprehend that this Resolution would lead to a war—that the concurrence of three Powers remonstrating with such a Power as that remonstrated against would lead to a war which would not end in freeing the Poles, but which might end in a war which we do not intend or contemplate, probably in the Rhenish provinces. The hon. Gentleman opposite says—but I do not think he could have seriously intimated it to the House—he thinks that we should add to the Resolution that we will proceed on the principle of non-intervention. My noble Friend the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) urged an argument which would lead us immediately into action, if it were an argument solely applicable to the present difficulty. He told us there is such a violation of treaties and engagements that we are bound in honour and public faith to take up this question immediately. Well, but I ask you—these treaties and engagements having been violated for forty-five years, why this argument was not as applicable during that time as now, when the matter has assumed a new phase owing to the misconduct of Russia? Well, the two last hon. Gentlemen who have spoken have stated their desire to bring the question to a practical conclusion. I believe the most practical conclusion you can bring this question to is not to destroy the unanimity of this House, which will go out to Europe and the world—do not, I say, destroy that unanimity by anything which shall seem to approach to anything like division among you. The question, therefore, seems to me to resolve itself into this. Is the Government prepared to echo the sentiments which have been expressed in this House? If they are prepared to echo those sentiments, is the House prepared or not to leave to them the responsibility of enforcing those sentiments? I think there is danger in this House assuming a responsibility it cannot exercise for itself; and I think there is no danger in leaving the responsibility to the Government, who have expressed themselves already upon this question in terms as cogent and forcible as any that have been used in this debate; and I, for one, am prepared to support the Government in leaving to them the responsibility, if they will only give an assurance to the House that they will honestly carry it out.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Sir, it is natural, on a subject which excites so much feeling, not only in this country but on the Continent, and especially in a neighbouring nation, that this House should re-echo the sentiment which prevails so strongly out of doors; and I must do the hon. Member who moved these Resolutions the justice to say, that in the manner in which he has brought the matter forward there was nothing of which anybody had a right to complain. With regard to myself, who have been quoted by the hon. Member, both as to what I have said and what I have written,

Mr. Walpole

I have only to say that I do not stand here to unsay anything which I may formerly have said, nor to retract anything which I may formerly have written. The Governments of which I have been a Member have always entertained the opinion which it was my duty to express, that in this matter of Poland, the engagements of the Treaty of Vienna, especially as regards Russia, have been systematically and long violated. It is impossible not to feel the deepest sympathy for the Polish nation. They have for a century been most singularly unfortunate. They were unfortunate before the Partition in having a constitution which, whatever some of its merits may have been, was tainted with the gravest possible defects. They were unfortunate in the successive Partitions which deprived them of their nationality. They were unfortunate when the First Napoleon entered the Polish territory on his way to Russia, because he did not then think it expedient to take advantage of that occupation for the purpose of restoring Poland either to entire or modified nationality. They were unfortunate at the Congress of Vienna, because at that time, however anxious the British Plenipotentiary was to restore Poland to a considerable degree of nationality, the power of Russia prevented it, and when Lord Londonderry (then Lord Castlereagh) urged certain conditions, the answer of the Emperor of Russia was, "I have 200,000 men in Poland, and I cannot agree to the proposal you make." They were unfortunate afterwards, inasmuch as the good and liberal intentions which I believe animated the Emperor Alexander at the time when the Treaty of Vienna was signed were not afterwards adhered to and carried into execution. It is well known that at the time the late Prince Czartoryski was the confidential adviser of the Emperor of Russia, and you see in the provisions of the first article of the Treaty of Vienna the hand of a friend to Poland—a person interested, who looked forward to a better futurity for his countrymen—for in that Article it is said that the Emperor of Russia reserves to himself to give such internal extension to the kingdom of Poland as he may think fit; the meaning of which, I believe, was, that the Emperor contemplated at that time adding to the kingdom of Poland some of the ancient provinces which had been incorporated in the Russian Empire. But, Sir, it is the fate of despotic Governments that much depends on personal influence; and when personal advisers change, the policy of the Government changes too, and so it happened these good intentions were laid aside. And although a constitution was given to the kingdom of Poland in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Vienna, yet that constitution soon became a dead letter, and in the administration of the kingdom of Poland under the Grand Duke Constantine, there were grievances that justified the insurrection which took place in 1831. Then, Sir, I say, it is impossible for any man seeing, on the one hand, the great and distinguished qualities that belonged to the Polish nation, and, on the other, the calamities which from time to time have befallen them, not to take a deep and lively interest in their fate.

We have been reproached in some degree by the hon. Member for the King's County, for not having in 1831 and 1832 availed ourselves of a communication made by France for the purpose of inviting some action at that time in favour of the Poles, then in arms against Russia. We had at that time to consider a great many balanced circumstances and motives; and with every disposition to do what we might think useful to Poland, we did not think that particular proposal was one which would have led to any good or useful result. It might have embarrassed us on other questions then pending, and could not, as far as we could foresee, be attended with any good practical result to the Poles themselves. We therefore declined at that time to interfere otherwise than diplomatically, but we have always held that the conduct of Russia towards Poland has been a violation of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna. Prussia and Austria have not been liable to the same degree of reproach. Literally they have carried into execution, in regard to their respective portions of Poland, the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna, because in the duchy of Posen and Galicia there is a national representation sitting in the aggregate Parliament; the language is preserved, the religion is respected, and the rights and privileges stipulated have been enjoyed. And, speaking of Prussia, I must here remark, that however we may condemn the spirit and intention of that convention which we understand was signed lately between Prussia and Russia, I am inclined to think, from information we have received, that the apprehensions which we have been led to entertain with regard to that convention are not likely to be realized in the result. I believe that convention has not been ratified—no ratifications have been exchanged, and I am inclined to think, not only from what passed in the Prussian Chambers, but also from the information we have received, that it is not likely that convention will, in its objectional parts, be carried practically into execution. I am speaking, however, not officially, but from information we have received; for we have not yet had a copy of the convention itself. I trust that it may be so; because such an interference of Prussia with what is now passing in Poland would excite, as it has already excited, great condemnation everywhere; and if that conventional interference were followed by acts, it would cast discredit on the Government of Prussia. Sir, the present Emperor of Russia has, in regard to Poland, been placed in a very difficult position. It is a great misfortune for anybody to succeed to an inheritance of triumphant wrong; and it is difficult for a person so circumstanced to disentangle himself from the poisonous folds of so fatal a bequest. There is in the mind of man a strong passion—a determination—to maintain and to vindicate his own personal liberties; but there is also a strong passion, and I doubt whether it is not as strong a passion, which makes men cling to the power of exercising oppression on others; and when long-rooted habits have accustomed the authorities of a Government to administer a tyrannical system, it requires great perseverance and activity on the part of the Sovereign to undo the evil and restore things to their proper condition. I do believe that the present Emperor of Russia, a kind-hearted and benevolent man, does mean, and has meant for some time past, to improve the condition of his Polish subjects. That would be in perfect unison with the system on which he is governing his Russian subjects. The Sovereign who has emancipated the serfs—the Sovereign who is establishing a system of jurisprudence founded upon an imitation of the best judicial codes of Europe—a Sovereign who is introducing into his Russian dominions a vast number of modern improvements—cannot surely have it in his heart intentionally and systematically to crush and oppress any portion of his subjects, whether Russian or Polish. Well, Sir, there can be no doubt that this last act, called a conscription, but which has elsewhere been more properly designated a proscription, was an act wholly foreign to that disposition which, I believe, really animates the breast of the Emperor of Russia; and it accounts entirely for the outbreak which has occurred in Poland. It was a most barbarous measure—it was a most cruel piece of political tyranny under the semblance of a merely military arrangement. No wonder that the Poles should have taken up arms to prevent the further execution of a measure of that kind. I believe that, as far as one hears, that has in some degree now been stopped, and has ceased.

But, Sir, the question mooted by the Resolution before us relates to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to communications about to be made to Russia. Now, I cannot conceive that a Sovereign gifted with the qualities which I believe are possessed by the Emperor of Russia, should not see that, in the contest in which he is now unfortunately engaged with the Polish nation, military success would be a great and signal calamity. Why, what would be the effect of military success—what would be the result if, by the action of his troops—by the overpowering force of the 100,000 men who had been sent to Poland—he were entirely to suppress and put down this extensive insurrection? Why, he would have a country in which the desert plains would be bathed in blood—in which there would be nothing seen but the smoking ashes of ruined villages and towns. Is that an object which any Sovereign can wish to arrive at, and should he deem it an advantage to him to obtain a success of that kind? Sir, if the Emperor of Russia saw his own interest—and we give him credit for being an enlightened man—he would think the course best calculated for his own advantage—the course best adapted to secure the permanence of his own authority as well as to promote the happiness of his people—would be to put an end to that revolt by an act of generous amnesty, and by, at the same time, re-establishing in Poland those institutions which the Emperor Alexander gave in execution of the Treaty of Vienna. I cannot believe but that, if that were done, peace would be restored in Poland, and might continue to exist there, and that Europe might be saved from those disturbances which the continued misgovernment of Poland, and the discontent thereby engendered among the Poles, cannot fail to reproduce from year to year, as has been the case in years that have gone by.

But, with regard to the particular Motion of the hon. Member for the King's County, I should hope that he would be satisfied with the unanimous expression of opinion which has been the result of this discussion, and not press to a division the Resolution he has placed, Sir, in your hands. The objections to this Motion are really very great. It proceeds upon an erroneous foundation. The hon. Member assumes that by the Treaty of Vienna we are under an obligation to interfere in the affairs of Poland. We have a right to interfere, but we are under no obligation to do so. And although to those who have not turned their minds to diplomatic document this may appear to be a nice distinction, yet there is a real, substantial, and most important distinction between treaties which give you the right to interfere and those which impose on you the obligation to interfere. Now, in the Treaty of Vienna—in that treaty of June 15—there is only one obligation by which we should be compelled to interfere in a case that might arise—namely, that article of the treaty which stipulates that the Powers guarantee to Prussia the continued possession of the portion of Saxony which was allotted to Prussia by that arrangement. But there was no guarantee whatever in the engagement which relates to the kingdom of Poland, nor in any other part of the treaty—except, indeed, that which concerns the independence and integrity of Switzerland. Now, the hon. Gentleman throughout his Resolution proceeds on the assumption that we are under an obligation to interfere; and, consistently with that assumption, in the concluding passage he calls upon the Government to interpose, and vindicate the public faith and solemn engagements of the Crown. Why, Sir, if in truth we were under an obligation to interfere, the Resolution would be right and fitting, and would, as has been observed by hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in this debate, amount to this—that unless the remonstrance which might be made in virtue of that obligation were attended with success, the Crown would be compelled to call upon this House to give it the means of enforcing by arms those stipulations, the just fulfilment of which was refused when urged by diplomatic communication. Therefore, there is that grave objection to that particular Motion of the hon. Member. And if, as I think everybody must admit, unanimity is desirable, we already see that there have been two or three Amendments proposed to his Resolution, and that consequently it is not likely either one or other of the three would secure the unanimous assent of this House. There are other less material criticisms to be made. The hon. Member proposes that which I believe to be unusual—namely, to record, in an Address of this House, quotations from Hansard of that which a Member of this House may or may not have spoken on some former occasion. I apprehend he does me the honour—and I am sure I am much obliged to him for it—of proposing to insert in a solemn Address of this House extracts from speeches which I am supposed to have made. But I do not think that a course, which would be altogether consistent either with the usages or the dignity of this House. Then, Sir, in the interest of that cause which the hon. Member has at heart—which the whole House have at heart—which I believe the country has at heart, and which I am sure that he and all who hear me must wish to see promoted in the best manner possible for the advantage of those whom it concerns, I should say that the course best adapted to accomplish the purpose he has in view would be to content himself with that unanimous expression of opinion which has been elicited to-night—to let it go forth to the world, as it will go to-morrow, that of all the hon. Members who have spoken on this occasion there was not one who had a different opinion from the rest in regard to his interest in the fate of Poland or as to his sense of the injuries which the Polish nation have sustained. I submit that, as was well stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole), it is better to leave it to the responsible Government of the country to give to the Sovereign on this matter such advice as they may think best calculated to attain the object which all desire, and not to take upon the House a responsibility of detail which belongs properly to Her Majesty's Ministers; resting assured that the sentiments expressed by the House this evening are equally shared by those who have the honour of holding office under the Crown. I would, therefore, suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he should now allow the House to go into Committee of Supply, and be satisfied with the result—which, I am sure, is honourable to him, and must be satisfactory to all who take an interest in this subject—of the discussion in which so many Members have expressed opinions entirely in accord with each other.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we often hear it said, in the course of these discussions, that the Partition of Poland was a great crime. If it were a great crime, it was a crime shared by the Polish people. The political existence of twenty millions is not destroyed without there being some faults on their side. But whether or not it was a great crime, there is no doubt for Europe it was a great misfortune. Since that Partition, let us recollect what has occurred in Europe. The greatest events which have ever happened in Europe have happened since the Partition of Poland. The whole of the French Revolution, and all those immense results which flowed from that great ebullition, have since then occurred. Since then there has appeared a character on the European stage who alone in modern times could be classed with the Alexanders and the Cæsars of antiquity. All the boundaries of the kingdoms which existed when Poland was partitioned have been altered; the laws of almost every country in Europe have been remodelled; new codes have been introduced; and new Governments called into being. In short, greater and more numerous changes have occurred in the eighty years since that event than were probably ever before crowded into any similar period of the history of man. Sir, I think it very much to the honour of an English statesman—and of an English statesman who had not in his time that credit for his sagacity which I believe posterity now accords to him—I think it much to the honour of Lord Castlereagh that after such immense events, being called upon to take a leading part in the settlement of Europe, he should not have been blind to the importance of restoring, if possible, the political integrity of Poland; and that, with all those arduous and onerous duties which devolved upon him at the Congress of Vienna, he felt that the restoration of the political independence of Poland was a result necessary to the future ease and tranquillity of Europe. Let us remember what were the circumstances under which Lord Castlereagh, as the representative of British policy, conceived and counselled the restoration of the political independence of the kingdom of Poland. He was supported in that policy by Austria and France; he was opposed by Russia. Austria and

France were then exhausted Powers; England was suffering from immense exertions; but Russia, from a combination of circumstances, was in a position of irresistible and unprecedented strength. It was under those conditions that Lord Castlereagh, though aided by the sympathy of France and Austria, felt that he was obliged to relinquish the plan which he was then of opinion would be of most eminent advantage to the future prosperity and tranquillity of Europe. But what are the circumstances under which we are now considering the question? England is not suffering from the consequences of an unprecedented exertion of its energies continued for twenty years—England was never so powerful, never so united as it is now: France is not an exhausted Power; and I am happy to believe that Austria is daily gaining strength and authority—strength and authority due not merely to the possession of the great resources which have always belonged to that empire, but to the prudence, sagacity, and wisdom which distinguish her counsels. But if the position of England, France, and Austria is so strong and so promising, what is the position of Russia? The position of Russia is not that which dictated the answer that the noble Lord has quoted—the haughty reply that 200,000 Russians were in possession of Poland, and that that was the only answer that would be given to the politic counsels of the English Plenipotentiary. Well, Sir, Lord Castlereagh under those circumstances, representing with great ability and foresight the interests not only of England but of Europe, gave up the restoration of the independence of Poland, and had recourse to another scheme. He secured by treaty to Poland a certain form of independent government. But although England relinquished his policy, still under that treaty she possessed rights, and had the opportunity of standing upon them. I cannot agree with the noble Lord that the hon. Gentleman who introduced this question to-night with so much ability, laid down the position that there are obligations under the Treaty of Vienna which force England into action; but there are moral obligations which the noble Lord cannot deny, resulting from the position that we occupy under that treaty—moral obligations of the duty of fulfilling which we may avail ourselves whenever the opportunity is afforded. The present position of affairs in Poland is that another insurrection has occurred. The hon. Gentleman who has introduced the question has expressed in his speech, and, indeed, in his Motion, what is justly described as the unanimous feeling of Parliament and of the country with respect to that insurrection. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) objects to the mode in which the expression of the opinion of the House is called for. Under the circumstances of the case, the great object is to elicit an expression of opinion on the part of the House; but how far the hon. Member ought to proceed depends upon the conduct of the Government. If the Government, for example, had adopted a line of policy opposite to the course recommended by the hon. Gentleman, he would have been perfectly justified in asking the House to support either a Resolution or an Address which asserted the policy that he advocated. On the other hand, if the policy recommended by the Government was one similar to that which was advocated by the hon. Gentleman himself, such a proceeding would be quite unnecessary. There is, however, a third position which I think has not been sufficiently considered—that of a Government which does not frankly communicate to the House the policy—the general policy—which it intends to pursue. Because I must say, that although I listened to the noble Lord with great attention, I did not at all collect from him what was the general course which Her Majesty's Government intended to pursue with regard to this matter. To expect that we should become acquainted in detail with the measures which the Government may think it desirable to adopt at this moment would be most unreasonable; but I did not hear from the noble Lord any expression of opinion as to what he thought might be desirable or practical, or even as to the spirit in which Her Majesty would be advised by her Ministers with respect to the present state of affairs in Poland. I think that is much to be regretted. The hon. Gentleman must decide for himself as to the course which he should pursue in the matter. I myself think it would be extremely unadvisable to have any appearance of a difference on this subject. At the same time, I entirely disagree with the critics who have found fault with the language of portions of the Address. If the House is in a position in which an Address is necessary, there is nothing in the Address of the hon. Gentleman which could be cavilled at. It is, of course, in the power of any hon. Gentleman to place his own interpretation upon the words of that Address. One hon. Member smells gunpowder in the last sentence. I should not myself, if I thought an Address requisite under the circumstances, shrink from the adoption of this form of words. Putting upon this Address the natural interpretation of its phraseology, I understand that it means this:—That Her Majesty's Ministers are not to pass the present state of Poland over in silence, that they are to avail themselves of their rights under the treaty, and to take every other proceeding which they think wise and expedient to carry into action a policy favourable to the Poles. In my opinion that does not necessarily mean war, and I think that we must all of us indulge in more than the hope that great and beneficial changes will take place in the condition of Poland without an appeal to the last arbiter of human destiny. I do not presume to give counsel to the hon. Gentleman; but I will venture to give him this advice, either to proceed with his Address, or, yielding to what I think is the general feeling of the House and for the sake of unanimity, to withdraw it, but not on account of false scruples to consent to have the Address which he has proposed in a very spirited manner, and which very effectively represents his sentiments, emasculated in its language or changed in its expressions. I think that the hon. Gentleman must feel that he has obtained his main object in originating a discussion which has been sustained with power, and which has, no doubt, made Her Majesty's Ministers clearly understand that in the House of Commons there are not two opinions respecting the state of affairs in Poland. I always shrink from any expression of political sentimentalism. I do not know any people who have suffered so much from political sentimentalism as the Poles. Year after year there have been people living in Paris and London, some of them in a state of comparative luxury, stimulating their unfortunate countrymen in Poland to fruitless insurrection and to useless revolt; and all this time we have been favoured by them with expressions of feeling, which—if expression of feeling would effect the salvation of nations—have certainly been abundant and profuse. But what makes me hope that in the present state of circumstances there is a chance of the great English policy which Lord Castlereagh counselled and recommended being carried into effect is, not only that the position of England, of France, and of Austria is very different from what it was in 1814 and 1815, not only that the position of Russia is very different from what it was at that critical period, but that in Poland we have at present a sheer insurrection of the people against oppression. It is a movement not originated and not stimulated by foreign emissaries. It has not been created by conspiracies in other countries; it has not been fostered in order to promote local ambition or the objects of faction. It is a national movement; it possesses all the elements of a sacred cause, the love of country, the memory of a glorious past, and, as I hope and will believe, the inspiration of a triumphant future.

SIR ROBERT CLIFTON rose, to express a hope that the hon. Member for the King's County would go to a division. The House was entitled to some more definite answer from Her Majesty's Government.

MR. WYLD said, that since they were not going to a division, he could not allow this opportunity to pass without entering his protest, as an individual in a free State, and as a Member of this House, against the atrocities that were now being committed in Poland. The policy of Russia since 1831 had been utterly to ignore the Treaty of Vienna. He wished, on behalf of his constituents, to enter his protest against the conduct of the Prussian Government in this matter.

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought he should only be acting in accordance with the general wish if, after the debate which had taken place, he withdrew his Motion. He did so, however, with the object of enabling any other Gentleman to bring forward the same or a similar Motion on a future occasion if necessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM called the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the increased expenditure for the Ionian Islands in the Army Estimates of this year—the sum set down being £189,000 against £158,000 last year. He did not wish to go into the question of the cession of the Ionian Islands—a dependency concerning the surrender of which the noble Lord at the head of the Government seemed to think very lightly. A time would come for discussing that subject. But, at the same time, he did wish to know why, under such circumstances, we were called upon to pay a larger sum on account of those Islands, than we had paid in preceding years. The Government had certainly clogged the surrender of the Protectorate, by the introduction of so many "ifs" that it was nearly impossible to know under what combination of circumstances the cession was to take place. What were the conditions which had been laid down? If the new Assembly of the Greek nation should prove faithful to their declaration, if they should maintain constitutional monarchy, if they should refrain from all aggression, if they should choose a Sovereign against whom no well-founded objection could be raised, Her Majesty would wish to see the Ionian Isles united to Greece; and if this wish should also be expressed by the Ionian Parliament, and if the parties to the treaty were willing to agree, why then the detailed arrangements could be the subject of future communication. The fulfilment of all these conditions appeared to be exceedingly remote, for there was no King, no Republic, and whatever semblance of a Government did exist had been destroyed within the last few days. The addition of the Ionian Isles to the kingdom of Greece, so far from promoting a desirable settlement, would only add one more item to the anarchical mass.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS :—A communication was made by Her Majesty's Government to the Provisional Government of Greece to the effect which the noble Lord has just stated; but that communication was only of a preliminary nature, and no negotiation has been hitherto entered into with any of the great Powers who signed the Treaty of Vienna, without whose consent it would be impossible to take the first step for transferring the Ionian Islands to the kingdom of Greece. When the time arrives for making this communication, there will be ample opportunity afforded to this House to express their opinion on the subject, and it would be premature to enter into any detailed discussion of the subject at the present moment. I shall therefore confine myself to the question which the noble Lord has placed upon the Notices. The portion of the Estimates to which he refers is a document appended to the Estimates, giving an account of the military expenditure on each Colony, as calculated for the present year, and compared with a similar Return appended to the Estimates of last year. These figures do not represent the amount voted by the House, but are calculations based on the best information in the possession of the War Department at the beginning of each year. It appears that the expenditure last year was not altogether taken from precise data, and fell short of the outlay actually incurred. The Estimate for future years will be rectified upon the information afforded by the Comptroller of Military accounts, and the sum put down for the financial year beginning the first of April next will correctly represent the expenses necessary to be incurred if the present number of troops should continue in the island for the whole year. The expense for the present year will be substantially similar to that of last year, as no alteration will be made in the number. There is no Estimate for public works or fortifications in the Ionian Islands for the present year.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, that the expense of the four battalions had been greater than was calculated in the Estimate of last year.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS would admit that the expense was under-calculated in the document appended to the Estimates.

COLONEL DUNNE asked why, if the Government had determined to cede these Islands, they should go on incurring the present expenditure, which was not confined to the maintenance of four battalions of infantry. And as to these four battalions, they must be kept somewhere, and therefore it was not fair to charge the expense of them to the Protectorate of these Islands. What was to be done with the fortifications, upon which, within his knowledge, a great expenditure had been incurred? They were placed eighty miles to the north of the boundary of Greece; and, from his own survey of the country, he did not hesitate to say that the Power that possessed Corfu could turn the whole position of the line of Turkey. Would the Government, then, place in the hands of Greece the best point for an attack upon Turkey? No foreign Prince could go to Greece without being a party to a policy of aggression, and the military point of aggression would be Corfu. What he wanted to know was, whether Her Majesty's Government meant to blow up the fortifications of Corfu, or to hand them over to Greece? If they wished to destroy the Turkish empire, they would adopt the latter course, although he did not think the Corfiotes would benefit much by being handed over to Greece. Had the Government taken any measures with the four Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna, for the arrangement of the cession, and were they likely to agree to it?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Her Majesty's Government have not entered into any negotiation with the other Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna about the cession of the Ionian Islands.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought the statement just made rather extraordinary, because Her Majesty's Government ought, out of mere courtesy, to have communicated with those Powers in order to ascertain their views. He wished to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had received at any time any intimation of the views of the other Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna, as to the cession of the Ionian Islands? He asked this question with especial reference to Austria, because he believed that Austria was peculiarly interested in the matter.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The case anticipated in the Queen's Speech has not occurred, and there has therefore been no communication with any other Power.

MR. ROEBUCK: I am rather surprised at that answer of the noble Lord, because, being at Vienna at that time, I made inquiry of the Austrian Government whether they knew anything about the matter. I was told that Her Majesty's Government had communicated with them on the subject, and a member of the Administration of Austria showed me the reply to that communication. I saw that reply. It was exceedingly well reasoned, and I should like to see it on that table.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. and learned Friend saw a despatch which was read to my noble Friend (Earl Russell) but which was not given to him.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23rd February], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the Laws for raising a Revenue on Tobacco;"—(Mr. Ayrton.)—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) having stated at great length his objections to this Bill, he should be compelled to trouble the House with a few observations in reply. He should first wish to advert to two objections of a general character. One was that this Bill ought to have been considered in connection with the financial arrangements of the year. He thought, on the other hand, that it was more convenient and advantageous to bring in this Bill at a period of the Session when the House could give greater attention to its details. The period when the financial measures of the year were submitted to the House was generally a time of great pressure; and if this Bill had been mixed up with the questions of far greater interest which were usually connected with the Budget, its details could not have been so carefully examined as the interests concerned were entitled. There was another objection—which rested on an entire misunderstanding—it was said that this Bill cheapened the commodity to the rich man, and took no cognizance of the commodity consumed by the poor man. This objection was very wide of the truth. No doubt this Bill tended to cheapen tobacco and cigars of the highest quality, such as were consumed by the rich man, but it also applied alike to every kind of manufactured tobacco. It had been argued by a portion of the press as if there were a difference between the poor and rich in this respect, that while the rich man consumed manufactured tobacco, the poor man consumed tobacco in leaf. But the poor man did no such thing, for even the sale of the tobacco in the leaf was illegal. The leaf was unfit for consumption until it was manufactured, and the effect of the Bill was not to cheapen the high-priced cigar of the rich man, but to open the door of a fair and healthy competition in a commodity which had been excluded from our imports, not by an absolute prohibition, but by a duty so extravagant as practically to amount to a prohibition. So far as the poor consumer was concerned, the present system was as complete a monopoly as if there existed an entire prohibition; while in the case of the rich man the grievance involved was of so trifling a character, if, indeed, one existed at all, as to be hardly worth the consideration of the House. Having made those observations, he should proceed to deal with the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, which he hoped the House would not be disposed seriously to entertain; for if they should do so, they would be setting a course entirely at variance with established practice. The case at issue, it should be remembered, was one in which the executive Government proposed to the representatives of the people a reduction of taxes levied on the people; and in the history of the last twenty years, during which period more than a thousand proposals of a similar character had been made by different Governments, he was aware of no instance in which one had been met by a Motion similar to that which the hon. and learned Member had brought forward; although on several occasions particular propositions had been characterized as unwise, or of such a nature that they ought not to receive the sanction of Parliament; and sometimes it has been proposed to substitute another proposal in its stead. The present proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman would do neither of these. The Motion, in effect, went the length of saying, that the executive Government, which was responsible for the taxation of the country, having laid before the House of Commons a Bill the object of which was the reduction of certain duties, a private Member was justified in rising in his place, and while declining to take the sense of the House as to whether the measure was or was not a wise or a good one, seeking to postpone it for an indefinite period. Now, the universal practice of the House, which, he ventured to contend, was founded on wisdom, was altogether opposed to such a mode of proceeding—a mode of proceeding which, if it had been pursued in former years, would have rendered progress in our commercial legislation almost impossible. The minute examination of details which it was the duty of the Government to institute with regard to such questions as the present, and which they submitted to the consideration of hon. Members on the floor of that House when making the proposals which they deemed it to be their duty to lay before Parliament, had hitherto, he might add, been found the practical mode of carrying out great commercial reforms; but if the whole of those details were, because some timid interest or another happened to be the victim of imaginary danger, instead of being taken on the responsibility of the Government, to be sent upstairs to a Committee, to be dealt with by a system of examination and cross-examination, the progress by which our legislation had of late years been distinguished would never have been made. He should, therefore, without hesitation, appeal to hon. Members to say whether they would abandon the wholesome practice which had hitherto prevailed, and lend themselves to sanction a course which amounted to nothing more than an evasion of the question at issue. He would not, in the course of the observations which was about to make, trouble the House by entering into a lengthened explanation of those details of the Bill which might more conveniently be discussed at a future stage; but would enter at once into the general merits of the subject, premising that he was at a loss, after having heard the speech of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, to know why he had adopted the particular course which he had taken—why he had not come forward like a man and asked them to reject the proposition. The hon. Member said, he had plenty of reasons for doing so. He had stated that he stood out as the supporter of the existing law, which he seemed to regard as one of a perfect character—a law which had been devised, as he would have it, in 1823, for the purpose of benefiting the revenue and to suppress smuggling, in both of which objects the hon. Gentleman maintained it had succeeded to as great a degree as in human affairs was practicable. Why was it, then, that entertaining that view, the hon. Gentleman had not moved the rejection of the Bill before the House?—a Bill which he appeared to think would have the effect of introducing innumerable horrors into our commercial system. He had conjured up every horror in connection with the ruin of the British manufacturer for the benefit of the foreigner, and, indeed, he had gone so far in his opposition to it as to picture the foreigner gloating over the deserted dwellings of the great manufacturers in this country, and to conjure up images of starving operatives which were quite harrowing. He saw the slave-owner taking the benefit of the Bill; and he saw the Royal monopolist of Manilla deriving incalculable advantages at the expense of the ruined British workman. Those, however, were but old stories after all, and required something in the nature of proof before they could be implicitly relied upon, for prophecies such as those of the hon. Gentleman had been discredited by uniform experience. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that by the proposal he had made he was giving effect to the wishes of the tobacco trade; but the justice of that supposition he for one disputed. A statement on behalf of two respectable members of the trade had, indeed, been circulated which might be said to be on the hon. Gentleman's side; but their share in the matter was, after all, but infinitesimal, and he himself, who had daily communications either directly or indirectly with the largest manufacturers in the three kingdoms, could safely say that not one of them had made of him the requirement which the hon. Gentleman had made of the House of Commons. On the contrary, they had approached the question like practical men, and while submitting that the duty on a particular description of tobacco was fixed at too high a rate, or that certain regulations ought to be relaxed—points which were perfectly legitimate subjects for discussion—never advocated the relegation of the question to a Committee—a course which could lead to no other result than an indefinite waste of time. Now, passing by the minute details connected with the question, it became his duty to show good grounds for introducing the Bill, and for seeking to disturb the present state of things. Those grounds were four, and any one of them would, in his opinion, be sufficient to justify the step which he asked the House to take, while combined they were perfectly irresistible as arguments in its favour. He might perhaps, in the first instance, state that he had that very day received a communication from the Anti-Tobacco society—which, perhaps, had been put in motion by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton)—protesting against the Bill, as being calculated to have the effect of increasing the consumption of tobacco. It would be a piece of the most ridiculous purism to presume that an article which constituted a comfort to the masses ought to be proscribed and repressed, and that for the sake of proscribing and repressing it they should endeavour to keep up something in the shape of a monopoly. There was no reason why the consumer of tobacco should be subjected to disadvantages imposed by the restrictions of the present law when the people were freed from restrictions with regard to every other article. If our fiscal necessities compelled us to levy high duties on tobacco, it was a very good reason, in adjusting the duties on the manufactured article, for being especially careful not to do injustice to the manufacturers of tobacco at home. But, on the other hand, as soon as that object was attained, the price of the article should not be enhanced by artificial and arbitrary restrictions. The next ground upon which the Bill might be supported was the prevention of smuggling. He was astonished at the courage of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton) who, with perfect self-possession, could state to the House, that so perfect was the present system, there was no smuggling in tobacco. The opinions of the Government, of the Revenue Department, of the Committee of this House, and of every witness examined before it, were against the hon. and learned Member. The fact was notorious, that smuggling existed to a great extent. Whether they would get rid of it altogether he could not pretend to say, but the provisions of the Bill were of a character which would tend to diminish the inducements and the means of smuggling. It would be a good argument for the present system if it could be said that certain descriptions of tobacco, being prohibited, wherever they were caught they might be seized; but the present law did not prohibit the entry of foreign manufactured tobacco, and while, perhaps, 100 lb. of Cavendish paid the duty of 9s. 6d. per lb., it was known that there were many thousands of pounds in the country which could not be seized because it was difficult to say which were the particular pounds on which the duty had been paid. In order to operate against smuggling, it was proposed to give the British manufacturer the power of manufacturing Cavendish tobacco in bonded warehouses, and in consideration of the extra expense in respect of the premises, and the disadvantage in disposing of the stalks and refuse, to allow him 4d. per lb. The present system charged 9s. 6d. per lb. on foreign Cavendish, and prohibited its manufacture by the British trader. He proposed to establish a system under which the British trader could manufacture in bond, paying a duty of 3s. 8d., and the foreigner would pay on introducing the foreign-manufactured Cavendish 4s. per lb. He asked the House which system was most likely to prevent smuggling? and he asked the hon. Gentleman whether he was prepared to support the paradox in the face of the House that the duty on cigars at 5s. was more likely to promote smuggling than the present duty of 9s. 6d. per lb. The hon. Gentleman took up the cudgels in favour of the revenue; but if there was any reason for relying on the opinions of the best-informed men, he could confidently state that the change could not be otherwise than favourable to the revenue. He now came to the interest of the manufacturer, and not only did he hope that the Bill would not realize the phantoms and visions which the hon. Member had conjured from the limbo to which he trusted they had long ago been quietly consigned, but he must express his belief that well-considered legislation would materially improve the position of the British trade. He did not say that with reference to alterations, but with reference to additions to the Bill. Very early in the discussion the question was raised, whether it would not be possible to extend to traders in cigars the privilege of manufacturing them in bond. He had examined that question attentively, and he had come to the conclusion that there was no mode in which such manufacture could be carried on in bond, because there was such a number of persons of small means engaged in the trade that it would be impossible to reconcile the operation with the requirements of the bonding system. Neither would it be possible to permit the manufacture of common tobacco in bond. If it was thought by any hon. Member that they ought to revert to the practice of 1840, and permit the mixture of all sorts of things with tobacco, he could not concur with him. But he did think it might be in the power of the Government to propose something better for the trade than allowing the manufacture in bond—namely, the readjustment of the present system of drawbacks, which would have the effect of opening up advantageously to the British manufacturer the export trade. The duty of the Government was to make the measure as favourable as possible to the British trader.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not pretend to represent the manufacturers of tobacco generally; but the manufacturers of cigars of all England had met together and placed a Resolution in his hands, which they requested him to support in the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not admit that all the manufacturers of cigars were present on that committee. The secretary of the committee, who was the principal person upon it, had no share whatever in the circulars which had been placed in the hands of hon. Members. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) begged to state, that, over and above the trade which was open to the British manufacturer by the Bill as it stood, he was sanguine of being able to submit to the House a proposal which would give the manufacturers of all descriptions of tobacco power to enter into the export trade. The present system of drawbacks took no cognizance of the different kinds of tobacco, and was founded on the assumption that the exporter would put as much moisture as possible into his tobacco, in order to get as large a drawback as he could; and the effect of that was, that the tobacco which was exported as ship's stores was in a very moist state. But he was prevented from entering into details, in consequence of the hon. and learned Member's Amendment standing in the way. The question which was before them now was whether the hon. Gentleman would permit them to discuss the subject. He could show, if there was an opportunity of doing so, that many of the hon. Member's statements were unfounded; for instance, the manufacture of cigars, as explained by him, was unknown to the vast majority of the manufacturers of the country. The question was not one of starving operatives at home and bloated foreigners, but simply this:—What measure of relief could be given to the consumer, and how they could at the same time put the manufacturer and trader in a good position without damage to the revenue of the country? That was the principle upon which he proposed to go into Committee, and upon which he asked the House to reject the present Motion.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the right hon. Gentleman was so emphatic and so peremptory that it almost daunted a timid person like himself. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—I never made any reference to the hon. and learned Member.

MR. ROEBUCK thought he had, from the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman pointed his finger. The right hon. Gentleman, however, stated distinctly that the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman to refer the question to a Select Committee was an unusual and improper one, because it interfered with the conduct of the Government in a matter of fiscal arrangement. But he (Mr. Roebuck) had known the timber duties to be referred to a Select Committee, and he wanted to know why the tobacco duties should not also be referred to a Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman's rhetoric was like the proboscis of an elephant, which could pick up a pin or lift a cannon. Bishop Berkeley had written an admirable metaphysical treatise on the question of tar-water; and so, in like manner, the right hon. Gentleman had delivered a discourse on political economy à propos of the making of cigars. The plain state of the case appeared to him (Mr. Roebuck) to be this:—In this town 10,000 persons were employed in making cigars, and he was told that the effect of the plan of the right hon. Gentleman would be to bring the home maker of cigars into unfair competition with the foreign maker, as the former worked with an article paying a very high duty, while the latter worked with an article which paid no duty at all; and therefore, if the duty were reduced from 9s. to 5s., all these people would be thrown out of work. He was also told that the foreign maker of cigars took the leaf, extracted the oil from it, and thereby diminished the weight one-half. The English maker could not do that, because it would diminish the weight of the material, on which he had already paid duty. He understood many workmen in the trade had already been thrown out of work by the terror created by the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. He wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider these points.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained, that he did not mean to say that Select Committees had never sat on commercial duties. What he intended to state was, that he had never known an instance since the commercial legislation of 1842, when the Government on their responsibility proposed a particular plan bringing to issue the whole question, of the House refusing to entertain that plan in consequence of the interposition of a general Motion for inquiry.

Mr. LOCKE thought, that if the question had been complicated before, the right hon. Gentleman's speech only made it more complicated than ever. If the matter were submitted to a Select Committee, the House would have something to act upon. If the matter were so complicated as it now appeared to be, his hon. and learned Friend was not open to animadversion for seeking to obtain an investigation. It was an inquiry into the hop duties which led to the final settlement of the question. The right hon. Gentleman, feeling the injustice which was going to be done to the British tobacco manufacturer, said he hoped that he might some day become an exporter. He said his proposal was for the benefit of the consumer. What consumer? If he meant by that that it would benefit the great body of the people, he denied it altogether. At present a large portion of manufactured tobacco paid a duty of 500 per cent; and he contended that the working man would derive no benefit, unless it were by the reduction of the duty on cavendish and negro-head. The great bulk of tobacco was left entirely untouched. As to smuggling, it took place chiefly in cavendish and negro-head, and the other manufactured tobaccos. The smuggling of cigars was on a very small scale indeed, and he held it would not be put an end to by this measure.

Mr. T. BARING said, he had always thought that tobacco duties ought to be treated with the greatest caution in making any change, not only because of the amount of revenue which they produced, but also on account of the difficulties incidental to the manufacture of tobacco. It was said that this was the last remnant of a bad system. He begged to remind the House that hitherto they had always gone upon the principle of taking off duty on raw material before subjecting their own manufacturers to foreign competition; but here was a heavy duty which would still remain on the raw material in this country, while in other countries there was no duty at all. He confessed that he could not ascertain what was likely to be the effect of the proposed change. It might prevent smuggling, benefit the manufacturers, and lower the price to the consumer; but they had no sufficient data to guide them—nothing, in short, but the authority of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman intimated that he had a scheme for enabling the manufacturers of this country to export; but he had not told them what it was. There had hardly ever been a great change of duties without the propositions having been considered in Committee, and this question had never yet been specially considered by any Committee—the proposal rested entirely on the recommendation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he (Mr. Baring) did not think it ought to be adopted without a further examination of those who were specially interested.

Mr. BRADY thought there ought to be a thorough investigation of the subject before they went any further. In the interior of the county there were no bonded warehouses in which the manufacture could be carried on. Moreover, the supervision of the manufacture would involve a large expenditure. These matters required careful consideration, and he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MAGUIRE seconded the Motion. It was clear that smuggling had not increased, for during the year 1862 the revenue from this source had increased £110,000. Ireland was deeply interested in this question, for £2,000,000 of this revenue came from that country. It was the opinion of persons connected with the trade, who had much more complete information than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the trade were not properly protected. They state that to make a pound of snuff required a pound and a half of stalks, on which 4s. 9d. duty was paid to the Crown. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Oh, no!] Would the right hon. Gentleman allow the point to be investigated by a Committee, then? Let him have the matter thoroughly sifted; and if the right hon. Gentleman were shown to be right, he would gladly support the Bill. By his own speech the right hon. Gentleman had completely condemned his plan for manufacturing in bond, for in a moment of unofficial candour he called it "at best but a defective, clumsy, and costly expedient." And yet he called this unfair competition with the foreigner "free trade." Would the right hon. Gentleman consider, too, the justice of releasing the trades from the burden of the Excise regulations? It was because he believed that the right hon. Gentleman had been earwigged by some Department of the Excise or Customs which found itself without work at the present moment, and that he was groping blindly about in the dark, that he supported the Motion for adjournment.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was a little astonished at the alarm felt at this proposal for cheapening in some degree the price of tobacco. It was said that the rates of duty proposed by his right hon. Friend were not what they ought to be. That was a very fit question to be discussed in a Committee of the Whole House. He had seen a whole tariff, containing hundreds of different articles, discussed in such a Committee, and no proposition made to refer any of the rates of duty to a Select Committee. A Select Committee on duties had generally been proposed by Members of that House in order to force on the Government the reduction of some duty; but this was the first time he had known an hon. Member to come forward, on a proposition by the Government for a reduction in favour of the consumer, with an Amendment to refer the question to a Select Committee. He must set the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) right on one point, and remind him the case of the duty on malt showed that the principle to which he had referred was not the one that had been acted on in this country. The duty levied on foreign malt was in excess of that paid on the home article only to the amount barely necessary to allow for the expense of carrying on the manufacture under the Excise.

MR. T. BARING wished to explain that he had spoken of the Customs duty, and said that the duty was either taken off or reduced on the raw material before competition was allowed on the part of the foreign manufacturer.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the case of refined sugar was one in point against the hon. Gentleman. The foreign refiner was allowed to compete with the English on other terms than those referred to by the hon. Member. This was a consumer's question. The consumer was now subjected to an additional charge arising from the monopoly price demanded for tobacco by the home manufacturer. He hoped the House would not consent to the proposition to refer this matter to a Select Committee.

COLONEL DUNNE supported the proposition for further inquiry, and said it was ridiculous to call this a free-trade question while there was an absolute prohibition against the agriculturist growing tobacco at home.

MR. AYRTON appealed to the Government to consent to the adjournment of the debate, in consequence of the absence of an hon. Gentleman on the opposite side of the House who took a leading part in financial questions. Another reason for adjourning the debate was, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had entered into no explanation of the provisions of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had promised on a former occasion to make a statement to the House; but his speech to-night had been confined to personal allusions and other matters foreign to the merits of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not consent to the adjournment of the debate on account of the absence of an hon. Member who had not so much as intimated his intention to take part in the discussion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR HUGH CAIRNS hoped the Government would now see the propriety of allowing the debate to be postponed till another day. There were a great many hon. Members who were anxious to express their views upon the subject. In substance the present discussion was a discussion on the second reading; and if it were to be closed now, there would be no subsequent debate until the House went into Committee. The President of the Board of Trade had made the strange assertion that the question of rates, which was the only question in dispute, ought to be discussed in Committee. It was utterly impossible for any hon. Member in Committee on the Bill to propose to increase rates which had been settled by a Committee of the Whole House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it would be quite competent to discuss in Committee any rates lower than those now chargeable by law. He did not suppose there was any intention to propose higher rates.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that if the question of rates could be discussed in Committee, he was at a loss to conceive why the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it necessary to go into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering that very point.

[Second Night.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER had already stated that there was no necessity for going into Committee of the Whole House, and that he had printed the Resolutions merely for the convenience and information of hon. Members.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the Question."

COLONEL DUNNE moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would not continue an unprofitable controversy, and would yield to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

DRAINAGE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL [No. 18.]

SECOND READING. REFERRED TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that it came up to their Lordships' House under circumstances which must be regarded as satisfactory, inasmuch as it had passed the other House with the general approval of the Irish Members. This formed the eleventh Bill on this subject presented to the British Parliament during Her present Majesty's reign. The fact was, that no part of the United Kingdom required draining so much as Ireland. Centuries ago thousands of acres of some of the finest woods in Europe were, by want of draining, arising from insecurity of life and property gradually sunk in the peat mosses, and large tracts of arable land in Ireland, were rendered comparatively unprofitable from the want of an effective system of drainage. Hitherto those works had been generally done by the Government. The present measure, however, recognised the self-reliant principle, which, he thought, was best calculated to confer upon the country the advantages sought for. The provisions of the Bill were somewhat similar to those of the English Act, the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 133. The initiation of its operation was given to the Irish Board of Works. Upon the application of a proportion of the proprietors of any land requiring a system of drainage, the Commissioners of the Board of Public Works were to send an Inspector to the district indicated, and upon his report the Commissioners may, if they think proper, and if two-thirds of the proprietors consent, constitute the district a drainage district. The management of the works was then intrusted to an incorporate Drainage Board, the members of which were to be elected by the proprietors of the district. The 20th and following clauses defined the general powers of these Drainage Boards. The 36th and 37th sections empower the Drainage Boards to borrow money on debenture. When the works were completed, the Drainage Board were to make an award, by which the proportions of the expenses were to be charged on the lands within the district. The Board were also empowered to determine the amount of increased rent to be paid in respect of lands improved; and were to hold annual meetings, and fix the amount to be raised for maintenance and repairs for the ensuing year. The Bill also contains provisions, giving power to neighbouring owners to procure outfalls. Such being the nature of the measure, he trusted their Lordships would assent to its passing as speedily as possible, because in the present distressed state of Ireland, occasioned by the occurrence of three consecutive bad harvests, the Bill would confer a great boon upon the country, by the employment it would open up to the labouring portion of the population. The distress that existed in Ireland had been borne with remarkable patience. This Bill would give great facilities for the relief of that distress, and he trusted their Lordships would pass it without delay.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, he was quite willing to allow the Bill to be read a second time, if the noble Lord would let it be referred to a Select Committee. The reference to a Select Committee need not prevent its passing before Easter.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, that he was anxious the Bill should be passed without unnecessary delay, and therefore he was unwilling to refer it to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF CORK said, it was a Bill of eighty-five clauses, and the provisions were of such a nature that they could better be discussed in a Select Committee. It had been hurried up to this House, and required the consideration of owners of land in Ireland. He hoped his noble Friend would not persist in his objection to the course proposed by the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF BELMORE joined in the appeal to allow the Bill to go to a Select Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it had been generally understood by the Irish Peers that the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and referred to a Select Committee: The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

E. DERRY, E. ESSEX, E. LUCAN, E. BELMORE, V. LIFFORD, V. HAWARDEN, L. BOYLE, L. PONSOMBY, L. DIEBY, L. WODEHOUSE, L. CROFTON, L. SOMERHILL, L. DANFERTY, and L. LIVERDEN.

SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that they were in a better position with regard to reserves for the navy than at any former period. On the first of February, 1863, the number of Royal Naval Reserve men was 14,000; of Coast Volunteers, 8,000; of Coastguard on shore, 3,000; and of Coastguard in ships, 2,000. The total number of men available as a reserve was 28,800; and as the number was increasing week by week, they might expect, by the end of the year, to have 30,000 men available as reserve seamen. The only drawback to this great scheme of a Reserve was the provision originally introduced in order to induce the men to join the Coast Volunteers, that the Coast Volunteers were not to be taken more than 300 miles from the shores of the country. The arrangement was not then objected to; but now, it being considered that some inconvenience might arise in case of emergency, the Bill proposed to abolish that limit with regard to men who should join the force hereafter. For instance, vessels might be manned principally with ordinary seamen, or men of the Royal Naval Reserve, but might have a few Coast Volunteers; and if those vessels were in pursuit of a privateer, or required to proceed even a few miles beyond the prescribed limit for the protection of trade, or for any purpose, the service must be given up, unless they chose to break faith with the men. It was of the utmost importance that faith should be kept with the men, and that the terms on which they entered should not be violated. It was therefore proposed to reserve to the present Coast Volunteers the limit on which they had taken service, but not to enter any more with that limitation. This alteration might possibly lead to some diminution of the Coast Volunteer force, but, seeing how the Royal Naval Volunteer force was increasing, the advantage of the absence of the restriction as to distance would more than compensate for the disadvantage of that diminution. The Bill contained only one clause. He had now explained the principle, and he asked their Lordships to read it a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that the original intention of the Act was to enable fishermen and seafaring persons on the coast to join the reserve force for the defence of the country, and he would suggest that it would be better without any definite law, that the Admiralty should let it be understood that men settled with their wives and families would not be taken out of the Channel except on a great emergency. There were many men who would be willing to serve in the Channel who would not like to be despatched on foreign service. The Bill itself was a very good one; but he was afraid the Bill would have the effect of inducing many men who were at present members of the Reserve to withdraw; but he hoped they would be fairly dealt with by the Admiralty. He might take that opportunity of making a few remarks upon the state of the navy. When the Royal Commission sat to consider the Manning of the Navy, one of the most important branches of their inquiry related to the question of what the peace establishment should be, bearing in mind the numbers of the volunteer force. According to the best information, it was deemed that it would be sufficient for the protection of our coasts and for other purposes if they had 56,000 seamen and marines, together with a reserve of 30,000 Volunteers available on an emergency—as, for instance, in case of war suddenly breaking out with France, which was the only naval Power of serious importance. Looking at the question as a naval officer merely, he should be glad to see a great navy; but looking at it not only as a naval officer, but as a Member of Parliament, and having regard to the finances of the country, he was surprised that the Government should have proposed in their Estimates so large a naval force for the present year as 76,000 men. In 1854 they had a naval force of 61,400 men; and in 1855, the year of the Crimean war, they had a force of 64,432 men. But now, in addition to the 76,000 men proposed in the Estimates, they had a powerful naval reserve, amounting to nearly 30,000 men. If this country did not stand in need of such a large naval force, they had no right to put their hands in the pockets of the people to such an extent. He was not in the secrets of the Cabinet, and the only information of which he was possessed was derived from the newspapers; but he was at a loss to understand what cause there was to keep up such a large naval force in time of peace. He believed that we had a larger naval force now than since the great war. Did the Government think that the United States were in a condition to bring on a European war? He confessed that he did not see any cause for alarm in that quarter, for he thought that that country had been already sufficiently weakened by the civil contest in which it was engaged to be dangerous to the peace of Europe; and though there were some threatening elements in the Polish difficulty, that question had not arisen when the Estimates were framed. He hoped the noble Duke would state to their Lordships the reasons why it was thought necessary to keep up such an immense naval force.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, I did not expect, on the second reading of this Volunteer Bill, to be called on to go into the whole question of the naval provision of the year; but I must make a few observations in answer to the speech of the noble Earl. I agree with him that we ought not to make use of the Coast Volunteers for the general purpose of manning the navy. They are only entered for one year, and in the event of a war of course it would be impossible so to make use of them. The 30,000 men of the Reserve are never to be used except on a great emergency, when this country itself is in danger. Of course the Government would be slow to issue the proclamation, unless circumstances had occurred which were of such vast importance as to make it absolutely necessary that they should adopt a measure which would disturb the whole mercantile marine of the country. In regard to the manning of the fleet, the noble Earl seems to have forgotten that portion of the Report of the Commission which recommends that a force of 20,000 marines shall be kept up. It is always inexpedient to keep up a large force of marines unless you can send a considerable proportion to sea; and I have thought it right not to raise the force above the number of 18,000. The Commission recommended that we should always have a number of men in all our seaports, to be ready for any ships which were put into commission. Your Lordships may remember that in 1859, though there was a bounty of £10 offered, ships were kept many weeks in port waiting for men; but now I am happy to say that whenever a ship is put into commission, in a day or two I hear that she has got all her men. We get the best men, too, for we now reject all men who have not good characters, or who may be physically unfit for the service. We have got, therefore, not only a large force, but a good force. The noble Earl must deduct from the 76,000 men the 18,000 marines, the 9,000 boys, and also those men who are employed in the protection of the revenue, amounting to several thousands, who are now reckoned part of the navy. Though the state of our foreign relations is satisfactory, yet there are disturbances in different parts of the world which make it unadvisable largely to reduce our naval force. I would point to the far East—to China and Japan—and I would say, that looking to the disturbances in which we have been involved in those distant parts of the world, and the expenditure which we have been forced to incur, it would be unadvisable suddenly and rapidly to reduce our naval force there. It would be bad policy, and it might lead to fresh disturbance and a new outbreak, and might necessitate another naval expedition to vindicate the honour of our flag. Again, a large force is needed in consequence of the disturbances in North America. Our trade is continually liable to alarm and interruption, and it looks to the Admiralty for protection. Every one of our island possessions in that part of the world asks for the presence of a ship to see that they are protected from vessels of one side or the other, which might otherwise not be very particular in respecting the Queen's proclamation of neutrality. Governors of colonies are continually asking for vessels; and Admiral Milne, the commander on the station, a man of great prudence and judgment, and who, having been at the Admiralty, knows the importance of economy, has frequently written to me to say that it would not be for the public service to reduce our force on that station. In the Mediterranean we have been able to make a large reduction in consequence of the state of our relations with the Powers of Europe. I fully agree with the noble Earl in the importance of economy in this branch of the public service, and I carefully considered in what departments reductions might judiciously and safely be carried out. I could not, consistently with my duty, recommend to the Government a reduction in the number of men; but in the Department of Stores, I found that we had a very large supply on hand, and that the consumption was comparatively small. In that Department, therefore, we have been able to make a reduction; but still, at the end of the year, the navy will be in a better condition as regards timber and many other stores than it has been at any time within the last twenty years.

Motion, agreed to.

PRIZE MONEY (CHINA).

QUESTION.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any Prize Money is coming to the Troops engaged in the China Expedition of 1860, from the Sale of Guns, &c., captured from the Enemy; and, if so, whether it is likely soon to be distributed?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, that the commander-in-chief on the spot had determined the question practically by collecting the booty, selling it by auction, and dividing the proceeds among the troops. That course was not strictly in accordance with the regulations, but it was subsequently sanctioned and approved by the Secretary of State. There were some guns that were not included in the sale, and which still remained, but it was not intended to make any fresh distribution of prize money.

STATE OF OUDE.—QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, What steps he proposes to adopt for the adjustment of the claims of the several parties on the late state of Oude?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that, in pursuance of a promise made by the noble Lord who preceded him in his office, an inquiry was ordered to take place in India. Some of the parties objected that they had received no notice of the inquiry, and he had therefore directed the Government of India to issue another Commission, giving notice to the parties so as to enable them to represent their case before the Commission.

VAGRANCY IN SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, If it is his intention to introduce a measure on the subject of Vagrancy in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, the difficulty of dealing with the subject had been found to be so great that he had relinquished all intention to introduce any measure for the present.

PRISON MINISTERS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in order to enable the Magistrates about to assemble in Quarter Sessions, and others interested in the management of Prisons, to consider the provisions of the Prison Ministers Bill, he will postpone the second reading till after Easter?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he had had no representation made to him by English Magistrates who were in the habit of attending Quarter Sessions, and therefore he was unwilling to accede to the request. He would, however, postpone the Bill until next Thursday fortnight.

THE SEWAGE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Leitrim, On what day he intends to call the attention of the House to the Reports of the Sewage Commission?

MR. BRADY said, he would take the earliest opportunity in his power of bringing this important question before the House, and he hoped that in the end it would be taken up by the Government.

EQUIPMENT OF VESSELS FOR THE CONFEDERATE STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has been laid before the Government regarding the preparation in this Country of any ships intended, like the Alabama, for the service of the Confederate States; and, if so, what course they intend to adopt in regard to such ships?

MR. LAYARD: Sir, the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to more than one vessel which was supposed to be fitting out for the service of the Confederate States, as the Alabama was fitted out; but up to this moment no evidence has been furnished which would enable Her Majesty's Government to act according to law. I can assure my hon. Friend that strict orders have been given that any vessels suspected of being fitted out in that manner are to be closely watched.

EXTRADITION ORDINANCE IN MALTA.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When the Papers regarding the Extradition Ordinance, which has lately been enacted, or which has passed Council in Malta, will be laid upon the table?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in answer, said, that the Extradition Ordinance which had just passed the Council in Malta, had now reached this country. The Papers would be immediately laid on the table.

CONVICT PRISONS REPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the Report on Convict Prisons, which has been privately distributed among a few Members, has not been given to every Member of the House?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that he was not aware that the Report had been given to any one. He would, however, make inquiry on the subject.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Extension of Powers of Union Relief Aid Act of 1862).

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he wished to move the insertion of words to limit the duration of the Bill to Midsummer day next.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Clause 2 (Limit of time for issuing Orders).

MR. C. P. VILLIERS proposed, to leave out from "day of" to the end of the clause, and to insert "September next."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Construction of the Act) agreed to.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he would then move to insert the following clause after Clause 1:—

(Repayment of Sums borrowed.)

"Any sum borrowed under the authority of this Act may be repaid by equal annual instalments, not exceeding fourteen."

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he had then to move the insertion of the following clause:—

(Interpretation.)

"The word 'expenditure' in section Five of the said Act shall be construed to include the amount paid under any order of contribution issued by the Poor Law Board, pursuant to the said Act or this Act."

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to suggest whether his right hon. Friend would not authorize Boards of Guardians to borrow from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners; and if he would, whether it would not be desirable to provide for that power in the present clause. He had a natural reluctance that the county of Lancaster should be the first to ask for such a power, but, on looking back, he found very memorable instances in which power to borrow from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners had been allowed under precisely similar circumstances. In the Report of a Committee which sat in 1810, there was a reference to a power of borrowing from those commissioners in 1793, when certain London merchants in distressed circumstances were thus assisted. A similar case occurred in 1825, and, he believed, also in 1847, to relieve distress in London and other parts of the country. He would therefore suggest that the guardians of Lancashire should be authorized to raise money from the Commissioners. Banks in Manchester had been applied to, but they stated that it was not in their line of business to lend money on the terms proposed, and private persons were equally reluctant to lend money to be paid in annual instalments. The consequence was, that the guardians were obliged to pay a much larger rate per cent than they would have to do under other circumstances, whereas they might get money from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, his hon. Friend had pursued an unusual course, and was raising a very important question. The clause which had been moved had no reference to borrowing from the State or the Exchequer Loan Commissioners. It referred to the Act which he was seeking to continue, and in which it was provided that the guardians might borrow money on the security of the rates—which was altogether a transaction of their own—and that they should have fourteen years for repayment instead of seven, as at first intended. He would ask his hon. Friend to wait until the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), who had given notice of a similar proposition, should bring it forward.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had been under the impression that the hon. Member for Oldham had withdrawn his proposal.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. E. C. EGERTON moved the insertion of a clause providing for the Apportionment of contribution for Unions in two or more counties according to the annual rateable value of so much of the Union as shall be situate within such counties respectively.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. BAZLEY said, he wished to move the insertion of a clause empowering the overseers of townships where the expenditure for the relief of the poor should have exceeded the rate of 3s. in the pound to borrow money from time to time, with the consent of the Poor Law Board, as they shall think necessary to meet such excess.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Motion in the name of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), which stood next on the paper, to insert a clause—"Power to Public Works Loan Commissioners to advance Money to Unions"—could not be brought forward without the consent of the Crown, inasmuch as it referred to the appropriation of public money.

MR. HIBBERT said, that the clause of which he had given notice, empowering the Public Works Loan Commissioners to advance money to unions, was one which would, in his opinion, be productive of considerable advantage without inflicting a loss upon any parties. That clause was as follows :—

"The Public Works Loan Commissioners, as defined by the Act of the 19th year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 17, may, out of the Funds for the time being at their disposal, advance to any Union such sum or sums of money as such Union may from time to time be empowered to borrow under the authority of this Act, subject to the following regulations :—1. No Union shall borrow any money from the said Commissioners under this Act until the order of the Poor Law Board has been issued for the purpose. 2. The interest payable in respect thereof shall be at the rate of £3 5s. per annum on each hundred pounds. 3. The period for repayment of any sum shall not exceed fourteen years."

It was not an entirely new principle that the Government should lend money for the relief of the poor, as by the Act of 1817, when the Public Loan Commissioners were first appointed, they were empowered to advance money, not only for drainage, piers, harbours, and other public works, but also for the employment of the poor in parishes of Great Britain. Though it might be true to a certain extent that the Boards up to the present time had experienced little or no difficulty in procuring money under the Act of last Session, it should be recollected that they had required less money during the last year than they would need in the next twelve-months, in consequence of the large subscriptions collected to relieve the distress in Lancashire. If the voluntary subscriptions ceased, and the entire relief of the distress were thrown on the unions, it would be with the greatest difficulty that they could tide over the crisis. The pressure in some of the unions had already been very severe, for he found that in the Union of Glossop the cost of the relief during the first week of February was at the rate of 9s. 3d. in the pound from the union, and 14s. 8d. from the relief committee, equal to a total annual charge of £1 3s. 11d. in the pound upon the rateable value; in Ashton the charge was at the rate of 6s. from the union, and 16s. 4d. from the relief committee, equal to a total of £1 2s. 4d.; and in Preston it was at the rate of 5s. 5d. from the union and 6s. 3d. from the relief committee, equal to a total of 11s. 8d. It also appeared that there were at present 470,000 persons in the receipt of relief, at a weekly cost of £39,000; and those figures showed that the greatest difficulty must henceforth exist in meeting the emergency. He believed, that if the Government did not give the slight relief he now asked for, the unions would be obliged to come to Parliament before the end of the Session and demand a national grant. He therefore trusted that the President of the Poor Law Board would take into favourable consideration the present proposition.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had to remind the hon. Member, that as the clause could not be put, there was no question before the Committee. It proposed to give powers to the Public Works Loan Commissioners to appropriate public money in a manner not authorized by the existing law. If that were done, it must be done by an Act of Parliament introduced with the consent of the Crown.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he would move that the Chairman report progress, in order that he might have an opportunity of expressing his approval of the proposal contained in the clause. He believed that such a course would afford a very proper mode of employing the public money, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the guardian of the public purse, would introduce a Bill for the purpose of giving the Commissioners the proposed power. Money had been advanced by the Government to promote agricultural improvements, railways, and other things, and he thought that a loan might legitimately be made to the unions. The fact was that the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Villiers') concession of power to extend the loan over fourteen years made matters worse instead of better for the unions, because they would have to pay interest for a longer period. He moved that the Chairman report progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was not regular to move that progress be reported merely for the purpose of raising a discussion on a matter with which it was not competent for the Committee to deal.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he only wished to state, that if the subject could have been properly discussed, he would have proposed that the powers of the Commissioners should be similar to those which they exercised in the case of advances for the improvement of lands, making the principal and interest of the loans repayable at 6½ per cent, for a period of twenty-two years. The object he had had in view was to afford Her Majesty's Government an opportunity of more fully considering the matter before the Committee. He had been informed that great difficulty was experienced in the manufacturing districts in raising money for the relief of the poor, and he had no doubt that that difficulty would every day increase. The matter therefore required the serious consideration of the House itself. Why should not the Government assist the manufacturing districts in the present emergency by enabling them to borrow the money which might be considered requisite on the lowest possible terms? He hoped the matter would be reconsidered by the Government, especially as it could be done without incurring any loss.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he did not desire to prolong a discussion which had been pronounced irregular, but, at the same time, he was unwilling that the Committee should suppose that this matter had been overlooked by the Government. The effect of the Amendment he had introduced was to render the prolongation of the period of any loan optional, and not compulsory. The hon. Member for Oldham appeared to think that the Exchequer Loan Commissioners had command of an unlimited sum to be applied to any object for which a grant might be made; but that was not the case. It would be seen by the Act of Geo. IV., the powers of which had been from time to time renewed, that a specific sum was voted to the Commissioners for a specific purpose. No power was given to the Commissioners to advance money for the purpose for which it was desired by the hon. Member. If hon. Members referred to the Act, they would find that the particular works to which money was to be devoted were specified as works of utility, and it was to be granted according to the amount which might be in hand. And even with respect to advances made in connection with the poor, the nature of the work required to be done by the poor was always distinctly defined. The proposal of the hon. Member for Oldham was, that there should be a grant for the maintenance of the poor or for defraying the current expenditure for their relief. Now, a grant for such a purpose had never been made, and before such a principle were sanctioned, he thought it ought to receive the serious consideration of the House. If any grant were to be made, the unions requiring it must state a definite sum; but no specific sum had been mentioned. He was not going into the question whether or not it was sound policy for the State to make advances in order to assist the manufacturing districts. He did not deny that a time might come when advances would be necessary, but no precedent existed, and up to the present moment the Government had seen no reason to justify the step suggested by the hon. Member for Oldham. They had not heard that the guardians were unable to obtain money, that it was impossible to collect the rates, or that the funds which had been provided had been exhausted. There was evidence, indeed, of an opposite character; but, at the same time, whenever any hon. Member should think it his duty to ask for a Vote in aid of the distressed districts, the whole matter would be deliberately considered by the Government.

MR. BAINES said, it seemed to him that it would be altogether unwarrantable for the Committee at that time to make any grant of public money for the relief of the distress in the cotton manufacturing districts, and he believed that the Members for Lancashire and Cheshire did not wish for a grant of that nature. All the Members for those counties with whom he had conversed repudiated the idea. What they wanted was, not a Vote of money, but such facilities as Government could afford through agencies of which it had the command, to enable them to obtain sums which they would borrow upon their own security, which they would repay to the last farthing, but which it was most important they should procure on the lowest possible terms. The country was bound to meet the distressed districts half-way, to show that it respected in the highest degree the manner in which they had conducted themselves, and that it felt for the heavy and unprecedented calamity to which they were subjected. He thought the Government might easily do that which the hon. Member for Oldham had asked them to do. The case was one of peculiar and extreme distress, affecting the largest branch of our manufacturing industry, and involving a most important part of the community. One-fourth of the entire population of the afflicted unions was in the receipt of relief, either from the parochial rates or from the relief committees. His hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) stated lately that the loss was from £11,000,000 to £12,000,000 annually, but he (Mr. Baines) believed that the loss of wages alone was £9,000,000 a year; and if they added to that the loss of all profits on the part of the millowners, and the loss of rents on property, the loss would amount to nearly £20,000,000 a year. There was every probability that the distress would exist for some time longer, but he firmly believed that prosperity would eventually be restored to that manufacture. Cotton could be grown in a great portion of the world, extending over 60 degrees of latitude; and though some time was required to cultivate a sufficient quantity, he believed that the required quantity would be produced, and that again the machinery of Lancashire and Cheshire would be set going. Inasmuch, then, as the distress was peculiar and extreme, as it would exist but for a limited period, and as there was a certainty that there would be the ability to repay the amount borrowed, it seemed to him that the Government were called upon to do everything they could to provide facilities for obtaining the desired loans.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board should have read him a lecture upon the impropriety of introducing the subject of a loan before the hon. Member for Oldham had brought forward his clause. The right hon. Gentleman must have done so with a full knowledge of the fact that the clause in question could not be discussed at all.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he was not aware that the clause could not be considered until the circumstance was pointed out by the Chairman.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he should however maintain that the observations he had made were strictly in order, inasmuch as he merely suggested to the Government to consider whether they could not give further facilities to the manufacturing districts by enabling the Exchequer Loan Commissioners to lend them money. He had in his pocket the latest report of Mr. Farnall, from which it appeared that in Lancashire at that moment, out of a population of 1,900,000 souls, there were 23 per cent receiving relief of one kind or another. In the town of Preston there were 33 per cent in the same condition. Under such circumstances the representatives of the distressed districts were justified in taking every opportunity to impress upon the Government the necessity of providing against any increase in the existing enormous amount of distress. The right hon. President of the Poor Law Board was wrong in stating that there was no precedent for the proposition of the hon. Member for Oldham. He had already cited more than one instance in which advances were made to the merchants of London. Another reason why the distressed unions should be allowed to borrow money from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners was, that the granting of such a power would remove many objections which were entertained to the Bill as it stood. Great dissatisfaction existed in the manufacturing districts with the principle on which the rate in aid was carried out, and which he believed was not, as had been stated by the President of the Poor Law Board, in accordance with the statute of Elizabeth. That statute said that when one union could not support its own poor, it should go upon the adjoining union; but in the present case the President of the Poor Law Board had defined the inability of any union to support its poor to be a rate of 3s. in the pound. The expenditure of such a rate enabled it to go on another union, and then the inability of the union was defined by a rate of 5s. in the pound, which extended the liability to the county. This was an entirely different law altogether from that of Elizabeth; and tenants complained that they should be obliged to contribute under circumstances which they could not contemplate so as to enter into arrangements with their landlords. He would suggest that the distressed unions should have the power of borrowing money at a less percentage, and repayable over a greater number of years; and then, if his right hon. Friend would consent to it, he would recommend that the limit at which the distressed unions should come upon the neighbouring unions should be raised from 5s. to 6s. But he would impress on the Chancellor of the Exchequer the expediency of giving greater facilities to the unions for borrowing money, so as to relieve other unions as far as possible from the burden of a rate in aid, which they believed to be thoroughly unjust.

MR. HUMBERSTON said, he should maintain that there was no new principle in making advances for the support of the poor. The 43 Elizabeth authorized the levying of rates, not only for the relief of the poor, but for setting them to work. Nothing could be more irksome than the compulsory idleness to which thousands were now consigned in the manufacturing districts; and it would be a most legitimate course for the House to authorize the Government to grant loans to Boards of Guardians, who had ample security to offer, with a view to check this evil. There was a strong objection to the application of the rate-in-aid principle, the money obtained by which was found to be too easily obtained, and might be recklessly squandered. Although, indeed, there was no reluctance to grant a rate in aid when all other means had failed, yet it was felt that it ought to be kept as a last resource. If the Government would give the unions sufficient power and facilities for borrowing, many of them would be able to support and set to work their own poor, without calling for rates in aid from other places. The gross annual rateable value of the property in the Union of Ashton-under-Lyne exceeded £300,000, and surely the guardians of that union might raise at least £100,000 if necessary by loan. Up to the 31st of January last, no less a sum than £70,000 had been voluntarily advanced from different funds to the Union of Ashton-under-Lyne. Surely, then, a union having had that assistance, and possessing such large means of its own at command, ought to be called upon to exercise its power of borrowing money to such an extent as the Poor Law Board might deem just, before it could claim the benefit of a rate in aid.

Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH said, he would add his voice to that of other Gentlemen who had urged the Government to take into their serious consideration the propriety of granting money through the Loan Commissioners, as being the fairest mode of meeting the present great emergency. By the time the Bill expired he was sure it would be found impossible to re-enact the rate in aid, so extremely unjust was it in its operation.

Mr. DODSON said, that the difference between the statute of Elizabeth and the measure under consideration, was, that the statute of Elizabeth left it to the discretion of the local justices to say when a parish should be aided by its neighbours, while the Bill fixed the limits, and in his opinion fixed the limit at a low point for wealthy Lancashire. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) was sanguine that prosperity would shortly be restored to the cotton districts—that the weavers would return to their looms, and that everything would return to its former state. Well, he only hoped that that might be so, but it was certainly no argument for doing what had been proposed by hon. Members. He might remark, too, that the precedents quoted for granting loans of the public money for this purpose were all drawn from the evil times, before the passing of the new Poor Law, and he thought the House ought to hesitate before it followed them on this occasion. If, as stated by the hon. Member for Leeds, the distress was to be merely transitory, there seemed to be less reason for calling on the Public Exchequer. The difficulty was not so much the largeness of the demand made for the support of the poor, as the suddenness with which the rates had increased. There was a manufacturing town in Leicestershire where the rates had for many years been 5s. in the pound, and where they were now 8s.; but the Bill did not apply to that county. If it could maintain its own poor, there was no reason why the manufacturing parishes of Lancashire, when things had settled down, should not likewise be able to do the same. If, however, rates were to be permanently increased in Lancashire, there must be a proportionate alteration in the amount of rent received by the landlords; and any increase of the facilities for borrowing would be merely a staving-off of this inevitable arrangement. As the House would have another opportunity of considering the question before the end of the Session, the Government, he thought, were not called on to commit themselves at that time to the principle of loans of public monies.

Mr. BAINES: I did not say that the distress would be of brief continuance; on the contrary, I said that it would have a considerable continuance, but that ultimately a return to prosperity was certain.

Mr. HENLEY said, he thought that before the Government asked the Committee to come to any decision, they ought to put before it in a plain and definite shape how much the counties in question had actually raised. Up to that time no such information had been given. The expenditure for a week, or for a given number of weeks, had been multiplied to show what the yearly amount would be at a similar rate; but what the Committee wanted was an accurate statement showing how much had been actually raised within the year, and then it could be seen what ground there was for making such an unusual application. The hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Dodson) thought it very odd that people should dislike a rate in aid. Most persons objected to pay money, and Lancashire had shown herself quite as sensitive on that point as any other part of the country with which he was acquainted. It was very fortunate, he thought, that a limit had been fixed, and that it had not been necessary to determine by an appeal to the Courts what constituted inability to pay. He did not say whether in fixing that limit the proper amount had been adopted; but he remembered that when the debate took place the Members for Lancashire were by no means anxious to have the limit fixed too high. The hon. Member for Leeds had said that it was only a case of persons asking for facilities to borrow money upon property affording ample security. That did not correctly represent the facts. The unions wanted to borrow upon Government security at a less rate of interest than they could obtain it themselves in the open market. Well, the question was whether they could make such a case as would justify the Government in giving their security, and the basis of such a case was the amount already raised stated in figures, and not mere estimates in conjecture. The information for which he had asked was therefore indispensable. A 1s. rate in Lancashire would produce about £350,000, while at that time it was quite impossible to give an opinion how many shillings in the pound had been raised. The proposition was one of an unusual, and, if not maturely considered, possibly of a dangerous character, for nothing gave greater encouragement to lavish expenditure than a facility of borrowing at low rates. No one could prophesy how long the present state of things would last. It was important, therefore, to ascertain whether it was intended, whatever the duration of the crisis, to keep these people in idleness. A great temptation was held out to those who might want to employ these people again—he did not say they would yield to that temptation; but the Committee ought to bear in mind that to keep the working classes idle for a lengthened period was to incur great risk of demoralization, and that, once demoralized, the bad effects did not pass away in a single generation.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, and to be printed [Bill 44.]

TOBACCO DUTIES BILL—[BILL 21.]

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23d February], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the Laws for raising a Revenue on Tobacco,"—(Mr. Ayrton),—instead thereof.

Debate resumed.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought it only respectful to the House, that having moved the adjournment, he should state in a few words why he took part in the proceedings. He should only refer to that part of the question which concerned his own country. He received daily remonstrances against the course which the Government were taking in this Bill. His constituents were in no way affected, but the subject created great interest in Ireland, and it was the duty of every Irish Member to press on the Government an inquiry into the allegations made by the tobacco manufacturers. The question had not, as had been asserted, any reference whatever to free trade; the prohibition of the culture of the tobacco plant in Ireland was decisive upon that point. There was not merely a differential duty on the cultivation of this plant, but an absolute prohibition to the Irishman, as indeed in this country. An hon. Gentleman, who seemed better acquainted with the statistics of the antipodes than of Ireland, had asserted that Ireland could not grow tobacco. If so, the prohibition was useless; but the reverse was the fact, for several years since it had been grown so successfully that the Government passed an Act to prohibit its growth and to purchase the crop at a sum of £300,000. It was absurd, therefore, to talk of free trade when actual prohibition was given to protect the foreigners against the home growers. He believed, from the statements which had been made to him, that the Bill would seriously affect the trade of Ireland. Irish snuff was made from the stalks of tobacco. The manufacturer had to pay for these stalks 1s. per pound; and as it required a pound and a half of them to make one pound of snuff, the cost to the manufacturer was 1s. 6d. Add to that 2d., the cost of the manufacture, and 3s. 2d. for duty, and the cost was 4s. 10d. Now, in foreign countries the stalks were of no value whatever, and therefore there was a difference of the value of the stalks to the English manufacturer in favour of the foreigner. The consequence was, that the measure, instead of being a measure of free trade, was a measure of protection to the foreign manufacturer against the Irish. The consumer would not be benefited, for the foreign manufacturer would raise the price, and they would find that their home trade would be transferred to the foreigner, as they had found in many other cases. And so with regard to roll tobacco, which was the sort principally smoked in Ireland. In Ireland they prepared this rolled tobacco, as well as a manufactured tobacco, made up with molasses, rum, and other materials, requiring some manipulation; while in England they smoked a tobacco called bird's-eye, with others which, unless adulterated, required no further manufacture than the cutting of the leaf. The proposal to admit cavendish on the terms of the Bill would drive our article out of the trade in Ireland, and transfer the trade to the foreigner, without any corresponding advantage to the consumer, for the price would be raised as the result of the monopoly. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talked of giving the home manufacturer a boon by providing that he might manufacture cavendish tobacco in bond; but the many arrangements made for fiscal purposes prevented the Irish tradesman from manufacturing in bond at all. Besides, many of the Irish manufacturers were in the interior of the country. There was one inland one which paid duty, it was said, to the amount of £150,000. There was one which also paid a considerable duty, and employed many persons; and the proprietor had assured him, that if the Bill passed in its present form, he would be obliged to relinquish the manufacture; and there were many others similarly placed far from the Custom-house establishments, which were generally in the larger cities and at the ports. Now, did the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to deal with these manufacturers, situated as he had described? Were they all to be destroyed for the sake of the theoretical advantages which the hon. Gentleman styled free competition, or was he about to form Customs establishments in every small town where there was a tobacco manufactory? These establishments must cause expense, and he saw no provision for them in the Bill. He wished to add, that he made these statements on that serious subject, not upon his own authority, but on that of the Irish manufacturers themselves.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he could not help thinking that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been rather unfortunate, if not ill-advised, in the course which he had pursued in regard to the Bill. While the right hon. Gentleman had brought it, or rather the Resolutions upon which it was founded, before the House at a period so very early in the Session that it had created some surprise at his dealing at that time with a matter of some importance to the financial statement, yet certainly the course he had taken did give ample time for fully considering the matter. At the same time, he had brought forward a measure the importance of which appeared to have been somewhat exaggerated. Upon the principle of the Bill he believed the majority of the House were agreed; but, unfortunately, the discussion had been brought on at such inconvenient hours that two discussions had been provoked and two adjournments had taken place upon a very simple question. That he thought was to be regretted. The debate, however, had thus been spread over three nights, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets having made his speech upon one occasion and the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon another; and now the discussion was renewed in the presence of many Members who had heard neither of those speeches. However, as the matter now stood, they had only to consider in what manner they should deal with the Amendment. He had not the advantage of having heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Friday last, but from the published reports he believed that his objections to the Motion of the hon. Member were two—

[Third Night.]

First, that the course proposed was unprecedented; and, secondly, that it would only have the effect of wasting the time of the House, and of putting off the discussion upon the Bill. With regard to the course being unprecedented, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) did not know whether there was any exact precedent for it; but the House ought to bear in mind that they were about to deal with a most important and at the same time peculiar branch of the revenue, realizing between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000 annually, or one-fourth of the total Customs revenue of the country, and that the tax in fact amounted to a duty of 1,200 per cent upon the article upon which it was imposed. In order to secure those duties being raised, it was necessary to subject the manufacturers of the article to a number of complicated Excise restrictions. In consequence, there were many delicate questions raised, all of which ought to be considered before deciding to touch the tobacco duties. There was no saying to what consequences it might lead if they proceeded hastily and inconsiderately to deal with one portion of the subject. In 1840 an alteration was made in the mode of securing the tobacco duties and in less than three years it was found necessary to retrace that step, showing how careful the House should be in dealing with these duties. Therefore, he did not consider the fact of there being no exact precedent decisive against the proposal of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. The next question was, whether that proposal, if agreed to, would only lead to waste of time, and the virtual defeat of the measure. If that were its object, he certainly was not prepared to support it, as he was of opinion the measure was good in principle. But, although it was a step in the right direction, great caution was required in taking it, and he thought they would rather be losing time by recklessly discussing the measure in a Committee of the Whole House, without any authentic information to guide them. It was not true that a whole Session need be lost if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee. A case in point occurred in the previous year, when the sugar duties were referred to a Select Committee; and he apprehended that the questions which were raised in reference to the sugar duties were at least as great in importance and in complication as those raised by the Bill before them, but that Committee upon the sugar

Sir Stafford Northcote

duties occupied very little more than two months, and then they presented a very good Report. Now, if they were to send this Bill to a Committee for discussion, and the Committee were animated by a like spirit to that which animated the Committee upon the sugar duties, they would get through their work in very good time. The Session had only just begun, and the Bill need not be lost if sent to a Select Committee. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: That is not the Motion.] His right hon. Friend reminded him that that was not the Motion, and he entirely agreed with him; but he was about to add, when he was interrupted, that he thought that the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was not the one best adapted to meet the circumstances of the case. He himself would very much prefer to see the Bill read a second time, and that then the Chancellor of the Exchequer should agree to refer it to a Select Committee in order that they might affirm the principle of the Bill and afterwards discuss its details. He quite felt with the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne) that they would be utterly at sea if they were to discuss the question in a Committee of the Whole House, in which most of the Members must necessarily know nothing of the details. He himself had had communications with several persons engaged in the tobacco business, but he did not know whether to take their statements as correct or not. He had had no opportunity of sifting them, and he did not know that he could do so in a Committee of the Whole House. The same would no doubt be the case with other hon. Members. Again, if they discussed the matter in a Committee of the Whole House, many hon. Members would come in on a division and vote with the Government or with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, without having heard the discussion. It was quite impossible that they could satisfactorily dispose of a complicated matter of this kind in such a way as that. As he had said, his wish was that the Government should consent to send the Bill to a Select Committee; and if he received an assurance that they would pursue that course, he would vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets; but if he failed to obtain such an assurance, he should feel obliged to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member, because he thought it impossible to go properly into the question without that minute and perfect information which could only be got through the medium of a Select Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told the House that he wished them to examine the matter for themselves; and when they said that they wished to examine it by means of a Committee, he said, "I do not wish that, and you must examine it in my way." That was not quite fair. It was like a conjuror who asks you to examine his cards but will not let you take them into your own hands for the purpose. Unless the House were allowed to inquire by means of a Select Committee, the invitation to them to examine into the subject was a mockery. He differed to some extent from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who seemed to be taking a line not quite in accordance with the received opinions of the majority of the House. He (Sir S. Northcote) was quite prepared to admit that in principle the measure was good and a step in the right direction. The details, however, had not been discussed. As matters stood, manufactured tobacco was practically excluded by a duty of a prohibitory character, and it would be for the interest of the consumer and of the revenue that that duty should be reduced so as to allow of foreign cigars entering into competition with English; but if the reduction went too far, they might be injuring the English manufacturer without benefiting, but rather injuring, the revenue. There were two evils to be guarded against—smuggling and adulteration. A reduction of duty might diminish smuggling; but if foreign cigars were allowed to be imported at too low a duty, a temptation would be offered to the English manufacturer to have recourse to adulteration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that it was necessary to make a distinction between the manufactured and the unmanufactured article in order to place the British producers on a fair footing with foreigners; but the question whether the protection given was adequate could not be discussed properly in a Committee of the Whole House without further inquiry. There was also to be considered the question whether the arrangements proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for manufacturing cavendish tobacco in bond were satisfactory. They were told by the manufacturers that they were not satisfactory, and he wanted to know how that was, and to hear the statements of the manufacturers on one side and those of the Custom-house officers upon the other. Then came the question whether they ought to give the cigar makers power to manufacture in bond? That was one of the questions upon which he should like to hear the opinions of the manufacturers and of the Custom-house officers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on being asked the question, answered that he would take the matter into consideration; but afterwards he said, without giving any reasons, that he thought that it would not do. The House surely ought to know what his reasons were, and how far they would bear examination; and he must himself confess that the only reason which he had heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer give was not a satisfactory one. He said that he could not allow the manufacture in bond because such permission would only be applicable to large manufacturers; in other words, that it would give the larger manufacturers an advantage which they ought not to have over the small ones; but as the effect of giving the privilege of manufacturing in bond was simply to place those who availed themselves of it on a level with the foreigner, the question would arise, did not the right hon. Gentleman, in refusing this privilege, propose to put the large manufacturers upon the same footing of disadvantage with regard to the foreigner that he had refused to put the small manufacturers upon in reference to the large manufacturers? That seemed to lead to the conclusion that the privileges given to the foreigner were too great. Another point was as to the question of the drawback. The Treasury and the Customs had fallen into an error respecting the drawback, and had fixed it at so low a point, that exportation was impossible. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now promised a better one; but when a mistake in the calculations of the departments on one point was thus admitted, he thought that the conclusions of the Treasury and of the Customs authorities might be fairly challenged on other points. The House was told that the right hon. Gentleman only wished to give fair play to the home manufacturers; but with every wish to do that, he might have made some mistake in the figures, as had been done in the instance he had just mentioned. For these reasons he thought it desirable that the question should be considered in a Select Committee, where it might be disposed of in a comparatively short time; and such a course, indeed, would probably be attended with a saving of time, because nothing was worse than to press legislation upon matters of such serious importance, and then afterwards have to undo it. If, therefore, it was not understood that the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee after being read a second time, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. CRAWFORD said, it appeared to him that the proposition of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets seriously invaded those principles of free trade upon which the commercial legislation of this country had been for some time past founded. When he heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night, he was in some doubt as to the vote he ought to give; but having given to the right hon. Gentleman's statement his full consideration, and having carefully weighed the representations made to him by his constituents upon the subject, he had arrived at the conclusion that there was nothing in the particular article of tobacco that should exempt it from the principles to which he had referred. The correct principle was that every consumer should have the commodity he required free from increase of cost by reason of Custom-house duties of any kind except those which were necessary for purposes of revenue. The proposition of the Government rested upon three points. They said that the alterations they proposed would be for the advantage of the revenue, that they would prevent smuggling, and would be for the benefit of the consumer; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had also stated negatively that the measure would not in the long run affect injuriously the manufacturer. Upon all these points his hon. Friend was at variance with the Government, but he (Mr. Crawford) was inclined to think that the views expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were the correct ones. With regard to the revenue, they were not in a position to express any opinion as to what the extent of the advantage might be. But the question was intimately connected with the question of smuggling. It had been stated the other night in the House that smuggling was not now carried on to the extent that was supposed. But if that were not the case, how was it they had not seen an increase in the consumption of tobacco with the increased population, as they had in the case of every other article of consumption. Their own senses told them that tobacco was used as largely by every class of the community as it ever had been; and, consequently, if there had not been the increase of consumption that there had been with regard to other articles some other cause must have been in operation to prevent it. For his own part, having examined the evidence taken before the Committee of 1844, and having seen to what an extent smuggling was carried on, and the ingenious methods by which tobacco was surreptitiously introduced, he had arrived at the conclusion that smuggling was still practised to a considerable extent, and that it behoved that House, therefore, to sanction the proposition of the Government, if it would have no other effect than to remove that evil. With regard to the interest of the consumer, he held, as he had before remarked, that the consumer of tobacco had a right to have access to the tobacco which he used without the cost being increased to him by any Custom-house or other exaction than that which the revenue required, and that if they protected the home manufacturer of tobacco against the foreign manufacturer, they were introducing again that system of protection against which that House had so often declared its opinion. The Committee to which he had already referred had, he thought, disposed of all the great principles which were involved in the present discussion; and considering the numerous opportunities which a Committee of the Whole House afforded for the consideration of the details of the measure, he saw no reason for resorting to the tedious process of sending the subject before a Select Committee. Reference had been made to the Committee of 1830 upon the growth of tobacco; and if hon. Members would refer to the Report of that Committee, they would find ample evidence with regard to the growth and manufacture of tobacco in Ireland. The permission to grow tobacco in Ireland for home consumption was not availed of in that country from 1799 to 1824; and though during the succeeding five years 500 acres were brought under tobacco cultivation, the evidence before the Committee showed, that owing to the inferiority of quality, a duty of 1s. 8d. as against 3s. on foreign tobacco would not be a compensating protection. Another thing which struck him in the course of the discussion was, that three prominent Members of the House, the hon. Members for the Tower Hamlets,

Southwark, and Sheffield, particularly, were all of them abandoning the great principles of free trade in the interests of a particular manufacture. Speaking for himself, he should not feel disposed to throw over the interests of ninety-nine out of every hundred of his constituents for the sake of the one who might be engaged in this manufacture. From the Report of the Committee which sat on the growth of tobacco in Ireland, in 1830, it appeared that Irish tobacco was in a great degree inferior to that grown in America. He would therefore ask whether it would be possible to expect that in Ireland or elsewhere tobacco could be grown profitably unless its cultivation were supported by a protective duty, and whether any man would now get up and affirm that any article of domestic consumption ought to be protected by a duty? He was prepared to assent to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he was anxious to have the question as to the rates of duty decided by a Committee, who had fully considered it, and heard all the evidence that it might be thought necessary to adduce on the subject. That could only be done by a Select Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was at present unable to state distinctly the rates of duty which ought to be laid down; and if that question were left to a Committee of the Whole House, they would have it decided by hon. Members many of whom would know nothing about the details, but would rush in to vote after the Question was put. They all knew that Ireland was suffering from a want of labour, and the tobacco manufacture was one of its most important industries, as hon. Gentlemen well knew that Ireland was remarkable for its excellent snuff. But there were other considerations. He had always understood that objects of luxury were, as compared with those of prime necessity, fit subjects for taxation, and tobacco was certainly a luxury compared with many other taxed articles. Moreover, the revenue from the tobacco duties was increasing. In 1860 it was £5,600,000; in 1862, £5,714,000—showing that the trade was growing. The Army and Navy Estimates were before them, and there was a reduction of £2,000,000, and they heard that the revenue was in a very flourishing state: if they adopted the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and endangered a portion of the revenue derived from tobacco, they might prevent a reduction in articles of prime necessity, such as sugar and tea, and the income tax. For these reasons he thought it desirable that they should hear the financial statement, and consider whether there were not other duties which might be diminished with advantage before giving up perhaps £2,000,000 of the tobacco revenue.

MR. CHILDERS said, the real question at issue between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) was not whether the duty should be 5s. 2d. or 5s. 6d. It was this:—The hon. Member asserted, that whereas under the law which had been in existence for many years a valuable manufacture had been raised, in which it was decided by the Committee which sat in 1844 that no alterations could be made with advantage, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the other hand, said that the state of trade was not satisfactory, and that smuggled cigars were very largely imported. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets denied that any change was required—

MR. AYRTON explained, that what he said was, that if one change were introduced, a great many would be necessary.

MR. CHILDERS: But still he insisted that unless the duty on unmanufactured tobacco were reduced, no change could be made in the higher rates. For his part, he agreed with the hon. Member for Stamford that it was not the case of a reduction of duty with a view to recuperation afterwards; it was simply whether that difference of duty between manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco, which was fixed at a time when questions of political economy were not so fairly raised as they were now, was a fair difference. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's opinion was that the present state of the tobacco question, quite irrespective of the inquiry whether the duty on manufactured tobacco should be greatly reduced, was eminently unsatisfactory. He would test the question by a simple canon. Whenever a trade and the fiscal laws affecting it are in a satisfactory condition, either the article would be manufactured better abroad; and, if so, the import would steadily increase; or if this country were able to carry on its manufacture skilfully, there would be a steady increase from year to year in the export. If that was a proper axiom to be laid down in all instances, it was easily applicable to the case of tobacco. The import trade in cigars had not increased, except to a very small extent. On the other hand, there was no increase in the export trade from this country; and nothing could be more miserably bad than the home trade in manufactured cigars. If that were so, the House was clearly justified in passing the second reading of a Bill which would bring about a change. The consumption of cigars in this country, as compared with other tobacco, was probably much less than in any foreign country at the present time, or in any British colony, where the law stood in a better position than it did here. The consumption of cigars in England, though it was somewhat difficult to ascertain the facts accurately since the abolition of the old Excise survey, was between 2 and 2½ per cent of the whole consumption. In foreign countries the amount of consumption was also somewhat difficult to get at, but in no foreign country probably was it less than 5 or 6 per cent. When they came to the colonies, where the habits of the people were in a great degree similar to those of England in other respects, the consumption of cigars amounted to 10, 12, and 14 per cent of the entire consumption. Therefore the law was favourable neither to the revenue nor to the wishes of the people, and should be put upon another footing. There was another question, of less importance, connected with this. In the consumption of snuff there was a great falling off at the present time. In no respect had national manners changed more completely in the last hundred years than with regard to the relative use of snuff and tobacco. In order to illustrate the utter impossibility of some event taking place the Poet Gay had written—

"Sooner shall Britain's youth from snuff be freed,
And fops' apartments smoke with India's weed."

However, he would leave the snuff question in other hands. But as to cigars, he thought that the evidence before the Committee of 1844 disclosed the facts without further inquiry. It was true that the witnesses who were manufacturers were anxious to retain protection. But almost all admitted that it was too high, and they justified it by arguments derived from the comparative rates of wages in England and abroad, of no value to free traders. Several admitted that a difference of 50 per cent was ample, and this was more than covered by 5s. as against 3s. 2d. There was no system of statistics in this country to show the loss in the original weight incurred in changing tobacco into cigars, but in France, for example, where statistics were kept, it appeared that the loss was only eight per cent; that is to say, there was a loss of about 1,500,000 kilogrammes on 17,500,000 kilogrammes of leaf. Such being the facts, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put forward good grounds for giving a second reading to the Bill, and in Committee the exact amount of duty could afterwards be fixed. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not be induced to take a course which would be inconsistent with the principle of free trade. The question before them was a consumers' question, and as he was opposed to every attempt at bolstering up a manufacture to the injury of the revenue and the consumer, he should cordially support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HORSFALL said, he rose to protest against the view taken by the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) that the matter before the House was a question between protection and free trade. The question before the House was simply this, whether they should proceed at once to legislate, or wait till the whole subject had been fully considered by a Committee. He had voted for the adjournment of the debate on the first night, not from any opposition to the Bill, but because he thought there was a want of information, and they ought to have some time to receive communications from their constituents. When he saw the notice on the subject which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put upon the paper, he could not help asking why it was necessary to bring in a Bill before the financial statement was made. They were told there were precedents for doing so, but there might be bad precedents as well as good ones. When a Motion was made last year to pledge the House to a reduction of the duty on fire insurances, he opposed the Motion, not that he did not think that the duty ought to be reduced, but, because it would be unjust to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to demand the remission of a duty which, upon making his financial statement, he might not be in a position to concede. He had received many communications upon the subject of the Bill, several of them approving its principle, but saying that great injustice had been done to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by those who drew the Bill, because it would be found inoperative. All the communications which he had received, however, concurred in begging him to support the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets for further inquiry. He trusted, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would render a division unnecessary, by consenting to take the second reading on the understanding that the Bill should afterwards be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) began his speech by complaining that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not anticipated the discussion upon the principle of the Bill; and in the very next sentence he stated that he supposed upon the principle of the Bill they were all unanimous. The hon. Gentleman also spoke of the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets as inopportune, and regretted, that unless he got a certain assurance, he should be compelled to support it. But what, then, became of the complaint against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if they were all agreed upon the principle of the Bill? His hon. Friend appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to appoint a Committee on the Tobacco Duties at a further stage of the measure; but the question then before the House was this, whether the Bill should be read a second time or not. The hon. Member for Stamford did not appear to stand well to his guns. Would the hon. Gentleman look to the terms of the Amendment, which were "that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the laws for raising a revenue on tobacco"? Would the House let it go forth that it was a question in doubt whether it was expedient to alter those laws or not? The hon. Member for Stamford did not doubt the expediency of altering those laws, and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets himself said he did not doubt, but he only wanted to promote more changes. Now, Her Majesty's Government stood upon the principle of the Bill, and that was the reason why they asked the House to assent to the second reading. Their object was to apply the same wholesome principle to tobacco which had been applied to almost every other article. His right hon. Friend had brought in the Bill to accomplish three purposes—First, to increase the revenue; secondly, to benefit the consumer by cheapening the article; and, thirdly, to deprive the smuggler of part of the unlawful profits of his business.

Was it necessary to argue the question at length after the speeches of the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) and the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and after the admissions of the hon. Member for Stamford? Was it necessary to argue, when a single fact contained the germ of the whole question—when there was raised upon that article nearly £5,600,000? [MR. AYRTON: Not from manufactured tobacco.] That only made the case all the stronger. If £5,600,000 was raised from unmanufactured tobacco and less than £200,000 from the manufactured article, what was the necessary inference? Was it not that, so far as our Customs regulations were concerned, there was a complete monopoly somewhere as against the consumer in the production of that tobacco? It was the destruction of that monopoly which was demanded. If it were a monopoly in the hands of the home manufacturer, it was a wrong against the consumer, who had a right to free trade in that as in other articles. But a worse monopoly was that given by the effect of the existing legislation to the foreign manufacturers, through the intervention of the smuggler. He understood that with regard to cavendish tobacco, the foreign manufacturers obtained a monopoly in the markets of this country through the intervention of the smuggler, and it was to destroy that monopoly that the passing of the present Bill was required. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets asked the House to do in respect of tobacco what had never been proposed in respect of any other articles—namely, to interpose by a dilatory inquiry as to the expediency of making the reduction at all. His hon. Friend said that tobacco was a peculiar article of manufacture; but the same observation had been made with respect to every single article on which reductions had been proposed in former times. The sugar duties, said the hon. Member for Stamford, constituted a more complicated case, and were well dealt with by a Select Committee in the last Session; and the hon. Member thought that that might form a precedent for a similar course of proceeding with regard to the tobacco duties. Now, it ought to be borne in mind that the duties on refined sugar had been from time to time considered in that House, and settled without being referred to a Select Committee, in consequence of the adoption of a Motion like that before them on the second reading of the Bill; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer only asked the House of Commons to deal with the tobacco duties in the mode in which the sugar duties had heretofore been dealt with. It was said that the measure was favourable to the rich and not to the poor; but the reduction on Havannah and Manilla cigars was the repeal of a direct impost, whereas on the great mass of manufactured tobacco the repeal was from a prohibitory duty—from a duty which did not go to the Treasury, whilst it added to the price of the article consumed by the great mass of the people. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) said they ought to begin by taking the duty off the raw material. That was a plausible argument. But he contended that the first thing to be done was to remove the protective duty, and then, when they saw what the increase of revenue was, the House would be in a better condition to determine what they would do with regard to the raw material. He therefore confidently appealed to the House not now to adopt an evasive Resolution, but to pursue with respect to tobacco the course heretofore pursued with respect to all the great articles of consumption, and to affirm the principle of the measure by passing the second reading.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he trusted that the House might be allowed to discuss the small question which arose on that occasion without any appeal to the large and general principles of free trade. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had told them that every article which had been legislated upon in the way of reduction of duty for the last thirty years had been regarded as a peculiar one. But there was one peculiarity in regard to tobacco which did not attach to any other—namely, that all the manufacturers of tobacco, as far as he could ascertain, would not object to Excise regulations being imposed upon them, if they were only allowed to choose their material and their mode of manufacture, with a drawback on exportation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself admitted that a difference must be made in the amount of duty to be paid by the person who had manufactured tobacco in bond, and by the foreigner who paid at the Custom House. The question was how the amount of that difference was to be obtained, and how the evidence was to be taken which could satisfy them that the proper amount of difference was arrived at. He therefore thought that some investigation was necessary, either before the Bill was read a second time, or, as he should prefer, after it was read a second time. Take, for instance, the article snuff, one of the principal forms of tobacco manufacture in Ireland. The manufacturers stated that for every pound of snuff made a pound and a half of tobacco was consumed. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Not tobacco, but stalks.] They said tobacco. The Chancellor of the Exchequer originally framed his Resolutions and his Bill entirely overlooking that fact, and fixing such a rate of duty as would have placed the Irish manufacturers at a great disadvantage. Since then he had proposed to amend his figures by a difference of some 5d. per pound. The manufacturers said that that sum was not sufficient; the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that it was. It was impossible that a Committee of the Whole House could decide where the truth lay; and this was therefore pre-eminently one of those subjects into which a Select Committee, before which the interested parties could appear and be heard, might advantageously inquire. Again, the Bill provided for the manufacture in bond in this country of cavendish and negro-head, the object being to enable the manufacturer to do what had hitherto been prohibited, to mix with the tobacco sugar or saccharine matter. The Irish manufacturers said that cavendish or negro-head was not made in Ireland, and was not required there; but there was a sort of tobacco which was made there, roll tobacco, and they asked why that also should not be made in bond. With regard to cigars, too, although that was a manufacture which did not so nearly concern Ireland, hon. Members had asked why they also should not be allowed to be made with an admixture of saccharine matter, in which form the foreigner could import them. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, he cannot.] He saw in this Bill no clause which prescribed the form in which cigars should be imported, so as to prevent the foreigner from bringing in those which contained saccharine matter. Under these circumstances was it anything short of mockery to say that the home manufacturers were about to enter into a free competition with foreigners? It seemed to him to be a proposal to engage the home manufacturer to compete with the foreigner with his hands tied behind his back. There might be good reasons why it was impossible to allow roll tobacco and cigars to be manufactured in bond in the same way as cavendish and negro-head; but that was a matter for inquiry, and one which neither the House nor a Committee of the Whole House could decide merely by the assertions of Members on one side and on the other. But the reasons for inquiry did not stop there. The Bill professed, as the great foundation for the admission of foreign manufactured tobacco, to permit the manufacture of tobacco in bond; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not explained how he meant to carry out that part of the scheme. With regard to that part of the question, there were two different classes of towns to be considered, seaports and inland towns. In seaports he supposed that it was intended that the manufacture should take place in the Custom House or in bonded stores equivalent thereto. Was not the House to receive any information as to the existing accommodation for such manufacture? In Belfast there were twenty or thirty very extensive tobacco manufacturers, and it was impossible that they could be supplied with accommodation for their manufacture within the Custom House. Were they, then, to be called upon to provide, in addition to their existing manufactories, others in which, under a separate surveillance and with a separate staff of workmen, they should carry on the manufacture? And how were the inland towns to be dealt with? In Cavan £150,000 was paid annually in tobacco duties; in Lurgan one manufacturer paid £20,000 a year, and in Tullamore another manufacturer paid upwards of £70,000 a year. All these enormous sums were now paid at the nearest seaport without a shilling of expense to the Government, there being no collectors at the towns mentioned. Were the Government prepared to send a staff of officers to superintend bonded warehouses in these towns? If they were, ought not the House to be informed what additional expense would be caused by that arrangement; and if they were not, what would become of these manufacturers? Those were matters as to which either the Government ought to give some information, or there ought to be an inquiry before a Select Committee of that House. The manufacturers only desired that they should be left at liberty to manufacture tobacco without bonded warehouses, but subject to any proper control in the shape of Excise regulations. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would concede that, he would relieve the measure from a great deal of the odium which attached to it. The Bill did not provide for such a system of manufacture, but no one with whom he had conversed upon the subject was able to see why it should not be carried out. With reference to the exportation of tobacco, the House had only a few minutes before had presented to it a most excellent argument in favour of inquiry. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) said, that he had been looking at the statistical Returns of the Board of Trade, and he found that there was hardly any tobacco exported from this country. Did not he know that, according to the present law, and by reason of the arrangements regarding drawback, the exportation of tobacco was almost an impossibility? And was there one word in the Bill with regard to exportation? The hon. Gentleman was under the delusion that by voting for the second reading of the Bill he was going to promote the exportation of tobacco, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told the House that he had either in his mind or on paper some provisions which would facilitate that exportation. But surely the trade ought to see those provisions before the second reading of a Bill which had this for its foundation, that while on the one hand the manufacturers of this country were to be exposed to the competition of foreigners, on the other they were to be enabled to compete with those foreigners in the matter of exportation. That was a matter which might also be very properly inquired into by a Select Committee; and while it appeared to him that the present high rate of duty on foreign manufactured tobacco was extremely inconsistent with the whole progress of our legislation, he at the same time must say, that the question assumed an entirely different aspect when it was admitted that the home manufacturer could not be placed on the same footing with the foreigner, and when the point for decision came to be what should be the measure of the difference in the case of the two. The question at issue was not, in short, one of free trade, and for the reasons which he had adduced he trusted the House would see the expediency of adopting the course which he had indicated.

MR. BUTT said, he should support the second reading of the Bill. As far as he could judge it was agreed on all hands—even by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton)—that the existing prohibitory duty should no longer be maintained, and yet the expediency of altering the law being thus admitted, the Resolution proposed by the hon. Gentleman was one for a Select Committee to inquire whether, in fact, it was expedient to alter the law at all. The House was asked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to affirm a principle which had not been denied by any hon. Member. The details of the measure could, and no doubt would, be fully discussed in Committee of the Whole House. He (Mr. Butt) was not altogether content with the rate of duty proposed; and he believed, if the right hon. Gentleman was found not to give to the home manufacturers the full countervailing duty to which they were entitled, he would fail to carry his proposition. It did not, however, require the cumbrous machinery of a Select Committee to determine what amount of duty was payable on the tobacco that entered into the manufacture of a pound of snuff. Such a Committee could result in nothing further than the production of a ponderous blue-book containing information by no means so definite and so easily accessible as that which might, by a system of examination and cross-examination, be elicited from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he felt bound to support the proposal of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who asked that the case of his constituents, in as far as they would be affected by the Bill, should be made the subject of a special inquiry. Let the House consider the position in which they stood. The whole of that £6,000,000 of revenue were based on a prohibition—a prohibition to grow tobacco in this country; and yet while they maintained that prohibition, they went on talking about protection or the abolition of protection. He believed that the prohibition was necessary for the purposes of the revenue; but it was still a prohibition, and any question of protection that could arise in the consideration of the Bill was comparatively a matter of utter insignificance. He did not like prohibition. Commercially and economically it was as absurd as unrestricted competition. He had risen, however, mainly for the purpose of protesting against the perpetual reiteration of the praises of a system of free imports which were thrust on the House in season and out of season. That was a mere waste of the time of the House. It only reminded him of the crowd which shouted, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The question was, whether the House would consent to alter the tobacco duties without further information than that which they then possessed. They had high commercial authorities deprecating that course, and stating that the interests of certain manufacturers were involved in the matter; and under these circumstances he should certainly support the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I will not say anything of a controversial nature, but there are three points on which I desire to make an explanation. First, the principle on which this Bill is founded is, that in the shape of duty there should be, as against foreign manufactured tobacco, such a rate of charge as will fairly compensate both the direct impost paid by the British manufacturer on the raw material, and the indirect impost, as far as it can be fairly and liberally estimated, which a heavy duty of this sort is likely to entail in the form of trade regulations. Second, any restrictions as to the use of ingredients applied to the manufacture of tobacco at home shall be rigidly enforced in regard to the importation of corresponding descriptions of tobacco from abroad. Provisions for that purpose are in part to be found in the Bill, but there are other provisions to the same effect in the existing law which will remain untouched. Third, I do not admit that the question whether we can or cannot contrive a good system of export ought to govern our decision as to repealing the prohibitory duty. I have all along recognised the obligation and expressed the desire to examine with the utmost care every measure that may be proposed for the purpose of opening new channels of trade to the British manufacturer. I hope to be able, on the whole, to comply with the suggestion which has been made, that after the duty has been paid on tobacco when it enters the country the manufacturers shall be permitted to proceed with the manipulation of it without let or hindrance, and shall then on exporting it receive full compensation for the duty they paid in the first instance. I hope I may assume that the House will read the Bill a second time. In that event I shall fix the Committee for Thursday, in order to introduce into the Bill certain additional provisions. The measure will then be reprinted, and I shall allow an interval of a week or ten days for its consideration by Members.

Mr. Butt

Mr. AYRTON said, that after that statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer he would wait to see the Bill in its altered form, and would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Thursday.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL—[BILL 8.]—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. LYGON said, there were certain clauses in the Bill which involved principles of great importance, and he therefore trusted it would receive a very full and searching examination. In the first place, he objected to the manner in which the Bill proposed to deal with the right of agents to vote. The Act of 1854 had justly done away with the disqualification upon agents being allowed to vote, and he did not see how those who were anxious for the extension of the franchise, and maintained that every person had a right to vote, could insist upon the exclusion of any one class of the community. The experience of the last few years showed that no harm had been done by doing away with the restriction. He also believed that a good deal of confusion existed in the minds of people on the subject of bribery, and that they had not sufficiently distinguished between the commission of bribery as an offence against the law cognizable by the ordinary tribunals, and bribery as it affected the possession of seats in that House, to deal with which belonged exclusively to the House. He believed that the bribery laws would never be in a satisfactory state until the proof of bribery in the ordinary courts was made precedent to the institution of proceedings in that House. It was said that bribery was a serious offence and ought to be severely punished; but experience had proved that it was a mistake to impose on an offence a punishment disproportionate to its magnitude. He believed the best way to deal with the subject was to define clearly in what the offence consisted, to refer it to the ordinary tribunals, and to attach to it a punishment proportionate to the sense of its seriousness which was entertained by the country at large. It also appeared to him that the eighth clause was a departure from the wise, just and merciful principle of law, that no one should be compelled to criminate himself. By that clause the witness before a Committee or a Commission was bound to answer every question, and it was left to the discretion of the Committee or Commission to give a certificate of indemnity. If witnesses were to be compelled to answer questions which might tend to criminate themselves, there ought to be no option, and the certificate ought to be given as a matter of course. With regard to the form of the certificate, he would suggest that it ought not to be that the witness had made a true disclosure of all things upon which he had been examined; because it was impossible for any tribunal to pronounce that certain answers were true, but that the witness had answered fully the questions which had been put to him. He trusted that either the Bill would be very much amended in Committee, or that on a future occasion the whole subject would undergo full revision.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the points which the hon. Member had adverted to would be very proper points for the consideration of the House in Committee.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Disqualification of Agents).

Mr. COLLINS said, he should move the substitution of the word "such" for "other" before the word "capacity." His object was to prevent the disqualification from voting of persons employed incidentally in an election—as, for instance, the publisher of a newspaper in which the advertisements of the candidate appeared.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PULLER said, the object of the clause was to disqualify persons who were employed as agents, canvassers, poll-clerks, and messengers. Such disqualification was by no means unnecessary, as he knew cases in which there were about 150 committee-rooms engaged by the candidates with no other view than that of using them as means of influencing electors to vote for them. He proposed to add to the list persons of whom committee-rooms were hired, and also persons who were paid for furnishing meat, drink, or entertainment on the order of any candidate, or any agent of any candidate, for the purpose of influencing any person to vote for such candidate. He would, therefore, propose in line six, after the word "void," to insert—

"And if any voter shall at any time before, during, or after any election, agree for or accept any payment for or in respect of the hire of any room used as a committee-room or otherwise for promoting the election of any candidate, or for or in respect of any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision furnished by him to any person on the order of any candidate, or any agent of any candidate, for the purpose of influencing any person to vote for such candidate, or to abstain from voting at such election, or on account of any person having voted or promised to vote for such candidate, or refrained or promised to refrain from voting at such election, he shall be incapable of voting for such candidate at such election, and his vote, if given for such candidate, shall be void."

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, the Bill was fast becoming a Bill for the wholesale disfranchisement of electors. The existing law made it an offence to furnish meat, drink, and entertainment for the purpose of influencing any person to vote for a particular candidate. The latter part of the Amendment was therefore unnecessary. He was at a loss to understand why a man was to be disqualified for letting a committee-room to a candidate for a small consideration.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that the Amendment would compel candidates to embark in a sea of uncertainty from which no one could extricate himself. It might, perhaps, be possible to obtain a legal definition of a "committee-room," but what was to be said of a room used as a committee-room, "or otherwise for promoting the election of any candidate"? There was no end of the ways in which a room might be used for promoting the election of a candidate. A letter might be written, an address might be drawn up, a speech might be composed in a room, and each of those acts might be said to be an act for promoting the election of a candidate; but was the owner to be deprived of his vote for allowing his room to be so used? He came to the next part of the Amendment, which was perfectly bewildering. It provided that if A gave drink to B, in order to induce C to vote for D, then A was to be disfranchised. Why was A to be disfranchised for a process which ended such a long way off? He thought that such a complicated machinery could not be made to work, and that under the shelter of such provisions a great deal of real bribery and corruption might be practised with impunity.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was afraid that it would be impossible to give effect to such minute regulations as those proposed by this Amendment. Its words would seem to apply to the keeper of the hotel where any candidate might be staying, and where he might see his friends or talk over the arrangements of the election. The result would probably be, that the candidate would go to an hotel kept by a warm partisan of his opponent and thereby cause him to be disqualified. The other part of the Amendment, relating to treating, would be hardly more practicable.

MR. LYGON said, as he read the Amendment, butchers, bakers, and everybody who furnished anything on the order of a candidate or his agent, would be disfranchised.

MR. PULLER said, he did not contend that in all cases contemplated by the Amendment the publican necessarily did anything corrupt, but that, on the whole, to preserve the purity of elections, it was essential to watch jealously all pecuniary arrangements between candidates and voters. When a candidate went to canvass a publican, in nine cases out of ten the publican said, "I have not made up my mind; I don't think I shall make it up till the last day." They all knew pretty well that this meant, that if the candidate would open his house, he would vote for him; or if he would not open it, he would vote for the man who would. Nobody had suggested any better remedy for this than by making it not the interest of the candidate to employ his money in that manner.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, the unfortunate borough which he represented (Harwich), having no supply of water, had, in consequence, an unusual number of publicans; and if that proposal were agreed to, a very great number of his constituents would be disfranchised. If voters were to be prevented from acting as poll-clerks, messengers, and the like, they would get their friends and relatives employment in these capacities, so that the object of the Amendment would be frustrated.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PAGET said, he would propose the insertion of words making it a misdemeanour for a person who had been hired by a candidate as an agent, attorney, poll clerk, messenger, door-keeper, &c., to record his vote at the election.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Select Committee had certainly recommended that such an act should be made a misdemeanour; but on consideration he had thought it better to declare that the vote should be void. It was, however, for the Committee to decide the point.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought it would be sufficient to impose a penalty of £5 or £10 upon such persons.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY asked, whether the persons prevented from voting would be capable of enforcing their pecuniary claims against the candidates?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that under the clause as it stood at present the person hired would be entitled to claim remuneration, but would be deprived of his vote. If the Amendment were adopted, which made the offence a misdemeanour, of course he would not be entitled to claim remuneration.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he should support the Amendment, which he thought would make the clause more efficient.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CAVE said, that he opposed the clause with some reluctance, because he fully admitted the magnitude of the abuses at which it was levelled; and when they heard of twenty-five solicitors employed on each side in a small borough, and changing sides with their retainers, it could not be doubted that such a state of things ought, if possible, to be put an end to; but the question was, whether this enactment would have the desired effect. He very much doubted it. Why were these solicitors paid? Was it for their own vote, or for those they could command? If, then, you struck off their vote, would you destroy their influence? If a man could bring fifty votes, would he be much less valuable with forty-nine? By the present law the procuring of votes for a fee is bribery, as much as voting for a fee, so that no new enactment is required. He quite admitted that the influence of solicitors over voters might be most oppressive, but the law already provided for this, and at any rate you did not prevent it by depriving the agent of his vote, or obliging him to act gratuitously. Was employing a solicitor or other agent for a fee bribery in itself or was it not? If it was, let them prohibit it, and make it fatal to the seat. If it was not bribery, but merely liable to abuse and extravagance, let them adopt the Irish law under the Acts 35 Geo. III., c. 4, and 1 & 2 Geo. IV., c. 58, and fix the number and the fees (as in case of polling clerks). This was recommended to the Committee as working well in Ireland. If this were objected to, then leave the law as it is, with the votes liable to be struck off on scrutiny; and let the Election Committee determine on petition whether the number employed is too great or fees too abundant; (this was done in the Oxford case when Mr. Neate was unseated); and especially let them inquire whether the agents have been in the habit of changing sides. His own experience was that agents were chosen in the same way as bishops and judges, not to buy their support, but on account of their declared opinions. He had never seen respectable solicitors accepting retainers from the opposite side, and it seemed hard to cast upon them the slur of disfranchisement and stigma of bribery and corruption. The result would probably be to throw the candidates into worse hands. Since he had given notice of this Motion a proposal had been made to him to amend the clause by striking out "agent attorney," and he admitted there was a broad distinction because it would be difficult to employ an attorney who was not a voter, and therefore a stranger might be brought down, and the House knew that the grossest cases of bribery had been by stranger agents. Still, he thought it unconstitutional to deprive the humbler voters of their franchise for no fault of their own. Unscrupulous people would easily evade the law by the payment of relations, as widows were put into post-offices to gain their sons' vote. An attempt was made to prevent this by 5 & 6 Vict., c. 102, but the law could not be carried out. Again, the fee to solicitors for looking after the registration might be increased on the tacit understanding that they acted as election agents gratuitously. And by this clause a candidate might disfranchise his enemy's voters by employing them as messengers. If they aspired to protect the candidate, let them not saddle him with the charges which ought to be borne by the public. In other respects no one could protect the candidate but the candidate himself. There was no doubt he ought to pay nothing, and in former days when there was, as we read, as much disinclination to serve as Member for a county as there is now to be sheriff of a county, this was so. Things were much changed now, and where there were a few bridges and crowds pressing over them the tolls would be high, and when they heard of £600 a year paid by a distinguished statesman for a borough in the West of England, they could hardly wonder at the opinion prevalent among the poorer electors that Parliament was a lucrative appointment, to some of the crumbs of which they were entitled. Legislation on these points had been constant, spasmodic, and not successful; and when legislators themselves conspired to make legislation abortive, the case was exceedingly hopeless. It was for these reasons, that while fully admitting the evils which this clause was intended to meet, yet because he was afraid that it would not meet them, but would impose disabilities on honest men which the unscrupulous would evade, and because the same rule on this point could not hold good in constituencies widely differing in extent, and because he considered that an inoperative enactment was worse than none at all, that he ventured to move the omission of this clause, which was only a revival of the clause in the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 37, which, on account of its unsatisfactory working, had been repealed by subsequent Acts.

MR. J. J. POWELL (Gloucester) seconded the Amendment.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, it was coming to this, that hon. Members must go down to their constituencies and be returned free of cost, solicitors, agents, and messengers, giving their votes and their services into the bargain; but they were really pushing the matter too far. He employed a respectable solicitor, and his Colleague, who sat on the Treasury Bench, did the same; and if he were in a solicitor's place, he would not like to manage an election and be either unpaid or disfranchised. The clause would lead to the employment of a clerk instead of his principal, and of a voter's son instead of the voter, so that the legislation proposed was mere subterfuge and sham.

LORD HENLEY said, he wished to diminish the employment of poor voters at election times, but at the same time he thought the clause severe, in depriving solicitors of their votes for managing an election. The management of elections was as much the part of attorneys as the drawing up of a conveyance. He would omit the words "agents and attorneys" from the clause, and retain the rest of it.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY believed that political principle extended from agents down to the lowest person employed, and therefore he would support the omission of the clause. He trusted they would deal with the question as men of common sense, and not be led away by the desire to obtain a reputation for purity. Persons were employed at elections for their political principles, and it was for a Committee to decide whether there was corruption or not. Why deprive them of their votes because they were doing something to earn a livelihood in the vocation to which they were called? Was it to be expected that attorneys and agents would give up their regular businesses, and employ their clerks and others without receiving remuneration? It was sheer absurdity to expect it. However strong their political principles, they must naturally, if they gave up the regular work of their office, receive remuneration. The principle applied to all persons employed: if they did work, they had a right to be paid for it; and unless they were paid in such a manner as showed that they were paid with a corrupt purpose, their votes ought not to be struck out.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Cambridge) observed, that the provisions of the clause had been enacted by Lord Althorp; but having been found inoperative, were afterwards repealed. They would inflict injustice on parties, and tend to degrade the character of the electors. They would introduce the elements of uncertainty in every case, and make a petition almost inevitable. One curious difficulty would arise from the clause. A petition must be presented within a certain number of days, while a longer period was allowed to elapse before the payment of election accounts, and thus petitions would be presented upon the chance of some ground for them being found in the accounts to be subsequently published.

MR. VANCE said, he thought that the Government had brought forward the measure rather out of deference to the decision of the Select Committee than from any particular opinion of their own. His own experience of elections was, that high political principle was not confined to persons of high station, but was much oftener exhibited by those in a lower station of life. The clause was intended to disfranchise any one who accepted money from the candidate. The clause would be evaded, and by passing the clause they would add hypocrisy and evasion to the other crimes attendant upon elections. He considered that the law, as it at present stood, was amply sufficient to punish over-employment.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, if that clause were struck out, the others would be of no use. If lawyers and political agents were expunged from the clause, it would be a great injustice on others. Lawyers were the great source of expense at elections. He once had the misfortune to canvass the city of Worcester. He employed fourteen solicitors—to whom he paid upwards of £500, and he lost the election. He now had the honour to represent a borough where he employed no lawyer and no paid agent, but trusted simply to the good common sense of the electors.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped that whatever course the Committee adopted with respect to the clause, it would deal out even-handed justice. It would be most unfair to disfranchise the humbler men who were employed at elections, and leave the attorneys and the higher class of agents in possession of their votes.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. F. S. Powell), had referred to the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 37, in which a similar clause existed, and which Act had been repealed. It was true that the House declined to renew the Act until the whole subject had been inquired into by a Select Committee. A Committee did sit during two Sessions, and they reported that the repeal of the Act 7 & 8 Geo. IV. had been prejudicial to purity of election, and it was proved that since the repeal it had become the practice to employ large numbers of voters, not only as professional agents, but as doorkeepers and messengers, who, under the guise of payment for their services, actually received payment for their votes. All that the Legislature could hope to do in reference to the matter was to make bribery and corruption as difficult and their detection as easy as possible, and it was no valid objection to any provision suggested with that view that it was open to evasion. The Committee on which both he and his hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. G. Hardy) had sat, agreed in recommending the clause. He had not himself been present when that decision was come to, but his hon. Friend was there.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that though he attended the meeting of the Committee on the day in question, he was not present when the vote to which the right hon. Gentleman referred passed.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that at all events those of the Committee who were present were unanimous in favour of the clause; and that being so, he felt that he was bound to propose the clause in deference to their opinion. The evil which it was intended to meet was clearly proved before the Committee, and since the Bill was printed he had received letters from persons in different parts of the country, who said they attached great value to this clause, because the practice extensively prevailed of giving colourable employment at elections to persons who were really paid for their votes.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

TELLERS.
Mr. Cave
Mr. J. J. Powell

Clause 3 (Authorized Agents for Payment of Expenses).

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would move the insertion of the words "or cause to be made" after "make" in line 8, and after "payment" the words "advance, loan, or deposit." The object of the alteration was to meet any possible case, colourable or otherwise.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would then move the insertion in line 10, after the word "election," of the words "before, during, or after such election."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as was also Clause 4.

Clause 5 (Publication of Statement of Election Expenses).

MR. HUNT said, he objected to the length of time allowed for publishing election accounts. The period specified in the Bill was three months; and sometimes when Committees were inquiring into election proceedings, and a desire was expressed that the accounts should be produced, they were met by the statement that the time had not expired. To prevent such a state of things in the future, he proposed that the time be limited to two months.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL was understood to assent to the proposed Amendment.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he would venture to suggest that for all practical purposes the legislation which was going forward might as well be carried on out of the House. The conversational tones of the Home Secretary and the hon. and learned Member for Durham (The Attorney General) prevented Members below the gangway from hearing a single word.

MR. F. S. POWELL observed, that the returning officer was to publish the statement "as soon as conveniently may be." A very wide scope for discretion was thereby given, and he suggested that some definite time should be named.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the fixing of any definite time—say one or two months—would be accepted as the period within which publication was to be made, and would retard, instead of accelerating, the publication of the statement.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he would move that "fourteen days" be inserted.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 (Section 14 of Corrupt Practices Prevention Act extended to Misdemeanors, &c).

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the object of the enactment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was intended to get rid of a difficulty which had been found by the Court of Queen's Bench in construing a clause in the Corrupt Practices Act.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he desired to ask whether it was intended to apply a limitation of one year to prosecutions under that Act, and to place no limitation at all to prosecutions for offences at common law that might be committed at the same election.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it would be inconvenient to introduce into a Bill of that kind a limitation of the period during which prosecutions might be brought for common law offences, such as bribery. The Bill was not intended to interfere with the common law.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought it undesirable to leave a vindictive person the power either of prosecuting within a year under this Act, or beginning a prosecution at common law three or four or five years afterwards.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (General Allegations sufficient in Indictments) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Evidence of Witness on Election Committee and before Commissions).

MR. LYGON said, he proposed to move the omission of the first part of the clause, which enacted that no person called as a witness before an Election Committee should be excused from answering any question on the ground that the answer might criminate himself.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 38, to leave out from the words "No person," to the word "himself," in line 40.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that witnesses frequently refused to answer questions before Election Committees, and the Committees in consequence were unable to get to the bottom of the questions referred to them. It was then necessary to address the Crown for the appointment of a Royal Commission, by which considerable expense was incurred. If the power in question could safely be given to three gentlemen sitting as Commissioners, it could surely be safely exercised by a Committee of that House.

MR. LYGON said, he objected to the employment of the power either by a Committee or a Royal Commission. The principle sought to be established was a very dangerous one, and he should prefer to see it restricted rather than extended. He should certainly take the sense of the Committee upon the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was bound to admit that it was a departure from the ordinary rules of English law that persons should be bound, whether they would or not, to answer questions which might criminate themselves. But the proviso at the end of the clause laid down that no statement made by any person should, except in cases of indictment for perjury, be admissible against him. The clause was therefore disarmed of its sting. The Committee was aware of the almost insuperable difficulty there was in detecting corruption in the cases to which the Bill meant to apply, and it was therefore necessary to have recourse to such a provision as that which was now the subject of discussion.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had in Committee opposed the Resolution upon which the clause was formed, and he had still greater objections to the clause itself, because it was wider in its scope. The Resolution of the Committee was to the effect that no one should be allowed to refuse to answer a question which might tend to criminate him on the subject of bribery; but as the clause stood no one could refuse to answer any question on the ground that it would tend to criminate him. He contended that was too large a power to put into the hands of either a Committee or Commission. The Committee could not be called to account for giving or refusing a certificate, no matter how truly a witness might have answered. Prosecutions had been instituted in the Gloucester and Wakefield cases, and convictions had been obtained; but the feeling of the House and the country was against the proceedings, because it was felt that the persons had been trapped into an admission of guilt. It was true that the admissions were not actually employed as evidence against the gentlemen in the Wakefield case, but they were used in procuring testimony against them. The power which the clause would give he would not intrust to the Judges of the land, still less would he intrust it to a Committee or Commission. The provision was, in his opinion, more corrupt than corruption itself.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the power which the clause would give too large, because according to it a witness might be cross-examined on any point whatever. It would be necessary, therefore, to restrict the provision to cases of bribery. Then it was not compulsory on the Committee to give a certificate, it was only said it should be lawful for them to do so. Therefore, while the witness was compelled to make a disclosure, there was no guarantee that he should be protected. The effect of the clause would probably be that election agents would commit every possible offence; and if they could not keep everything hidden, they had only to make a full disclosure, and they would get an indemnity. The clause was so loosely drawn that the Committee could not pronounce an opinion upon it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that a good deal of misconception pervaded the minds of hon. Members from their confusing two subjects—the extension of the power proposed in the clause to Committees, and the retention of it in Committees who already possessed it. He was bound to say, that if they took away the power of sending down Commissioners to certain places where extensive bribery and corruption had existed, armed with authority to compel evidence to be taken subject to whatever indemnity they chose to give, they were screening bribery in the most effectual way they could. Their object ought to be, not only to make bribery as difficult as possible, but to afford all due facility for its detection. He did not believe that in recent cases the bribery would have been detected unless the Committees had been armed with the power of compelling evidence.

MR. HUNT said, that the words in the clause were so large in their application that the sitting Member whose election might be under investigation by a Committee would be bound to answer any question put; and if the answer led to the loss of his seat, the proviso at the end of the clause would afford him no protection.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he thought it ought not to be left to the discretion either of a Commission or Committee to give an indemnity. The grant of the indemnity should be obligatory; and if the person receiving it had not spoken the truth, he should be liable to an indictment for perjury.

MR. BOVILL said, he did not regard bribery as a greater offence than larceny or murder, and the principle of the clause ought, in consistency, equally to apply to the latter crimes. If the Committee affirmed by legislation that persons answering all questions with respect to bribery should be protected, where could they stop? It was difficult to say, from the wording of the clause, whether those who would be compelled to answer would be certain of obtaining a certificate. Of all tribunals the least fit to be trusted with a discretion on such a point would be Commissions and Committees.

MR. J. J. POWELL remarked that the clause merely effected the extension of a provision which had been in operation in this country for some time, and had produced most beneficial effects. His hon. and learned Friend appeared to forget the distinction between the cases of trial for larceny, murder, or other criminal offences, and the proceedings before these Commissioners, because while in the former case a particular individual was charged with a specific crime, in the latter there was no allegation of specific offences against individuals, but the Commissions were distinctly and essentially Commissions of Inquiry. All that was required from the persons summoned before the Commissioners was that they should honestly tell the truth. He thought these Commissions of Inquiry had done great good. In the case of Gloucester, he could testify to the good wrought to the borough by the Commission lately held there; but unless persons were compelled to answer questions, it would be of no use to send these Commissions into the country.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought that the granting of certificates ought to be imperative upon the Committee in cases in which witnesses had made a full and fair disclosure.

SIR GEORGE GREY pointed out that the part of the clause now under discussion did not raise the question to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that the whole of the clause ought to be struck out.

MR. LYGON said, that he should persevere with his Amendment.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Question put, "That the words 'No person who is called as a witness' stand part of the Clause."

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 9.]

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Two Clauses added.

Clause 23 (Appointment of Registrars).

LORD NAAS said, he desired that the Bill should be assimilated to the Act in force for England and Scotland with regard to the appointment of the officers under the Bill—namely, to vest the appointments in the boards of guardians. He would, therefore, move the insertion of words in Clause 23 to meet that object.

Amendment proposed.

In page 7, to leave out from the words "The medical," to the word "district," in line 35, both inclusive, in order to insert the words "The guardians of any union shall appoint a person with such qualifications as the Registrar General may, by any general rule declare to be necessary, to be Registrar of Births and Deaths in each district, and in any case of vacancy in the office of Registrar, shall forthwith fill up the vacancy,"—instead thereof.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the question had already been considered by the House, the general opinion of which was in favour of the employment of medical officers.

MR. M'MAHON said, there was no provision in the Bill that there should be a certificate prior to every burial, as in England. He approved the Amendment.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought the Government were quite right in their proposal, and that the English system never could be adopted in Ireland.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he could not conceive a more clumsy or ill-drawn measure. Every clause had been forced on in the absence of many Irish Members, and on every clause the majority of Irish Members present had been against the Government. He did not see why the Irish people should not choose whom they pleased for registrars, and he should support the Amendment.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, he took a different view of the immediate question before the House. He had reason to believe that the appointment of the medical officers as registrars in Ireland would prove most popular in Ireland.

MR. DAWSON said, he hoped that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary would not yield to the objections to the Bill.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 40: Majority 38.

Schedule amended.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

[BILL 22.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to call attention to what he considered to be two serious defects in the Bill. The one was the omission of a provision respecting the property of minors; the other was the want of a more convenient arrangement respecting the signature of trustees in the case of the paying out deposits.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he merely proposed that they should go into Committee pro forma, and he did not intend to proceed with the consideration of the clauses until he had seen the deputations which he believed intended to wait upon him on the subject.

MR. HUBBARD said, that the Two-and-a-half per Cent stock, one of the species of stock which it was proposed to invest the funds in, stood at a less value by three-quarters per cent than the Three per Cent Reduced, or Three per Cent Consols. The Terminable Annuities also was not a favourite stock. He thought that the Bill ought to be confined to its three first clauses, and that the other two were not consistent with the declared object of the measure. If the Government chose to diminish the public debt, it should be done in a fair and open manner and with the intention of discharging the debt. He had a very strong objection to misleading the country by falsely discharging the debt under the name of an annuity.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS AND THE DWELLINGS OF THE POOR.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY presented a Petition from certain persons, parishioners of St. Luke's, Chelsea, against the London Railway (Victoria Section) Bill. The petitioners stated that this project of railway extension would materially interfere with St. Simon's

Church and its parsonage, which had been erected at the expense of two benevolent gentlemen; and it also proposed to lay violent hands upon Sloane Square, which was the only open space in the neighbourhood, and to construct in it a large station. He fully sympathized with the petitioners, and would urge upon their Lordships' to take such measures as they thought best to prevent these new metropolitan projects from interfering with the few open spaces left for the health and recreation of the inhabitants. If this scheme were sanctioned, there would in a few years be in this neighbourhood a population as dense as that in Clare Market, without a single breathing space. More than this, it would lead to the destruction of not less than 1,000 houses occupied by the labouring classes, for whose accommodation the railway company proposed to make no provision, "because no inconvenience is apprehended." No notice had been given to these persons that their houses would be required, and probably they would know nothing certain about the matter until ten days before their dwellings were pulled down. It was, he thought, incumbent upon Parliament to see that the pressure put upon the masses of the population, owing to the powers granted to railway companies in the metropolis, should be obviated as far as possible, and that they should be compelled to give to the occupiers of small tenements the same notice which was now given to proprietors. In conclusion, he should move that the petition be referred to the Committee sitting upon the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

REGENT CIRCUS RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that in pursuance of his notice he rose to move that the second reading be deferred for six months. The scheme proposed by the Bill was precisely one of those which ought to be referred for investigation to a Royal Commission. He had no desire to obstruct any measure that would have the effect of relieving the traffic of the metropolitan streets; but he considered that the Bill would have a diametrically opposite effect, that it would destroy the appearance of the streets over which the railway was proposed to be carried, and that it would seriously damage a vast amount of property in the metropolis. It proposed to create a nuisance worse than Holborn Hill, by stopping up seven streets, and raising Euston Road eleven feet, with a gradient of one in thirty. Euston Road was one of the great main arteries of the metropolis, and that and similar wholesale interference with property and public convenience had roused the important parishes of St. Pancras and St. James to petition against the Bill. Mr. Bazalgette, the engineer to the Board of Works, reported that it would materially affect the sewage of the districts through which it passed. On that subject the provisions of the Bill were altogether silent, and there was apparently an intention to cross numberless existing streets upon the level. Though the railway was to start from the terminus of the Great Northern Railway, it did not appear that that company were in any way promoters of the line. It had no western terminus at all, but proposed to stop short in the immediate neighbourhood of the Regent Circus, in the middle of the small streets surrounding Coventry Street and Windmill Street, from which it was difficult to imagine how the traffic would ever escape. In conclusion the hon. Member moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

LORD FERMOY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. ROBERTSON said, that although he had but recently had the honour of being elected a Member of that House, he had long been a practitioner before its tribunals, and he had never known a case in which justice was suddenly and impatiently refused as was proposed by this Amendment. The railway invasion of the metropolis was a bughbear which had been conjured up to frighten the House. Of the twenty-eight schemes originally contemplated only nineteen referred to the northern side of the Thames, and of these six had perished by their own weight. Four more had no new works in view, but related merely to internal arrangements by the railways themselves. Of the remaining nine, three were merely junction lines, of perhaps a few chains in length, and mostly outside the metropolis, and one (the Ludgate station) was not a new work, having been already sanctioned by Parliament in connection with the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. Deducting these four from the residue of nine, there remained five Bills, of which four had been already read a second time either in that House or in the House of Lords. So that the Regent Circus Railway Bill now under consideration was the only one of the twenty-eight left, and a simpler case a Committee would never have been called upon to deal with. There was really nothing in its circumstances to call for exceptional legislation. By arrangements entered into with the Great Northern Railway, it would only be necessary to raise the Euston Road to the extent of one in sixty, and one side would be allowed to remain at its present level. It was a mistake to suppose that there would be any crossings on the level in the vicinity of Coventry Street; and power was expressly taken to widen Tichbourne Street, and to open out a new street leading into Regent's Circus. The line had been carefully laid out by Mr. Hawkshaw, with a view of avoiding any open spaces, and of letting light and air into the most crowded districts. The public advantages which had resulted from the construction of the Metropolitan Railway, and the public policy which dictated the Charing Cross Extension, showed clearly that the Regent Circus line ought to be made; and as for the alleged interference with property, the House knew that private interests were, if anything, too well protected. A tradesman, to his knowledge, had openly expressed regret and apprehension lest his premises should not be "injured" by a railway which proposed to purchase the house two doors lower down.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Member, although a new Member, was a skilful and able advocate and a sanguine man; but, in spite of his assurances that there was no cause for alarm and of the ingenious manner in which he had handled his statistics, he had not succeeded in dissipating the general uneasiness with regard to metropolitan railway schemes. If, as the hon. Gentleman said, so many Railway Bills had slipped through a second reading he could only say, more shame for the House of Commons; and if there were so many more undergoing consideration in another place, he hoped the House of Lords would do their duty better. As for those lines which he had called "junctions," he asked the House to take warning from the statement of the hon. Gentleman, and to beware how they sanctioned new lines entering the metropolis, which in the following Session they might be told contemplated little harmless "junctions," of which the principle had been already sanctioned. Then, as for the lines which had disappeared, he dreaded them quite as much as any which were then in full activity, for they would be sure to appear again; and if encouragement were given to such a project as that before them, the Thames would be crossed and London would be dotted over with railways in such a manner as would defy the ingenuity of the most skilful Railway Committee that was ever appointed. He knew nothing about that particular scheme, but in his opinion the House ought to act on the general and wise rule of rejecting every one of these metropolitan lines, in the hope that, even at the last moment, the Government would be roused to a sense of the importance of that great national question, and appoint a Commission to examine into the whole subject of intramural railway communication. If they failed to take it in hand, the next best thing would be for the Metropolitan Board of Works—who, thanks to the hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chairman of Committees), were empowered to act to a certain extent in these cases, and who were acquiring more and more the confidence of the public—to devote their attention seriously to the subject. But whichever course was adopted, he earnestly advised the House to adopt the recommendation of the Duke of Newcastle's Commission, and to agree upon some general scheme of metropolitan intercommunication which would satisfy the public convenience, without handing over the metropolis to the devices and conflicting designs of railway companies. He believed that in the long run the shareholders of these lines would have cause to congratulate themselves if the whole question of metropolitan railways were at the present moment postponed in order to the careful consideration of some general scheme.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that the borough he represented (Finsbury) was intersected by this railway from one end to the other. He had, however, told his constituents that he could not support the rejection of the second reading, but that he was ready to vote for referring that as well as all other metropolitan railway schemes to some tribunal competent to deal with the whole question.

MR. JACKSON said, that eight years before he was the Chairman of a Committee that sat on the subject of the overcrowding of the streets of the metropolis, and the conclusion that Committee came to was, that nothing but a system of railways would clear the streets and improve the means of communication. He therefore advocated the second reading of that Bill on principle; and if the Metropolitan Board of Works had any opposition to offer to the measure, they ought to appear before the Committee on the Bill in the usual way.

MR. DOULTON said, that after the modification by the House of their Standing Order, the Metropolitan Board of Works, being thereby enabled to oppose the Bill, immediately met and determined to offer to it all the opposition in their power. The scheme materially interfered with the drainage of the district through which it was intended to pass, and would cut through four of the principal sewers of the metropolis. He therefore trusted the House would save the Metropolitan Board of Works the expense of appearing before the Committee, by rejecting the Bill at that stage.

MR. LOCKE said, he could not see why London should be sacrificed to the convenience of travellers from the North. The House of Commons should do as they had done in Dublin, where nineteen different schemes for railways had been proposed. The Corporation of Dublin condemned those schemes, and said they would not have the city of Dublin cut into pieces in the way proposed. The proposed railway was to be part on the surface and part subterranean at the Euston road, which road the carriages must pass over. [MR. ROBERTSON: No; it is eighteen feet below the level.] It would pass above ground in Finsbury and below ground in Marylebone, which was peculiar, because Finsbury was higher than Marylebone. He opposed the Bill because the railway schemes had caused the greatest possible nuisance on the south side of the river. If they wished to have the same thing done on the northern side of the water, they would pass this Bill. It was said that the line was to be connected with the London, Chatham, and Dover line. The latter company was going to cross Ludgate Hill with one of those frightful viaducts now seen in all parts of the metropolis. But the hon. Member (Mr. Robertson) had stated a fact which was extremely important. Among the numerous Bills which he had mentioned, he had called the attention of the House to one, the Ludgate Station and Junction Railway, which was connected with the London Chatham and Dover Line. Now, the House would have an opportunity, before they gave their sanction to that Bill, to stipulate that the intended mode of crossing Ludgate Hill by one of those frightful viaducts should be given up, and it would be the duty of the Committee to which the Ludgate Station Bill was referred to attend to this question.

MR. RICHARD HODGSON said, he should support the Motion for the second reading, on the ground that he had not heard one word against the principle of the measure, that four other Bills of a similar nature had been passed by the House, and that Bill ought not to be treated in a different manner.

MR. TITE said, the Metropolitan Board had examined the proposed scheme, and looked upon it as one of the wildest that could be brought forward. They opposed it from the beginning, because the projected line would cut through four or five sewers, the whole area of which would have to be reconstructed. It would also cut through the great Holborn sewer. Another objection to it was, that it could not pass the Euston road without raising that road, seeing that the Great Northern Railway was on a level with the road, and it was impossible to penetrate below the level of the road because the Metropolitan Railway passed at that point. He therefore could not see how it was possible to commence the line. The scheme alluded to by his hon. Friend (Mr. Jackson) as having been recommended by a Committee eight years ago, was for a line running round London.

LORD FERMOY said, there was a general feeling that the metropolitan railways should be taken up by Government, or by anybody that could deal with them on a uniform principle. If there was the slightest intention on the part of the Government to carry the idea out, the House ought to reject the Bill before them on the second reading. By so doing they would not only be saving the inhabitants of a large district from a severe infliction, but would also save a great deal of money to the promoters of the Bill. It was quite clear that the proposed railway could not be worked on a uniform plan with the railways of the metropolis, because it was not constructed with any regard to the levels of other railways.

MR. MASSEY observed, that though it was usual to send private Bills to Select Committees, in order that their merits might there be decided on, there were, nevertheless, two sides to that question; for if it should appear that a scheme on its very face was objectionable in principle and faulty in detail, it would be unjust to pass the second reading, and thereby compel persons who were adverse to it to go to the expense of opposing the measure in Committee. The scheme was one of no ordinary character; it was not a question between competitive projectors, or one of compensation to landowners, but it was an attempt at constructing a railway to penetrate the very heart of the metropolis. It was a matter for great regret that, in the infancy of the railway system, some general comprehensive scheme had not been adopted by which an enormous destruction of property might have been saved and a vast outlay of money spared. He was inclined to think that such a scheme would now be found impracticable, but it might be possible within the limited area of the metropolis to devise such a scheme of railway accommodation as should satisfy the reasonable wants of the public and avoid all unnecessary interference with private property and vested interests. They had been told as a recommendation that the Bill was one of many schemes, the others having perished; and he must say that it was the most daring of those schemes, and seemingly promoted by no persons of responsibility. The line was described as one in connection with the Great Northern Railway. It was not, however, promoted by the directors of that railway, but by gentlemen of whom he (Mr. Massey) never had the advantage of hearing before. Those gentlemen came forward with a scheme traversing great streets and interfering with a vast amount of property, and not only greatly obstructing the public convenience, but creating unsightly excrescences to the great disfigurement of the metropolis. For these reasons, though he was extremely reluctant to refuse any one applying to that House an opportunity of being heard, still it appeared to him that it would be fruitless to send the Bill before a Committee; and as there was an almost perfect unanimity against it in the minds of gentlemen qualified to judge, he thought it was one of those exceptional cases in which the House should exercise its discretion, and decline to allow the Bill to be read a second time.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he conceived that a strong case had been made out against the Bill, and the fact of the Metropolitan Board of Works being so strongly opposed to the Bill constituted a reason for not allowing it to go to a Select Committee. He had also received representations from many of his constituents adverse to the proposed measure; and though he was averse to refuse the promoters of Railway Bills a hearing, he thought the Bill ought not to be permitted to go any further.

MR. MALINS observed that the line was not to be a subterranean line, but was to be executed in open cuttings; and he did not believe that the House would sanction a scheme by which Oxford Street was to be cut into trenches. He thought that Parliament should take some decided steps in order to manifest its determination that the metropolis should not be disfigured by these railway schemes.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, his constituents, as far as he had ascertained their opinions, were strongly opposed to the Bill.

IRISH BOARD OF FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the fact of one of the defendants, in a fishery prosecution instituted by the Irish Board of Fisheries, having sworn at a trial which took place during the present month at Arthurstown, county Wexford, that Mr. James Redmond Barry, one of the Commissioners, had written to him to the effect "that he was not a party to the prosecution against him for alleged illegal practices, and that the said prosecution was an unfair proceeding;" and to inquire whether the Secretary to the Treasury has taken any and what measures in consequence of the above proceeding on the part of Mr. Redmond Barry?

MR. PEEL, in reply, said, that Mr. James Redmond Barry, one of the Irish Fishery Commissioners, had written a letter to one of the defendants in a fishery prosecution by that Board, and tried at Arthurstown, to the effect that he was not a party to such prosecution, and that he thought it was an unfair proceeding. But that letter he (Mr. Peel) understood was intended to be a private communication. There was no doubt that under the circumstances Mr. Barry had committed a breach of duty, and the Board had passed a Minute recording their opinion that the letter ought not to have been written.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, considering the numerous schemes that are proposed for intersecting the Metropolis and its Suburbs with various lines of Railway, he will take into consideration the propriety of recommending the appointment of a Special Committee or Commission to investigate and report upon the same?

MR. MILNER GIBSON: In reply to the question of my noble Friend, I have to state that it has not seemed expedient to the Government to appoint a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiring the schemes now before Parliament for the extension of railway communication in the Metropolis. Some years since, indeed, a Commission was appointed to inquire into this subject, and they made a very elaborate Report, and it was the custom for many years of the Board of Trade to call the attention of the Committees on Railway Bills affecting the metropolis to that Report. But in certain important particulars Parliament has overruled the advice of that Royal Commission. There was one area in the metropolis which the Commission recommended should never be permitted to be invaded by any railway company. That sacred area, however, has been so invaded. Railway bridges which are at present in the course of construction over the Thames are at variance with the recommendations of the Commissioners: their Report has upon some points, nevertheless, been attended to. I am not quite sure what my noble Friend means by a "Special Committee" for inquiring into this subject. But if he means a Select Committee of the House of Commons, it would, of course, be for the House itself to consider whether such a Committee should be appointed. It is not, however, the intention of the Government to appoint anything in the shape of a Commission to inquire into this matter. But knowing the great importance of the subject, and the strong interest which is felt in the numerous metropolitan railway projects which have now to be considered by Parliament, I gave instructions to an officer of the Board of Trade to institute an inquiry into the general character of these schemes, and I have requested him to make a report upon a certain number of points of great public importance, which I thought he could deal with within a limited time; and when that report shall be made, I will lay it before the House. The House can then, if they should please, refer the report to the Committees on the groups of metropolitan railway schemes under their consideration. The report will contain such information upon the subject as it is in our power to bring before the House. Beyond presenting the report, the Department of Her Majesty's Government with which I am connected do not think it necessary to go. We have felt it to be our duty to furnish the Committee with all the information in our power. That must be my reply to the question which has been put by my noble Friend, and I hope the information the report will contain will be satisfactory.

DEVONPORT DOCKYARDS MEN.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the First Naval Lord did not receive a Deputation from the Dockyards men during his canvass at Devonport, for the purpose of hearing their complaints against the Regulation issued in October, 1861, which prohibits promotion in the Dockyards after the age of forty-five; whether he did not promise them a full inquiry into the operation of this Regulation immediately after the Election, with a view of its being rescinded if its effect was injurious to the Dockyards men; whether this promise was not in part fulfilled by orders being sent from the Admiralty to the principal officers of the Yards for a report of the working of the said Regulation; whether they had not replied, condemning the restriction as to age for promotion; and whether the Secretary to the Admiralty will place upon the table of the House the Instructions sent, and the reports of the officers thereon?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, Sir Frederick Grey, when he was canvassing at Devonport, very properly refused to receive any deputation, or promise to redress any grievances. After the election was concluded, however, Sir Frederick Grey received a deputation, consisting of certain dockyards men, who complained of the restriction of the age of persons who desired promotion. Sir Frederick Grey brought the question before the Admiralty, who caused a report to be sent from the dockyards, and in no case did the dockyard authorities express a desire to rescind the objectionable regulation. With regard to the publication of the reports, I may state that they are regarded as confidential reports, and I must therefore decline to lay them before the House.

GRIEVANCES OF JOURNEMEN BAKERS.—QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of the Government has been given to the Report furnished by Mr. Tremeneere at the close of last Session, upon the grievances of Journeymen Bakers; and, if so, whether any course will be adopted to carry out the recommendations therein contained?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the Report to which his hon. Friend had referred had been carefully considered, and a Bill upon the subject had been prepared, which would be shortly introduced.

CONVICT PRISONS.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why Sir Joshua Jebb's Report on Convict Prisons, printed in 1862, had not been distributed to Members; and, in Return No. 33 of this Session on Ticket-of-leave men re-convicted in England and Ireland, whether the English Return includes, as the Irish one does, the cases of prisoners whose original sentence has expired previous to subsequent conviction?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that it was true the Report was printed last year, and hon. Members who required it might obtain it in the ordinary way.

SEIZURE OF GROWING CROPS IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he intends to introduce any Bill during the present Session to prevent the Seizure and Sale of growing Crops in Ireland?

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply, stated that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject to which the hon. Baronet had referred.

FOREST RIGHTS AND INCLOSURES.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. TORRENS said, he rose to call attention to the Reports of the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, reporting the sale of rights of the Crown in Waltham, Epping, and other forests in Essex, and to the fact that in consequence of those sales numerous inclosures had been made in the forests by the purchasers of Crown rights. Towards the end of the last Session, he had given notice of his intention to call attention to the subject, which he renewed at the beginning of the present Session. While his Motion referred chiefly to the past, that of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke) referred altogether to the future. The Report of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests of last year showed that a number of inclosures had been effected by private individuals. He did not question the power of the Crown to dispose of its rights. What he complained of was, that the purchasers should possess themselves of the land over which the rights had been exercised by the Crown, and should deprive others of rights of pasturage which were at least as unquestionable as those sold by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The most grievous evil of all was the taking away of the right which the citizens of London had enjoyed from time immemorial to resort to the Royal forests in the vicinity of the metropolis for purposes of recreation. He agreed with what had been so emphatically stated in that House and elsewhere, that such inclosures were illegal. An Act passed in 1843, provided that no land within fifteen miles of London should be inclosed without the sanction of Parliament; and the same prohibition was extended by a subsequent Act to all common lands throughout the country. It might be said that these Acts did not apply to Royal forests; but he submitted, that when the rights of the Crown were sold, the land over which they had been exercised ceased to be Royal domain, and remained to be dealt with in the same way as other commons. When the forest of Hainault was disafforested by Parliament in 1851, due care was taken to preserve the rights of the public; but of one allotment of 600 acres, fifty acres were set apart for the public. In the case of another forest in Oxfordshire, disafforested in 1853, and of a third in Oxfordshire and Northamptonshire, clauses were introduced into the Acts providing that any person injuriously affected by the passing of the law should receive compensation. The same remark was applicable to other cases. In 1850 a Royal Commission was appointed, under an Act of Parliament, to inquire into the condition of the Royal Forests; and the Commissioners stated in their Report that the inclosures of which he complained were clearly illegal. Moreover, in the notorious case of Hampstead Heath, Parliament had over and over again refused to permit the lord of the manor to inclose. But the vast majority of purchasers of the rights of the Crown, mentioned in the Reports, were not lords of the manor, and they had still less right to interfere with the public interests. He might be told that the aggrieved parties could have recourse to the courts of justice. It appeared, from the Report of the Royal Commission, that the only court to which appeal could be made was the Court of Exchequer. Would it not be a mockery to tell an artisan of London or a poor forester deprived of his rights, that he might go to that expensive tribunal to obtain justice; formerly there was a special court for the trial of forest cases, called the Verderer's Court; but it had fallen into abeyance for years, and there was now, practically, no cheap and easy mode of obtaining justice in such cases. The freeholders of the county of Essex ought to elect four verderers; but the vacancies caused by deaths had not been filled up, and now there was only one verderer, the high sheriff of the county. Again, he could not find that any publicity was ever given to the sale of Crown rights. An intending purchaser made a personal or written application to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the bargain was soon struck. The fact of the sale was not made known until the purchaser proceeded to inclose. In one instance, that of Chigwell Forest, indeed, an inclosure took place without any purchase of the Crown rights or any application to the Commissioners. The incloser was a Mr. Hodson, who claimed to be lord of the manor, but his act was generally regarded as a most barefaced violation of the rights both of the Crown and of the foresters, and it had been made the subject of a correspondence with the office of Woods and Forests. No such case could have happened if there had been a careful administration of the Royal forests. Another point of complaint was that the rights of the Crown had generally been sold for a mere trifle. The Crown rights over 434 acres were sold to the Marquess of Wellesley for £1,890. In another case 695 acres were given for £3,349; and Mr. Money Wigram obtained 1,377 acres for £4,468. Altogether the rights of the Crown had been sold over about 4,000 acres, and the price obtained amounted to £18,500—a paltry sum for such a vast quantity of land, some of it very valuable. It had been the custom of late years to encourage the formation of peoples' parks in the metropolis, and large sums had been voted for that purpose; but most persons would far rather spend a day at Epping Forest than go through the humdrum of a promenade in one of those parks, however valuable such places might be in their way. Hundreds of thousands of the humbler classes in London were interested in the question, and vast numbers of excursionists were taken by railway and other conveyances to Epping Forest for recreation. In fact, the road thither on some fine days might be compared to the road to Epsom on a Derby day. The facilities for getting there by railway were being increased; and if the land were left open for the people of London to take healthful exercise upon it, there could be no doubt they would gladly avail themselves of the privilege. He had endeavoured to show that these inclosures were illegal, and at variance with the precedents set in regard to the other Royal forests. If he had shown that they were at variance with the case of Hampstead Heath, he thought he had done enough to induce the House to agree to his Motion for inquiry, for it was an inquiry only that he now sought. He would therefore conclude by moving for a Select Committee.

MR. COX, in seconding the Motion, said, that thousands of poor persons had signed petitions to that House praying for an inquiry into the manner in which inclosures took place in these forests. Speaking on behalf of those poor persons, he asserted that their only desire was to maintain the rights which the people had enjoyed for centuries in these forests, and that they had no wish to interfere with the rights of others. If the Committee were granted, he believed it could be shown by conclusive evidence that the inhabitants of the metropolis had long possessed the right of going upon the land in question, whenever they pleased, for fresh air and innocent enjoyment. Some years ago he had himself seen large processions of citizens, accompanied by barges fitted upon wheels, going from Mile End Road to Epping Forest and a place called Fairlop, where an immense oak stood—a custom which had existed for between one and two hundred years. He maintained that these lands belonged to the Crown; that those who had inclosed parts of them could claim no other right than that of turning out cattle to graze upon them; and that the people ought not to have their right of going there for recreation to use the word of the hon. Member for Maldon "filched" from them. It might be said that these inclosures took place with the consent of the Crown, but in the case of a recent inclosure of 101 acres at Chigwell, both the Crown and the Inclosure Commissioners had been set at defiance. Mr. Gore, of the Woods and Forests Department, was written to on the subject, and he replied that it was impossible for the Crown to raise the question in a court of law; and when the Inclosure Commissioners were next appealed to, they stated that they had no jurisdiction, and could take no steps in the matter. There were about forty other inclosures varying from a hundred down to as low as four and even two acres each which could be proved to be illegal; and the open land, on which the people had for ages taken recreation, was gradually disappearing. Surely, that was a state of things which the House could not refuse to inquire into, and thus set the question of right at rest now and for ever.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the legality of inclosures in Waltham, Epping, and other Forests in Essex, and to ascertain what steps ought to be taken to preserve the rights of the public, of the poorer foresters, and the inhabitants of the metropolis, within the Forests, as well as to inquire into their general management."

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON said, he could not but think that the proposal was of doubtful expediency—at any rate, he felt bound, upon the part of many of his constituents, to protest against the assumption upon which the Resolution was founded, that the inhabitants of the metropolis, or the public generally, had any legal right whatever over the wastes which were the subject of consideration. The question raised was a question of legal rights; legal rights had to be investigated; legal rights had to be respected; and it appeared to him that a court of law was a more fitting tribunal for this purpose than a Committee of the House of Commons. The House should at least know that this very question had been, last year, the subject of judicial investigation, and the result of that investigation before Justice Wightman was this—a verdict altogether adverse to the claims set up by the public over the waste. The question put by the learned judge to the jury was:—Do you find that, in the Manor of Woodford (a portion of the forest) there is a custom for the inhabitants of that manor to wander about over the waste for air and recreation? and the answer given by the jury was "No." Had, then, the inhabitants of the metropolis any right? What, too, was to be the full scope of this inquiry? During the last few years many inclosures had been made under grants from the lords of the manors, and many very handsome edifices had been erected upon them. The Infant Orphan Asylum at Wanstead, he believed, was an instance of this; the Merchant Seamen's Institution too, also in the same neighbourhood; and there were numerous villa residences of citizens scattered throughout the forest. Did the hon. Gentleman intend to inquire into the titles of all these properties—did he intend to put the proprietors to the annoyance, anxiety, and expense of defending their titles before his Committee? This could hardly be his intention, and yet the words of the Resolution seemed to intimate that it was. There seemed to be an impression in the House, that it would be desirable to keep all these open places uninclosed entirely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the metropolis, but surely it could not be the serious intention of the House to keep thousands of acres uncultivated, when a few hundred acres, well regulated, would suffice for this purpose. It could not be the intention of the House to neglect altogether the wishes of the inhabitants of the district itself—and entirely to forego the advantages of inclosure. It could not be the intention to declare those to be rights which a court of law held were not rights, or to appropriate for the use of the public that which the law said was the private property of individuals. The law declared that the ownership of the soil was in the lord of the manor, and the lord of the manor, with consent of the Homage, had power to make grants for inclosure. But when any district or parish was to be inclosed at once, then application was made to the Commissioners; an award was issued, allotments were set out to satisfy existing claims, and one allotment was made for the purposes of recreation for the people of the neighbourhood, varying in extent with the population of the parish. This arrangement had to be confirmed by Parliament, and it always had been confirmed until last year, when an exception, mentioned by the hon. Member for Finsbury, was made in the case of the parish of Chigwell. In this case the parish of Chigwell was compelled by a Committee of the House to give up fifty acres instead of five, and that for the benefit of the people of the metropolis; nor did fifty acres represent the whole extent to which Chigwell was mulcted before it could obtain the benefit of inclosure; these fifty acres were the best land on the waste, it had to be drained and levelled and fenced at the expense of the estate; so that Chigwell may be said to have paid the value of 150 acres of land of average value in the parish for the advantage of the power to inclose. Now, this was done entirely because the parish of Chigwell happened to be a pretty spot. Other parishes under exactly similar circumstances to Chigwell, with the exception of their beauty, obtained their inclosures under the very same Act, and were only compelled to give up five acres for recreative purposes for the inhabitants of their neighbourhood. It might be desirable that this fifty acres should be set apart, but it clearly was not just that one parish should thus pay so exorbitantly for an advantage, simply because it happened to be beautiful, while another parish could purchase the same advantage so cheaply. He quite agreed with the hon. Members who thought it desirable that there should be recreation grounds kept open for the people of the metropolis. He quite entered into the feeling of the hon. Member for Maidstone when he described the other day the pleasure he felt in seeing those people enjoying themselves in the forest; and although that enjoyment was not entirely without some drawback—for he found some of his church-going constituents rather scandalized at the joviality which characterized their proceedings on Sunday—yet he was free to admit that Epping Forest was a very proper place for such recreative grounds. The question, however, still remained—who was to find them? It was hardly right that private individuals should be compelled to give up their property for this purpose. The interests in what are now Victoria and Battersea Parks had no doubt been purchased, and so compensation should be given for rights appropriated for such purposes in Epping Forest. He thought it might be a proper subject for inquiry by the Committee, if appointed, how far the Crown was morally bound to provide such recreative grounds. His own opinion was, that when there were crown lands uninclosed in proper places, there tracts should be set out for the public use; but where it was desirable to take such recreative grounds from private persons—lords of manors—there compensation should be made from the revenues of the Crown.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was bound to admit that there were many subjects which might be inquired into by Select Committees with great advantage, but among them certainly did not come technical and strictly legal rights. The objection which the Government entertained to the Motion, and had expressed to the hon. Gentleman who made it, was, that from the particular terms in which it was couched it sought very plainly to erect a Select Committee of that House into a court of judicature for the purpose of inquiring into, and expressing an opinion with reference to the rights of individuals and of the Crown. Nothing could be more inconvenient than such a course of procedure, and nothing more dangerous than the precedent which would be set if the House should accede to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman in the terms in which it was expressed. The hon. Member proposed that the Committee should inquire into the legality of recent inclosures. That was a strictly legal question. The inclosures were legal and justifiable in point of law, or they were not. If they were legal and justifiable, no ground of complaint could be made; but if they were illegal and could not be maintained, there was a proper tribunal to appeal to. That tribunal, unlike a Committee, would not exhaust itself with the mere expression of an opinion, but would record and enforce its judgment by ordinary process of law. An inquiry by a Committee, therefore, would not be efficacious even if convenient. But a Select Committee had not the powers and machinery of a court of law, even for the purpose of inquiry. It could not compel the attendance of witnesses, or administer an oath. The inquiry, therefore, would be defective as well as inconclusive in its result. He denied the existence of the rights which the hon. Member for Finsbury alleged. It was said the poor foresters had not the means of asserting and maintaining their rights in the Court of Exchequer, and therefore a Select Committee should be appointed. If that were so, Committees, already tolerably well occupied, would find a vast accretion of employment in inefficacious inquiries into the alleged rights of parties who were too poor to prosecute their suits in the ordinary courts of justice. He was not, however, disposed to deny that some inquiry was needed, and therefore he would make a proposition which he had already communicated to the hon. Member, and which he thought would satisfy all parties. Instead of the hon. Member's proposition he would suggest that a Committee be appointed—

"To inquire into the condition and management of the Royal Forests in Essex, and into any inclosures which may have taken place therein since the Report of the Commissioners of 1850; and to consider whether it is expedient to take any steps for preserving open spots in such Forests."

MR. TORRENS said, he was quite willing to withdraw his Motion, and accept the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ROYAL FORESTS (ESSEX.)

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

On Motion of Mr. Attorney General, Select Committee appointed.

"To inquire into the condition and management of the Royal Forests in Essex, and into any inclosures which may have taken place therein since the Report of the Commissioners of 1850; and to consider whether it may be expedient to take any steps for preserving the open spaces in the said Forests."

And on March 12 Committee nominated, as follow:—

Mr. TORRENS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Sir JOHN TROLLOPE, Mr. BRUCE, Mr. WATLINGTON, Viscount ENFIELD, Lord LOVAIN, Mr. COX, Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. KER SEYMER, Mr. KINNAIRD, Mr. MACDONOUGH, Mr. CALTHORPE, and Mr. PEACOCKE.

METROPOLIS TURNPIKE ROADS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, that in the absence of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Petersfield (Sir W. Jolliffe) the cause of whose absence they all deplored, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Acts relating to the turnpike roads in the neighbourhood of the metropolis north of the river Thames. The metropolitan roads had been under the charge of Commissioners, of whom the right hon. Baronet the Member for Petersfield was one, and upon former occasions turnpikes had been removed, and the charge of the roads transferred to the parishes. A Royal Commission which sat in 1859 recommended a large extension of that arrangement, and the Bill proposed to relieve fifty-one miles of road within the district governed by the Metropolis Local Management Act, by removing twenty-five turnpike gates, and fifty-six side gates, which were serious impediments to traffic. In order that any parishes which might be affected by the Bill should have an opportunity of stating their objections, he proposed to take the second reading before Easter, and afterwards to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, where all parties could be heard. Being a hybrid Bill, it would afterwards come before a Committee of the Whole House, so that there would be ample opportunities for the parishes to state their views. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to introduce the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had been in communication with the right hon. Member for Petersfield, whom he had assured of his cordial support in carrying out the object in view. The reference to a Select Committee would, he thought, meet all the objections that could be raised.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that he thought the subject was in very good hands, and was glad to find it was intended to send the Bill to a Select Committee; but he wished to know whether it would be a Committee of thirteen or fifteen Members, or one of five Members. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: Of five Members.] That would meet all objection, as it would enable the parishes, some of which were grievously burdened, to appear and state their cases.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Acts relating to the Turnpike Roads in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis North of the River Thames, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GATHORNE HARDY and Sir WILLIAM JOLLIFFE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills; and to be printed. [Bill 47.]

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL—[BILL 10.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COX said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to permit voting by ballot at municipal elections.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought some explanation of the Bill ought to be given. He believed it was intended to allow votes to be taken by ballot in municipal elections, but it appeared that the hon. Member who had introduced the Bill was not present.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the Bill was a mere supplement to an Act which had been passed some time previously for the election of Select Vestries. The vestries so elected had worked remarkably well.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that if the House passed the Bill, they would probably soon be told by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), that a Bill authorizing vote by ballot at elections of Members of Parliament was only a complement of an existing Act. Therefore he would cordially support the Amendment.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that he regarded the Bill as a step in the right direction, and he should certainly vote for it. He hoped to see an extension of the principle to Parliamentary voting.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought it would be unusual in the absence of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. A. Smith), who had charge of the Bill to meet it with the Amendment which had been proposed. The absence of the hon. Member was accidental, arising from the sudden postponement of a Motion that had been expected to occupy some considerable time.

MR. PAGET said, that in his opinion Parliament might very properly put the system of vote by ballot to the test in the proposed instance. If it failed, the general application of the system would not of course be persisted in; but if it succeeded, as he believed would be the case—though any man must be presumptuous who spoke confidently about the success of new systems—then an unanswerable argument would be supplied for its further extension.

MR. LOCKE said, he should be sorry if they were to go to a division on the second reading of the Bill without anything more being said upon the subject. There was a great distinction between the Bill before them and the Bill of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), because at that time in all the large parishes in the metropolis the votes were taken by means of voting papers. There was therefore no novelty in the proposition, and the object was merely to extend to municipal elections in small boroughs in the country, where a great amount of bribery, drunkenness, and intimidation, or at least cajolery, took place, a system which had worked most beneficially in the metropolis. He thought that when the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) moved the Amendment, it was not because he had well considered the subject of voting by ballot in municipal elections, but on account of the horror he entertained of the ballot in the abstract. He (Mr. Locke) was of opinion that it would be extremely unfair not to read the Bill a second time, seeing that it was distinct from the general Bill for the application of the ballot to the election of Members of Parliament, and that the objections to it, whatever they might be, would be more appropriately dealt with in Committee.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he must admit that the Bill was intended in a great measure to be auxiliary and supplementary to the general question of the ballot, but at the same time the adoption of the principle was proposed to be altogether voluntary, and he thought that that would remove many of the objections to it. He had been a complete convert to the ballot, from what he witnessed at an election in which he was himself concerned immediately after the passing of the Reform Bill, though he did not attribute to it all the great advantages that some of its advocates thought it would be likely to produce. He believed that much of the success of the system would depend upon the constituency upon which it might be tried, but that a great deal more would depend upon the machinery by which it might be carried out. He also felt that it was very undesirable that any plan should be adopted as regarded Parliamentary representation which might afterwards prove a failure; but the proposed measure would, he hoped, afford a satisfactory test of the system of ballot voting. Nothing could be worse than the present mode of conducting municipal elections; and if the House had any regard for the character of local government, they ought to pass some measure to correct and counteract the malpractices, which had been growing worse and worse every year. Hon. Members had only to refer to the evidence taken before the Committee of the other House of Parliament in 1859, for a description of all the evils of the present system. It was true that the object of that Committee was to show the country that they ought to be very careful how they lowered the Parliamentary franchise; but the evidence proved the necessity for some alteration in the manner in which municipal elections were conducted. He proposed that the town council should have the power of taking the votes by ballot in whatever way they pleased; but that having adopted the system, they should adhere to it for five years. The Bill was entirely of an experimental character, and he hoped the House would allow it to be read a second time.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I have always been an opponent of the ballot; and the mover and supporters of this Bill very fairly avow that this is the first step towards proposing the ballot for Parliamentary elections. One hon. Member has told us that it is ancillary and supplementary to a proposal for vote by ballot; and as I should on any occasion when such a proposal came before the House vote against it, I can have no hesitation in supporting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite to delay the second reading till this day six months. Every argument that I have heard adduced in favour of this Bill could be adduced in favour of vote by ballot at Parliamentary elections; and the objections which I have always felt and often stated to such a mode of voting at Parliamentary elections apply in principle to the present proposal, because the election of a municipal body is a political election. It has not the same political importance as an election of Members of this House, but there is no question that it is a political act. The principle of my objection, which I think a sound one, is that no man should in this free country perform a political act without its being known to his fellow-citizens how he performs it—that he should bear the responsibility for good or evil of the act which he has thought fit to do. I think responsibility ought to go hand in hand with political action. The object of the Bill is to withdraw the conduct of voters at municipal elections from public observation—to make their voting secret, and therefore to divest them of that responsibility which I think under a free constitution ought to follow every political act. I shall therefore vote against the Bill, and support the Amendment.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Mr. HADFIELD said, that he supposed the comparatively large attendance of hon. Members was to be attributed to the opposition which was intended to be given to this Bill. Four times this Bill passed this House, and had been supported on each occasion in both Houses by Her Majesty's Government; and he was in the position so unusual to a private member, of asking the House, for the fifth time, to read this Bill a third time. It had also been supported by no less than seventy-two Peers of the realm, including many persons highly honoured in the land. The noble Earl who was at the head of the Conservative party had said the declaration which this Bill sought to abolish was of no real importance to the Church, and the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge had admitted the same in that House. The declaration which persons were at present obliged to make on taking office afforded really no protection to the Church, and was irritating alike to friends of the Church and to Nonconformists. Was there to be one law for one class and another for another class of Her Majesty's subjects? Did the Ministers of the Crown sign this declaration? The Home Secretary of Her Majesty's late Government had stated that he had not signed it, and he (Mr. Hadfield) believed that nine persons out of ten who took office did not subscribe unto it. Two years ago he had the honour of moving for a Return of all persons who had taken office within the last ten years who had not taken this declaration, but the Motion was opposed on the ground that those who had omitted to do so might be subject to the penalties prescribed by law. He held in his hand the Indemnity Act, 1858, introduced by the right hon. Member for Cambridge, which enlarged the time for making this declaration for the benefit of those who had neglected to do so, through ignorance of the law, absence, or other unavoidable cause. He would not ask the right hon. Member whether he had made and signed the declaration. He would presume he had done so; but he would assert his belief that none of the right hon. Member's colleagues (except Judges and Magistrates) had done so; and even Gentlemen learned in the law had had the benefit of being ignorant of the law, to escape the obligation of signing this obnoxious and offensive declaration. He believed that among those who had not so subscribed were Members who had held the highest offices in the State, and who were yet about to oppose this Bill, and to perpetuate the obligation on others. Magistrates and members of municipal corporations were obliged to subscribe to the declaration at once, but Ministers of the Crown did not make it at all, and were supposed to be indemnified. Therefore, there was one law for one class and another and offensive law for another class. He trusted that this remnant of intolerance would be swept away. The rejection of this Bill, he believed, would cause much dissatisfaction among the great body of Dissenters. He warned hon. Members that it was the reverse of wisdom to rouse a spirit of religious discord by rejecting this Bill, and evoke a crisis to be deprecated by all.

Viscount Palmerston

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. BAINES begged to second the Motion, and said that hon. Gentlemen opposite might not only gracefully but safely and wisely grant this small measure of relief to those who felt this declaration to be derogatory and oppressive. He could not understand how men of high feeling and great talents could sustain a declaration like that in question. The persons to whom the Bill applied would have no ecclesiastical power whatever, and it was worse than useless to maintain a declaration which, while it was no defence to the Church of England, was offensive to a large portion of the community. He had never known a Dissenter being prevented by the declaration from taking office, except one, and he was one of the most conscientious men he had ever met with. Every concession made to Dissenters only added to the strength of the Church of England, while every unnecessary restriction that was maintained tended to weaken her. He hoped, therefore, the House would consent to the reading of the Bill a third time.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged to move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. He rejoiced that the hon. Member for Sheffield had at last broken the silence he had so long maintained. But he found that, previous to the second reading of this Bill, a statement which he held in his hand, which contained the substance of the speech of the hon. Member, had been widely circulated. He opposed this measure, on the ground that it proposed, by abolishing the necessity for the making and subscription of the declaration contained in the Test and Corporation Act, to break a compact made thirty-five years ago, and which had been renewed in all the Acts of Parliament which had since passed, for granting relief and privileges to Dissenters, Roman Catholics, and Jews. In 1828 Lord John Russell said—

"After deeply considering the declaration proposed, I feel bound to say that I do not find it imposes any restraints on the religious liberty of individuals. It merely restrains them from exercising any influence which they may obtain, by virtue of any office to which they may be appointed, to weaken the Established Church, or to subvert its legal rights and privileges. I therefore am of opinion that it would be extremely inadvisable in me to propound or to maintain any objection to the declaration which has been proposed. On the contrary, it would be extremely wrong in me not to admit it into the Bill as a very essential means of pacifying the country on this most important subject." [2 Hansard, xviii. 1330.]

This was the opinion of the leader of the the Liberal party when he entered into the compact. Now, it might be asked, were the circumstances in the moral condition of the country so changed now that this declaration had become unnecessary? The reverse of this was notoriously the case. There were two classes of Dissenters; one were satisfied with the religious liberty they enjoyed; the other aimed openly at the destruction of the Established Church, and wished to deprive her of a great part of her property. Lord Teynham, in 1860, said the great objection to the declaration was—

"That the words were ambiguous and ensnaring to the conscience; and some doubted whether, after having taken such an oath, they could with an easy conscience petition for the abolition of Church Rates, on the ground that such abolition might be considered as tending to injure and weaken the Established Church; and others, who could enter a corporation with a good conscience, and petition against Church Rates, thinking that their abolition would be an addition to the strength of the Establishment, might have it unjustly imputed to them that they had violated their oaths." [3 Hansard, civii. 1009.]

After this announcement from the noble Lord, who in that year moved the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, the Peers awoke; for it had then become evident that the object of abolishing the declaration was not to relieve the conscience of individuals in their private or in their corporate capacities, for in such capacities the declaration does not affect them, but to enable persons in corporations to use that corporate power to attack the Church of England. The Bill for the Commutation of Church Rates which stood in his name afforded sufficient proof that he was actuated by no other spirit than a desire as far as possible to consult the feelings of his Dissenting fellow countrymen. In the year 1859 hon. Members left him alone in opposition to the measure; he rejoiced to see that the benches, then so empty, were now so full.

MR. SELWYN begged to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am unwilling to give to this measure only such support as is accorded by a silent vote, because I confess I not only feel myself bound by former acts and present convictions to vote in its favour, but I cannot help expressing my very great regret at the error which I think the hon. Gentleman opposite has committed in opposing the Bill. The hon. Gentleman who has moved that the Bill be read a third time this day six months has founded his objection on this ground—that the present arrangement is an arrangement in the nature of a compact. I do not deny that there are certain Acts of Parliament which may more or less approximate to the character of a compact, but that doctrine, even in its application to particular cases, ought to be treated with great jealousy, because the effect of it would be to throw into abeyance the whole power and responsibility of the Legislature for the time being. It is a very difficult and dangerous doctrine to hold that there may be arrangements made by former Parliaments in matters of general legislation. I do not refer to Acts which contain particular promises to particular persons for particular purposes; but it is exceedingly difficult to contend that it is competent for the Legislature, at a given moment, to tie up the hands of the Legislature of a subsequent period, which must always remain under the paramount obligation of determining what is for the interests of the country at that period. I must say, I have rarely known a case in which the argument of a compact has been more hardly dealt with than in the present instance. The hon. Gentleman has quoted the words of Lord John Russell to show that this is a matter of compact. I cannot admit that it was in the power of my noble Friend (Earl Russell), even if he had the inclination, to give the character of a compact to such a declaration; but there is not the slightest evidence that such was his intention.

Mr. Newdegate

The words simply amount to this—that the arrangement then proposed was a fair arrangement for the then Parliament to make. There is no evidence that he accepted it as a perpetual and unalterable settlement, in which light the hon. Gentleman now urges it as an objection to the Bill. But if there be nothing in the nature of the case that affixes to it the character of a compact—and I, for my part, would say that the nature of the case almost defies the idea of a compact—I ask the House to consider the policy of the question. And here I place myself in the position of one, who in addition to his general duties as a Minister of the Crown and Member of Parliament, has a special duty as the representative of a large portion of the clergy of the Church of England; and I confidently say, holding the language I have held ever since I had the honour to represent them—now a period of fifteen years—that no benefit accrues to the Church of England from the maintenance of such a declaration. For what does this declaration do? I do not deny that in 1828 it was wise of Lord John Russell, or of those who supported him, to accept the declaration; but the circumstances of 1828 were different from those of 1863. Look at the changes which have occurred in our legislation—the admission of the Roman Catholics to Parliament, the admission of the Jews. Look at the manner in which, since 1828, the whole system of the administration of the State has been altered—how it has been founded upon the general recognition of the equal civil rights of the members of all religions. I admit this declaration does contain in it more or less an acknowledgment of civil inequality. It does constitute a civil inequality when certain persons are singled out to make a declaration limiting, or tending to limit, the discharge of their obligations as Members of Parliament, or as holders of any other office of trust. But let me look at this declaration as a security. If it be a security, it is one which each person may interpret for himself; and I must confess it appears to be such that, while it may possibly fetter the hands of a very scrupulous man, those persons who assume to themselves an ordinary freedom will find very little difficulty in exercising under the pressure of it nearly all the liberty which they would exercise even if there were no such restraint. Now, it is not good policy to depend upon declarations the whole force of which depends upon private interpretation, and is not sufficient to bind many persons, though it is sufficient to bind the more scrupulous and conscientious men. But, Sir, I do not admit that the Church of England has any occasion to take a security of this kind. It is admitted that the pressure of this declaration is intended to be upon Dissenters; but I do not see any danger to the Church of England arising from Dissenters or Roman Catholics. If the Church of England has dangers—and I fear she has—they arise from internal dissensions. I most sincerely trust she may outlive and overcome them, for, in my opinion, it would be a sad thing for the nation, and for all persons, Dissenters included, if she ceased to exist. But for the last thirty years I have not been able to trace any danger to the Church of England arising from the political acts of the Dissenters. If Dissenters have shown on special occasions a particular desire to secure privileges for their own bodies, the effect of that is to create a reaction favourable to the Church on the part of the immense majority of the nation. The great increase of the anxiety to defend the Church of England for several years past is due to the fact that some pressure has been attempted to be exercised on the Church by particular members of Dissenting bodies in measures which they have promoted or introduced. But if that be so, we have, I think, a security for the Church of England in the zeal of its own members, as indicated by what has taken place in this House, and proved by sure experience—a security of a thoroughly natural and wholesome character because produced by the very action of free discussion, because it implies no inequality, because it affixes no brand but is a sound and legitimate part of our Parliamentary system, by which the tendencies to excess (of which every party must be conscious) are checked and controlled by the reaction which they create. It is manifest that a strong feeling of zeal does prevail among many Members of this House for treating any measures that may be introduced in a manner favourable to the Church; but I must say that a vigorous indication of that feeling would in the end prove unfavourable, unless it were mildly and temperately used; and there is no mode in which it could be more mildly and temperately used than in dealing with such a measure as this. If this be a declaration not involving any security to the Church, but if, on the other hand, it be felt to be painful to an important part of the community, and if we long ago recognised the truth that there is no use in imposing in any shape civil disabilities on account of religious opinions, then I think the mode in which the House deals with such a Bill as this would afford the country no fallacious test of the way in which those who are attached to the Church of England are disposed to use their strength. At any rate, having myself for so many years represented a large body of the clergy of the Church of England, and having on various occasions submitted my claims to represent them to their revision, I have no hesitation in saying, that although on certain other occasions I may be called upon to differ from my hon. Friend who is the proposer of this Bill, and the hon. Gentleman who has seconded the third reading, they are, by the course which they have taken, in point of fact acting the part of true and prudent friends of the real interests of the Church of England.

MR. WALPOLE:—Sir, I am well aware that the House is anxious to come to a division, and there has been, I believe, a sort of understanding that a division without a discussion was likely to take place upon this occasion. But unfortunately, as I think, that understanding has been broken by the promoter of this Bill; and after the discussion which has taken place, and after the remarkable speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think the debate ought not to be terminated without some answer being attempted to that speech. The hon. Gentleman who moved the third reading quoted myself, as having, on a previous occasion, said that the declaration which this Bill seeks to abolish was no great security to the Church. I am of that opinion still. I think this Bill is of an insignificant character, either as regards any relief to be given to Dissenters on the one hand, or as regards danger to the Church on the other. Then it will be asked, why oppose it? My answer is, why do you propose it? That would be the first answer, and I believe the legitimate one, for I do think that this declaration was a compact made at the time when the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed. I do think it is in the nature of a compact, in this sense at least, that when you grant a great measure of relief and propose to append to it any conditions which are considered as securities, whether they be so or not, those who receive the benefit of that relief ought not to come to Parliament to be relieved of the conditions upon which the measure of relief was granted. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer says truly, that no compact can be made by one Parliament which is to bind another. That is perfectly true; but there are understandings with respect to measures of this description which, unless adhered to, will prevent us making those reforms which may be desirable, but which will not be made unless conditions like those in question be maintained. It is in that sense that I think the compact ought to be maintained, and I think also that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the very last person who ought to use the argument he did; for if ever a compact was made by man, it was made by my right hon. Friend—I allude to the repeal of the income tax. So much for the maintenance of compacts. Well, why wish the law to be maintained? My right hon. Friend said, and said truly, that the Church of England is in some danger from internal dissensions, but in none from free discussion. But what is it that has provoked these discussions? Is it any attack on the part of the Church of England? Have not the members of that Church on every occasion manifested the utmost desire to give in the fullest, freest manner, all that my right hon. Friend calls religious liberty? Well, then, what has provoked these discussions? Unhappily, I think I may say they are owing to this:—That the Dissenters, in a series of measures, advocated by some from good and conscientious motives, by others with the avowed object of attacking the Church, have brought forward Bill after Bill until they have raised a resistance which they will not easily quell. But my right hon. Friend says, that this declaration partakes of the nature of civil inequality. But was that the language used by Lord John Russell in 1828? That noble Lord said, that the object of the declaration was simply this—that those who made it should not use the power which they derived from any corporate office to the prejudice of the Church of England. If there be any civil inequality in that, then the argument of my right hon. Friend comes to this—that the Dissenters ought to be freed, that they may be at liberty to act to the prejudice of the Church of England. Sir, every argument that I have heard in support of the Bill becomes of serious import, because it shows, or tends to show, that there is something more in the background. I will add only one word more. I was not in my place last evening, but I see that a certain measure was resisted then by so high an authority as the First Minister of the Crown upon the ground that it might lead to another measure which he always opposed. If that be a legitimate ground of opposition, and if the argument of the noble Lord which opened up the question of ulterior measures be good, can there be a stronger reason for treating this Bill as something very serious, something more than appears upon the face of it? I shall therefore cordially support my hon. Friend in his Motion for the rejection of this Bill.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, that in his opinion the declaration was of no advantage to the Church of England, but was a practical evil. Most able men—men of conscientious views—were prevented from serving in a corporate office, owing to the operation of this declaration, which deprived corporations of their services. In the borough he represented a gentleman who, of all others, was most fit to be in the corporation, was prevented from joining that body because he had a conscientious objection to take this test. In moving the rejection of a similar Bill in the other House, Lord Chelmsford said the object was to obtain from Dissenters on entering office an acknowledgment of the predominance of the Established Church; but he submitted there was no advantage conferred on the Church of England by obtaining this acknowledgment of its predominance. He had no feeling whatever against the Established Church—he wished its usefulness might be preserved—but he would say to its friends, if you wish to preserve the substance, do not fight so hard for the shadow. The friends of the Established Church should not insult those who were opposed to them by contending so strongly for that which is a mere sign of supremacy.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that in reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he begged to be allowed to explain that he (Mr. Newdegate) had stated on the second reading of the Bill, that the compact, of which the terms of the declaration were the effect and the evidence, had been renewed at the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, on the passing of the Act with regard to Quakers and Moravians, and within the last five years on the passing of the Act by which members of the Jewish religion were admitted to seats in that House. Therefore, it was not a compact thirty-five years old; but a compact renewed from time to time, and renewed on the last occasion within the last five years.

The House divided:—Ayes 175; Noes 172: Majority 3.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

REGISTER OF VOTERS BILL—[BILL 25.]
 COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LOCKE KING begged to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. HOWES begged to propose, as an Amendment, that the House resolve itself into the said Committee on that day six months. The Bill proposed to collect in one general alphabetical list for each county all the voters' names, which were at present alphabetically arranged according to parishes. Such a list would simply be of advantage to candidates, and he saw no reason why the cost of preparing and printing them, which should be defrayed by the candidates themselves, should be thrown on the ratepayers at large.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—instead thereof.

MR. COLLINS said, that in those counties in which there was no contest at an election, the money expended in the formation of those lists would be absolutely thrown away. He opposed the measure, therefore, in the shape in which it stood; but he should withdraw his opposition if the hon. Gentleman by whom it was introduced would consent to give the magistrates in quarter sessions the power of deciding that no alphabetical register of voters should be made in those counties in which they might consider it unnecessary. He objected to imposing the expense of the lists of voters upon the counties.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, that he also thought this Bill would entail an unnecessary expense upon the counties. Such a list as the one proposed would only be for the convenience of candidates, and therefore the expense of making it ought not to fall on the ratepayers.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he thought that the Bill was a good one as far as it went, but that there was nothing of great importance in it. He believed that the expenditure likely to be incurred in carrying out the measure had been very much exaggerated.

MR. LOCKE KING said, that the registers at present were to a great extent in a state of much confusion. The expense of preparing the lists which the Bill proposed to have made out would be small, and the advantage of them would be greater to electors than candidates.

MR. MITFORD said, that he did not think there was any grievance that required redress by such a Bill as the present.

COLONEL GILPIN said, that he should oppose the measure, on account of the unnecessary expense to which it would put the county ratepayers.

MR. LOCKE said, that he should support the measure. The expense which it would entail would be very inconsiderable.

MR. STANILAND said, that he saw no necessity for such a Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 104: Majority 25.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Clerks of the Peace to prepare alphabetical List of Voters for Counties).

MR. HOWES said, he begged to move an Amendment, to the effect that it should be left to the court of quarter sessions to decide whether the proposed alphabetical list of voters should be made out in any particular county.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, after the word "county," to insert the words "whenever directed by the general or quarter sessions for the county."

MR. LOCKE KING said, that he opposed the Amendment. He believed that the Bill as it stood would be beneficial, and its provisions ought, in his opinion, to be made compulsory.

MR. DODSON begged to observe, that the quarter sessions could not be regarded as representing the taxpayers.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 99: Majority 23.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^d To-morrow.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 1.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. M'Mahon.)

LORD FERMOY said, that he rose to move that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. It was quite true that this subject came under the consideration of the Select Committee which sat on the hon. Member's Bill last year. But the present Bill was different from its predecessor, and the former inquiry was unsatisfactory because it was conducted by a packed and biassed Committee. The object of the measure before the House was to sweep away all the interests recognised by the Act of 1842, and to maintain and increase the rights which were said to be held under Royal charters. It was an error to say that the Act of 1842 was passed in a hurry, for it received full and careful consideration. He could prove that during the last twenty years, and especially during the last three years, salmon had been increasing instead of diminishing. No doubt salmon were unfortunately destroyed, but much more by the mills than by fixed engines. Those whom he represented on that occasion did not want any special favour. They would be satisfied with a full and fair hearing before an impartial tribunal; and, in the event of his Amendment being adopted, he thought the nomination of the Select Committee should be left in the hands of the Government. He contended, indeed, that so important a question as the salmon fisheries of Ireland should be dealt with by the Government, and not by any private Member. The lower proprietors admitted that the Act of 1842 had been strained, and even violated in some instances; he himself was prepared to acknowledge that the upper proprietors did not get their fair share of fish, and he had no doubt, that if all parties consulted together, a satisfactory arrangement could be made with respect to an extension of the close-time. But the question was eminently one of detail, and on that account it should be referred either to a Select Committee or to a Royal Commission. A one-sided measure such as the present, if passed without previous inquiry, would give great dissatisfaction in Ireland, and would merely result in wholesale confiscation for the benefit of a few upper proprietors.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—instead thereof.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE begged to second the Amendment. He was interested in the salmon fisheries of Ireland, and had some right to speak on the subject of the present Bill. One effect of the Bill would be to place the fisheries in the north of Ireland at the mercy of the Irish Society, and he contended that more salmon were improperly and illegally destroyed by the lessee of the Irish Society than by all the sea fisheries put together. He admitted that the subject was surrounded with considerable difficulty, but that was a strong reason for referring the Bill to a Select Committee; and he hoped, that if any inquiry were to be instituted, care would be taken to give the lower proprietors a fair hearing. There was no foundation for the statement that great injury was done by the sea fisheries. Only a very small proportion of salmon were taken in the sea, but everybody knew that fish caught in the sea were infinitely superior to those killed in fresh water. Why, then, should the owners of sea fisheries be subjected to a species of legislation for which there was no precedent, and which could not fail to do a great deal of harm without one particle of good? During the last few years salmon had increased to a considerable extent in Ireland, and it would be imprudent as well as unjust to interfere with the existing law, at any rate without some previous investigation. The river fishing conducted by the lessees of the Irish Society in the north of Ireland was particularly fatal to the increase of salmon in that country. He did not believe that the present Bill would give one fish more to the upper proprietors; on the contrary, he was convinced it would have an entirely opposite effect, and to pass it in its present shape would be an act unworthy of the intelligence and wisdom of the House of Commons. He hoped the Select Committee, if appointed, would include some hon. Member from the north of Ireland.

MR. COX said, that the hon. Baronet who spoke last admitted that his observations were coloured by his personal interest in this question; but, for himself, he was influenced only by the public interest in the matter. The Irish Society, of which he was the deputy chairman, which received some thousands a year from these fisheries, and expended the whole of the money for the benefit of Londonderry and Coleraine, had, after full consideration, arrived at the conclusion, that although this Bill might, if passed, reduce their fisheries to a certain extent at first, yet the subsequent increase which it would cause in the take of salmon would amply compensate for any such temporary loss. He believed, that if the fish were allowed to go up the rivers to spawn, the result would be such an increase of the quantity of salmon that there would be enough for both the upper and lower proprietors. The supply had fallen off and the price had risen, not from any over-fishing in the upper waters, but entirely in consequence of the stake nets and bag nets placed at the mouths of the rivers by persons having an interest similar to that of the hon. Baronet. He saw no necessity for the proposed Committee of Inquiry.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, that while admitting that the decision of the House upon this question ought not to be governed by local or personal considerations, yet he maintained that it was neither right nor fair entirely to ignore the law passed in 1842, confirming, if not creating, certain vested interests in the stake net and bag net fishery proprietors. It would be quite as unjust to take away the rights of these persons by a Bill like the present, as it would be to deprive the purchasers of land under the Encumbered Estates Act of their property held under a Parliamentary title. There was no analogy between the case of England, where the value of the rivers for fishing purposes was now very small, and the case of Ireland, where the fishing interests in the river were very large. The lower proprietors had as much claim to compensation for the loss of their property as any man whose house was taken from him by a railway company. The whole of the matter ought to be fully investigated, and every interest affected allowed to state its case. This end might be attained by a Select Committee, or, better still, by a Royal Commission.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, that he felt bound, on the part of his constituents, who were greatly interested in preserving the fisheries along the river Shannon, to protest against what he conceived to be almost a revolutionary proceeding—namely, the sweeping away of rights which had been enjoyed for twenty years under the authority of the Legislature in 1842. An Act of the Queen, Lords, and Commons surely afforded as good, if not a better title to property than any prescription or any charter given in olden times. The aggregate quantity of salmon exported from Ireland to England had increased between 1860 and 1862, although there might have been a decrease in the case of some rivers, where proper regulations did not prevail. This Bill would not only destroy vested rights, but would throw everything into chaos and confusion, produce endless litigation, and lead even to a revival of violence and outrage. It struck at all fixed engines in rivers, and would justify persons in forcibly removing weirs. It would thus bring back again the old days when mobs were incited to knock down weirs and were brought into collision with opposite factions, thus engendering tumults and bloodshed. He hoped the House would refuse its assent to a measure fraught with such evil consequences.

CAPTAIN TALBOT hoped that a fair inquiry would be made before a Committee or a Royal Commission. The Bill now before the House was very different from that of last year, for the Amendments brought forward by Her Majesty's Government entirely changed its nature. If any satisfactory measure were to be brought forward, the matter must be taken up by the Government, who might then produce a measure which would meet the wishes of both parties.

MR. M'CANN begged to remind the House that the rights of the poor fishermen along the shores of the Shannon had been abolished, which rights ought to be as much protected as those of the large landed proprietors. The House had quite sufficiently discussed this question, and the sooner they proceeded to bring the provisions of the Bill into operation the better.

MR. BLAKE said, that the people of the county of Waterford were in favour of this Bill, and they, by their petitions, bore testimony to the injury which the bag and stake nets had committed to the fisheries of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman quoted from statistical Returns, to show that the supply of salmon from the whole of Ireland to the London markets had considerably fallen off in late years.

MR. BUTT said, that the Bill should not be permitted to pass through the House without the fullest discussion. They were dealing with property of private individuals in Ireland, which amounted to £100,000 a year on a low valuation. The Bill was without precedent, for it proposed to destroy the rights of all private persons in all fisheries without any inquiry. He would ask, whether it was fair or just to take away the rights of persons without offering some compensation for the great losses which they would sustain if the Bill passed? They were asked to confiscate the rights of property deliberately conferred by Acts of Parliament, and enjoyed for more than twenty years, and they ought not to do this without a previous full and fair inquiry.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS begged to observe that the Bill professed to deal with the Act which passed in 1842, and which for the last twenty years had governed salmon fishing in Ireland. What was the Act of 1842? That Act was not passed by any inadvertence or surprise, but after the greatest deliberation, and with the consent, if not of the whole, of a very great majority of the Irish Members. Till that time it was doubtful whether owners of land along the shore could put out stake or bag nets, but that Act declared, that provided the parties owned a certain amount of interest in the soil, they should have the right, subject to certain regulations, to put out and fish with bag and stake net. The weir owners had a Parliamentary title of the clearest character, and he was surprised that the Bill, which dealt very tenderly with chartered or patent rights, took no notice of the stronger rights conferred by an Act of Parliament. The Act of 1842 was very careful in dealing with vested rights, and that example should be followed in any future legislation upon the subject. Reference had been made to the cases of England and Scotland, but he denied that those cases were analogous to that of Ireland, as no Act like that of 1842 had been passed in reference to those countries. He hoped the House would assent to the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he believed the opinions of the majority of Irish Members who had spoken were in favour of the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone. But he must remark that many of those hon. Members then present had not been present at the discussion which took place upon the question of the second reading of this Bill. Upon that occasion the question of referring the Bill to a Select Committee or a Commission was brought under notice, but the opinion of the House was then opposed to such a course. He was not aware of any fresh facts which should lead to a different conclusion, and therefore he should vote for going into Committee. He had given notice of a number of Amendments which he should propose in Committee, and he believed, if they were adopted, the measure would be made a useful one. The question of the interests of a particular individual did not influence him; he cared most for the general interests of the public; but the opinions of the upper and lower proprietors were so discordant that it was difficult to arrive at any satisfactory legislation. As to fixed engines, he believed that in all Acts passed before the time of George III. they were treated as illegal. There were many fixed engines in the Shannon and Blackwater which materially interfered with the navigation, and which were not legalized by the Act of 1842. He thought that in Committee of the Whole House they would be enabled to make such Amendments as would render the Bill acceptable to most, if not to all parties.

MR. HASSARD begged to move the adjournment of the debate. If that variance of opinion, which the right hon. Baronet who had just sat down had stated, did really exist, it was the duty of the Government to undertake the legislation upon the subject—

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he rose to order. The hon. Member had moved the adjournment of the debate and was entering upon a discussion of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was in order, as he might show some reasons why the debate should be adjourned.

MR. HASSARD continued: The assizes were going on in Ireland, and there were many hon. Members there, attending to their duties, whose presence in the House would be useful when a question of this sort was under discussion.

MAJOR EDWARDS begged to second the Motion for adjourning the debate—when it being a quarter to six o'clock—

MR. M'MAHON said, he should proceed with the Bill on Wednesday, March 25.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday, 25th March.

ELECTIONS DURING RECESS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. COLLINS, Bill to further limit and define the time for proceeding to Election during the Recess, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COLLINS, Mr. DODSON, and Mr. HENNESSY.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 48.]

BOROUGH RESIDENCE MEASUREMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. COLLINS, Bill to define and render uniform the mode of measuring the Residence required for Electors in Cities and Boroughs, ordered to be brought in Mr. COLLINS, Mr. PAGET, and Mr. AYTON.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 49.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

THE ITALIAN DESPATCHES.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had given notice in writing to his noble Friend the Minister for Foreign Affairs, of his intention to call attention to the circumstances connected with the despatches presented to the House the other evening, particularly with regard to that despatch which had been the subject of much discussion in their Lordships' House. It was as a question of good faith that he attached importance to the fact of the manner in which it had been dealt with. He asserted that when a despatch was presented without notice to the writer, after an interval of two years, the whole ought in justice to be given. He should wish the noble Earl to explain why the despatch published in 1849, which was presented to Parliament in 1851, was mutilated by the omission of the following words:—

"When the social dangers and the political excesses of the last twelvemonth are fast forming in every settled Government and the majority of almost every people a strong feeling against any reforms which partake of the character of revolution."

These words contained a description of the state of Europe, which all that happened between 1849 and 1851 had fully confirmed. The omission was the more remarkable from the fact that there was only a comma between the last words of the despatch as presented and the passage omitted. For the comma a full stop had been substituted. If a change in punctuation altered the purport of the passage, such change was in itself a falsification. The particular example might not at this distance be of importance, but he had noticed it as showing a vicious system.

EARL RUSSELL said, he was glad that his noble Friend was now satisfied that the despatch from which he (Earl Russell) had quoted had been presented to Parliament a long time ago. No doubt the words which his noble Friend had read were omitted from the despatch as presented, and that a full stop was substituted.

tuted for a comma. He presumed that the person intrusted with the preparation of the despatches thought that the words omitted were of no importance. Several years had elapsed since the production of the despatch in question, and he did not think that much importance could be attached to the omission.

NAVAL PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, in reference to a notice in the Gazette of Friday the 27th ultimo, suspending payment of certain Naval Prize Money which has been due since 1857, and which has been recently advertised to be distributed, What is the cause of this further delay, and whether it is not due to the want of proper agents to take charge of the interest of the Captors?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that there had been no delay on the part of the Admiralty in the distribution of the Prize Money in question.

The Prize Money was delivered to the Admiralty for distribution on the 9th of December, and the Admiralty gave an order on February 19th for the distribution. In the interval, the Officers of the Niger claimed a share in the Prize Money. The matter now awaited the decision of the Court of Admiralty, and the Admiralty had suspended the distribution until the Court determined whether the claim of the Officers of the Niger was valid or not. The captors had agents in London, and likewise local agents on the spot to watch their interests.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, this Session, any measure for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that a Bill was in preparation on the subject.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would also beg to ask Mr. Solicitor General, If the Church Building Acts have been consolidated; and, if so, when Her Majesty's Government will introduce a Bill upon the subject?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in reply, said, that the Church Building Acts had been consolidated, and that he hoped to bring in a Bill before Easter.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE POOR LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is his intention to move for the reappointment of the Select Committee on the Administration of the Poor Laws; and, if so, whether he will defer the introduction of the Bill to continue the Poor Law Board until such Committee shall have reported to the House?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS, in reply, said, it was his intention to move for the reappointment of the Select Committee on the Administration of the Poor Laws. When the House demanded the appointment of that Committee, it appeared to desire that the result should be known before the usual Poor Law Board Renewal Bill was introduced. He should, therefore, in compliance with that desire, wait for the Report of the Committee before he brought in the Bill.

BRIDGE STREET.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, When the houses left standing on the south side of Bridge Street are to be entirely removed, and whether or not arrangements have been made with the tenants in possession for giving up their interests; if not, what is the course the Office of Works intend to pursue with regard to that portion of the property?

MR. COWPER, in reply, said, that all the houses on the south side of Bridge Street would be cleared away before the close of next year. All the houses had been purchased, and agreements had been made with all the tenants except two—one of them being the leaseholder of Fendall's Hotel. This lease would expire next year, but inasmuch as the Hotel was a place of great resort during the sitting of Parliament, he was unwilling to put the persons using it to inconvenience by having it pulled down until it was required for the public service. It seemed right not to impose upon the public funds the necessity of paying the large compensation which might be awarded by a jury if the compulsory powers of the Act were put in force in this case. He had therefore not thought it necessary to apply the powers of the Act to this particular tenement.

ENTRY OF THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA. QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, it appeared that the object of leaving the Lord Mayor and the City authorities at Temple Bar was to enable the procession to proceed at a rapid pace to Paddington. He wished, therefore, to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the desire of the Citizens of London to show all possible respect to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Denmark, and the wish of the public outside the City to see the full solemnity of the Procession next Saturday, arrangements will be made for the Lord Mayor and the City Procession to attend Her Royal Highness as far as Paddington?

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask, whether any provision has been made for Members of that House to join in the procession?

SIR GEORGE GREY:—Sir, it is the first time I have either heard or seen it stated that the procession is to proceed at a rapid rate from Temple Bar. I thought I had explained clearly on Friday night that the City authorities would take precedence to Temple Bar, and that they would then give place to the other local authorities, who had an equal right with the civic authorities to take precedence in their own district. The Lord Chamberlain, through whom the communications with the City have been chiefly carried on, has informed me that he has received a communication from the City authorities expressive of their satisfaction with the arrangements that have been made. They have been finally concluded with the concurrence of all the persons who, from their local connections, are entitled to take part in them. To make any change now in the arrangements would only introduce disorder and confusion. In answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Stacpoole), I have to say that no place has been assigned to this House in the procession. With the exception of the carriages forming the Royal cortège, only those will take part in the procession who, from their local position or jurisdiction, are fairly entitled to do so.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to know what arrangement had been made with the civic procession, and whether it was to go beyond Temple Bar?

SIR GEORGE GREY:—The civic authorities will not go beyond Temple Bar. Their place will then be taken by the other authorities, who will conduct the Royal party to Paddington.

MR. WALTER said, that many persons were anxious to obtain information as to the arrangements for passenger and other traffic through the streets on the night of the illumination. Would carriages be excluded from the streets on that night?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Carriages will not be excluded from the streets on the night of the illumination. I have communicated with the Chief Commissioner of Police, and he says he is endeavouring to make arrangements by which an open space will be kept in the centre of the street for carriages which may be conveying persons wishing to pass from one part of London to another, while on each side, where the street is wide enough, there will be a string of carriages containing persons wishing to see the illuminations. These two lines of carriages will be going, one in one direction and one in another.

Mr. C. P. Villiers

MR. PAULL said, he would beg to ask whether it is distinctly understood that the civic procession is to stop entirely at Temple Bar, or whether it will follow in the rear?

SIR GEORGE GREY: That must depend very much on the City authorities. There would be no objection to their following the procession, but I believe the Lord Mayor does not intend to do so. The Sheriffs of London, being also Sheriffs of Middlesex, will retain their place in the procession, and accompany it to Paddington.

MR. BUXTON said, he wished to know whether carriages and horsemen will be admitted into the park?

MR. COWPER said, it had been settled that only the Royal carriages would be allowed to pass in the centre of the Park between the lines of the Volunteers. It was expected that a large number of persons would be in the park on foot, and it would not be desirable to allow persons on horseback to ride on the grass with the exception of officers on duty with the Volunteers or persons immediately connected with the Royal procession.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I have just received information that an offer was made to the City authorities stating that they might follow the procession if they pleased from Temple Bar to Paddington. They replied, that if they could not precede it, they would go no further than Temple Bar.

EMIGRATION FROM THE COTTON DISTRICTS.—QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT said, he wished to know, Whether a statement made by a correspondent of The Times was correct, that sailing vessels were being prepared at Chatham for the purpose of conveying a large number of distressed operatives to the Australian Colonies at the expense of the Government?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I am not aware of any such intention on the part of the Government.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

TREASURE TROVE.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he rose to call attention to two Circulars addressed to the Chief Constable of the county of Hants, dated respectively, Whitehall, 27th of August, 1860, and Whitehall, 9th of January, 1861, on the subject of Treasure Trove. The first order required the police to put in force an antiquated and obsolete law, and the second order annulled the first, as not being the most convenient way of dealing with the matter, and concluded by a virtual promise that the public should receive full information as to the course the Government would pursue in regard to the question. Unfortunately, that promise had not been fulfilled. The noble Lord at the head of the Government himself did not exactly comprehend the law in regard to Treasure Trove, for he had appropriated an ancient British relic found on one of his estates.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was quite true that about two years ago some workmen, when digging a drain in a meadow on one of the farms he had bought a few years previously, found a torque, one of those ancient British ornaments of gold which were worn as necklace or bracelet. He got it back from the person who had purchased it from the man who discovered it, the value being about £8. He had an investigation made of the original grant of the farm several centuries ago, and ascertained that it conferred on the grantee all the Treasure Trove on the property. He therefore felt entitled to keep the relic in question, and his hon. Friend had, no doubt, seen it when exhibited in the South Kensington Museum.

MR. PEEL said, it was by no means an obsolete or absurd law that when an article of gold or silver, belonging to an unknown owner, was found, it should be held to be the property of the Crown. The rights of the Crown in that respect were not, however, rigidly enforced. The articles found were usually returned to the person who was declared to have the best claim to them, or, if they were of historical or antiquarian interest, they were deposited in the British Museum or some local collection, and their intrinsic value was paid to the finder or the person who had the best claim to the relic. What the Treasury desired was to obtain speedy information of the discovery of any treasure trove. The circular to which the hon. Baronet had alluded was issued some years ago, and was intended to instruct the finders of any treasures how to communicate with the Crown on the subject. That circular was subsequently withdrawn, because it laid claim to antiquities which were not exactly treasure trove and did not belong to the Crown, and because it directed a reference to the wrong tribunal in cases of disputes. The draught of another circular was prepared, but so many difficulties beset the subject that it was not deemed advisable to issue it. If occasion should arise for a new order, it would, of course, be made; but there appeared to be no necessity for one at present.

OBSOLETE VESSELS OF WAR.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. COBDEN: Sir, in accordance with the terms of the Notice which I have given, I beg—with the permission of the House—to offer a few words on the subject of the large number of obsolete vessels of war in the British navy, and also with reference to the conduct of our naval administration which has produced that state of things. In referring to this matter, I wish it to be understood that by the term “obsolete” I allude to the vessels which the circumstances of the times have rendered useless for the purposes of war. If it should be objected that such a Motion no longer raises any practical question, inasmuch as in Committee of Supply, sub silentio, but not without individual protest, a Vote has been passed enabling the Government to maintain 76,000 men for the navy of the year, I beg to say, in reply, that I do not acknowledge that Vote as necessarily final. It will be in the power of the House, if it think proper, on subsequent and more important stages of the measure, to review, and, if necessary, to reverse the Vote. After the remarkable utterances made by a Conservative Peer in another place, to which we must not more particularly allude, expressing disapprobation of the excessive number of men voted for the navy this year, I think it cannot be deemed improbable that this question will again come under the consideration of the House. Now, Sir, I will describe what I mean by the term obsolete ships of war. In the last Return of the Admiralty presented to this House with regard to the number of war vessels, it is stated that there are 558 wooden steam-vessels, of which 106 are either line-of-battle ships or large frigates constructed of wood, leaving nearly 450 of a smaller kind, ranging from corvettes to the smallest wooden ships, as well as gunboats. With this latter class of smaller vessels I do not propose to deal. Those vessels, although built of wood, and therefore liable to destruction from the combustible missiles which have rendered obsolete the larger ones, may and must be serviceable in barbarous and uncivilized regions, and may be used as a sort of police of the seas. Therefore, I beg it to be understood that my remarks apply strictly and exclusively to the 106 ships to which I have ventured to call the attention of the House. I may state that sixty-six of them are line-of-battle ships, and forty are large frigates. And when I speak of frigates, I should desire to explain to the House what I really mean by the term. Thirty-five of them are upwards of 2,000 tons, and fourteen upwards of 3,000 tons. Now, we all know that Nelson’s flag-ship, the Victory, was only 2,300 tons; so that these frigates average a larger tonnage than the vessel which Nelson commanded at Trafalgar. When I designate these 106 large wooden vessels as obsolete, I wish the House to understand that I do not merely speak on my own authority. I am not stating a fact which was before unknown. The truth is, the causes from which have arisen the belief that these vessels are no longer useful, are not of recent origin, but are some twenty years old. They sprang from a discovery on the part of an eminent French artilleryist, by which bomb-shells, which up to that time were projected only in parabolic motion through the air, falling at random anywhere, might be projected horizontally with all the precision of solid round shot. As it is necessary to fix opponents to the point at issue, I beg to say, that the wooden line-of-battle ships have been rendered obsolete, not by the adoption of the iron-clad gunboats or vessels of war. No doubt iron-clad impenetrable vessels of war have rendered these wooden ships additionally and conclusively useless; but they were objectionable and open to condemnation before ever an iron-cased gunboat went to sea. I remember—for I am an old scholar in these things, for which, indeed, I have no taste, but which have been forced on my attention—I remember, in 1849, sitting on a Committee to inquire into the Ordnance. Before that Committee Sir Thomas Hastings, then occupying an important position at the head of the gunnery establishment, stated, that in consequence of the adoption of those shells with horizontal motion, if we went into a sea-fight with twenty-five line-of-battle ships, instead of the action lasting ten hours, as such events used to do, it would more likely be over in ten minutes, and, instead of our coming out of it with all our ships, we should probably lose half of them. The American Government, having very little money to spend on the navy, have shown much more forethought than we have. They have never constructed a line-of-battle ship for the last twenty years. They abandoned these ships, not because iron vessels came into use, but because they found swift corvettes and such-like to be safer vessels than the large cumbrous three-deckers which offered so broad a target to the incendiary shells. We have also had two or three expressions of opinion on the subject from authorities at home, and I appeal to them because I am anxious not to depend solely on my own opinion. The hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis) speaking lately on this question, said that a shell now acted as a mine; it burst on passing through the side of a vessel, and would so shatter it that a wooden line-of-battle ship would be nothing better than a slaughter-house. Again, the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay) who is an authority in these matters, has told us of an experiment where shells were tried on an old brig—the Hussar—which was on fire at the twelfth round. It seems, then, that half a broadside sets a vessel in flames beyond the possibility of extinction. Such being the case, other countries, long before we took the hint, ceased to build large vessels of war. We have continued to build them, and we have now got the number on hand of which I have spoken. I do not under take to blame any one because we have got some line-of-battle ships in hand. Whenever a change takes place, we must experience some loss in a heavy residue of useless articles; but I have a great grievance to allege against the Admiralty of successive Governments for having left us with so enormous a number of useless and obsolete ships of war. I have therefore thought right to put this notice on the paper. With whom, then, does the fault lie? It is admitted on all hands to be a fault. Will any Gentleman of nautical experience, with a head on his shoulders and a reputation to care for, get up and tell me, that if these 106 large frigates and line-of-battle ships had not been in existence, one of them would now be regarded as a useful vessel of war? If nobody will venture to say so, we may safely conclude that these vessels are quite useless. If we had wooden vessels of war to oppose to wooden vessels of war, it might be said, "Other countries have got these line-of-battle ships, and it is therefore necessary that we should have them too;" but the introduction of iron-clad vessels, and especially of impenetrable gunboats, has rendered these line-of-battle ships, not only additionally useless, but actually a danger and a snare, because it is now frankly acknowledged that a single gunboat making its appearance is a sufficient justification for any number of these wooden vessels to take to their heels and run away. What has happened in America? A blockade established by these wooden vessels has been raised by one iron gunboat. Another iron vessel improvised for the occasion, made of railway iron, in one of the Southern ports, where the people are not apt in mechanical contrivances, suddenly made its appearance, and in almost a few minutes massacred the whole crew of one of the largest wooden frigates in the American navy—a ship larger, I believe, than any of our frigates. Nay, more, if another iron-clad vessel had not come to the rescue, it is the opinion of the best nautical authorities that that single iron-clad would have cleared the whole coast of Northern America of wooden vessels. If that be so, and nobody of authority on naval matters will gainsay it, what follows? We have 106 of these large wooden vessels, which in all former times would have been regarded as the very mainstay and strength of England, but which are now of no advantage to us, which gives us no strength as against a foreign enemy, and which, indeed, are actually a weakness and a danger. If we were at war to-morrow, I challenge any naval officer in this House or out of it to say that we would send any one or all of these large wooden ships to oppose a single iron-clad vessel that may now be possessed by France or the United States. Such being the case, it is quite clear that we are in a dilemma of a very serious kind, and one which calls for the consideration of every man who has the interests of his country at heart. How is it that we have arrived at this state of things? Is it because some new invention has suddenly surged up, taking us unawares, and leaving no choice to the Admiralty but to continue the manufacture of these large wooden ships? Quite the contrary. We have had warnings from all directions. We have had warnings from France and from America, and warning voices have been raised in our own country by the most eminent nautical men, all proclaiming for years that we were coming to this. I think it is honourable to naval men that they have so frankly declared the utter worthlessness of these large wooden ships of war, because, no doubt, the poetry and romance of the navy are thought to be associated with the quarter-decks of our line-of-battle ships. There appears at first sight, something less noble, less dignified in a Monitor or a Merrimac than in a line-of-battle ship. I am not disposed to agree with that. I think power, wherever it is—intellect, wherever it is—gives the real rank in the world; and I believe that the naval authorities, in abandoning the traditions of the old wooden ships and espousing the cause of Captain Coles's cupola ship and other inventions, not only show true patriotism, but take a wise view even of their own interests as professional men. According to the estimate of Mr. Scott Russell, who ought to know, we have probably spent during the last eight years about £30,000,000 in the material of a wooden navy that is now quite useless. I take the 106 ships I have spoken of as having cost, with their contingents, £20,000,000. I will not say the Admiralty is accountable for the whole of this £20,000,000, but I firmly believe that the naval administration is fairly responsible for the loss of £10,000,000 of it. I believe £10,000,000 has been wasted in the construction of large wooden vessels since other countries have known, and our own Government ought to have known, that these line-of-battle ships would be useless. With whom must the blame rest? I think it should be divided between the two sides of the House, or, at all events, the two front benches, for I hope the other benches will be able to absolve themselves from responsibility. I go back to the time when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) was First Lord of the Admiralty, in 1859. He began what he called a reconstruction of the navy. It was no reconstruction of the navy. It was the conversion of great wooden line-of-battle ships into screw vessels, after other countries had abandoned these constructions, and I venture to say that the right hon. Gentleman was aware of that circumstance. I hold in my hand a paper of a very curious kind, which I wonder has not attracted more attention in this House. It is now somewhat out of date. It is the Report of a Committee appointed by the Treasury to inquire into the Navy Estimates from 1852 to 1858, and into the comparative state of the navies of England and France. That Report arose in this way. The Earl of Derby's Government came into power in 1858. They had left office in 1852. In the interval a Whig Government under various heads had held the reins of power. The Earl of Derby's Government, looking back on those six years, saw that there had been a very great waste of labour and capital in our dockyards. It was, no doubt, thought, and it really was, a good party move to bring out a Report of the proceedings of the Admiralty and the naval administration during those six years. Such is the nature of the document that I hold in my hand. There is, first, a Minute of the 1st of December, 1858, which appoints a committee of gentlemen in the Treasury to draw up an account of the expenditure on our navy during the six years from 1852 to 1858, and on the French navy, as far as they could, for the same time. It was a review, in fact, of the doings of the opposite party in naval administration for six years; and we are likely, under these circumstances, to get more of the truth than when a Government appoint a committee to inquire into their own doings. The minute under which the committee was appointed is signed "D." I do not know what that "D." stands for. There were two D.'s in the Treasury at the time, and both were men quite competent to appreciate the value of such a document as that I have here. I must premise that this Report was in the hands of the Government at the time when the right hon. Baronet brought forward the Navy Estimates in February, 1859; but it was not delivered to the House of Commons till the following April. Now, the whole tendency of the Report is this:—It shows, what it was the object of the able man who signed himself "D." to show, that during the six years from 1852 to 1858 there had been great maladministration in the English naval department, and that there had been comparatively great economy and judgment displayed in the French marine.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to ask him when that paper was presented to Parliament?

MR. COBDEN: I will tell the right hon. Baronet all about it. The Minute is dated December 1, 1858. The right hon. Gentleman brought forward his Navy Estimates in February, 1859, and this paper was "ordered to be printed by the House of Commons" on the 4th of April in the same year. It was not in the hands of the Members of the House when the right hon. Baronet brought forward his Estimates. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman, in some way or other, mistook his case altogether. He had a brief put into his hands to indict certain parties, and he commenced by making an attack upon other parties. In bringing forward his scheme for the reconstruction of the navy he alarmed the country with an outcry that the French were making great and undue preparations in their naval department. This Report, so far from justifying that, shows that in the number of seamen the English navy was scarcely ever so strong in proportion to the French as it was then. All that it states is that the French Government had been engaged in very prudently converting their sailing vessels into screw line-of-battle ships, whereas, we had been all the time building screw line-of-battle ships, and leaving our sailing vessels to rot in the docks. I may add, parenthetically, as bearing on matters of which I can promise that you will hear more before the Session is over—I may remind the House that between 1850 and 1852 began the system of converting sailing vessels into screw line-of-battle ships. It was acknowledged about the year 1850 that sailing line-of-battle ships would no longer be of any use, and from that time to 1859 the process had been going on of converting sailing line-of-battle ships into screws. And this Report, I repeat, says that while the English Government had been wasting their money in building new wooden line-of-battle ships in order to put screws into them, the French had been more wisely changing their sailing vessels into screws. But there is nothing in this Report which warranted the right hon. Gentleman in getting up in this House in 1859 and raising a panic as he did by declaring that the French Government were engaged in making undue naval preparations. More than that, I say that the able man whose initial "D." is appended to this document never could have contemplated any such use as that being made of it. But there are other things that go to show that our Admiralty, which is an old offender, has wasted the public money. In this Report some tables are given that are most eloquent in themselves, and the few figures that I will read are exceedingly instructive. Here is an account of the number of English and French sailing vessels in the years 1852 and 1858. In 1852 the British Government had 299 sailing vessels, and in 1858 it had 296, showing a reduction in six years of only 3. The French in 1852 had 258 sailing vessels, and 144 in 1858, thus having diminished in six years their number of ships by 114. The reason for this difference was, that the French were converting their sailing vessels into screws, and our Admiralty were allowing good sailing vessels to rot in ordinary while they were building new vessels, in order to put steam-engines into them. But here is another table, still more instructive. These figures are very eloquent; it is an account of the English and French vessels of all kinds, both sailing ships and steamers, in 1852 and 1858. In 1852 the British had 476 sailing vessels and steamers, and in 1858 they had 760, being an increase of 285 in six years. The French in 1852 had 380 sailing vessels and steamers of all kinds, and 408 in 1858, being an increase in six years of only 28. France had been, as I before said, converting her sailing ships into steamers. Well, what is the conclusion drawn by the framers of this Report? Why, they recommend that the English Government should follow the wise example of the French. And the right hon. Gentleman himself—I will do him this credit—in bringing forward his Navy Estimates, so far improved upon the mismanagement of those who went before him that he did commence converting nine sailing line-of-battle ships that had been left apparently to rot by his predecessors. He also began the construction of iron-clad vessels by ordering the Warrior to be built; but I am not sure that that will help his case, because at the very time he was laying down iron-clad vessels, he entered frantically upon this career of converting large wooden line-of-battle ships, and that certainly diminishes the justification which one might otherwise offer for him. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech on that occasion, said the French were making undue preparations in respect of line-of-battle ships; but in the Report from which I have read there is just the very opposite statement. The two assertions are so completely at variance that I should like to hear the right hon. Gentleman's own explanation on this point. It is of advantage that we should have these matters brought out face to face; and I should like to know how, with this passage of this Report in his hands, the right hon. Gentleman could have raised the cry of French aggression, and stated that France was making undue preparations in the construction of line-of-battle ships. Here is an extract from the Report—

"So convinced do naval men seem to be in France of the irresistible qualities of these iron-clad ships that they are of opinion that no more ships of the line will be laid down, and that in ten years that class of vessels will have become obsolete." The Report adds that "No line-of-battle ship had been laid down since 1856 in France, and there had not been a single three-decker on the stocks since that year."

Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman and the Admiralty had fair warning from their own officials of what France was doing. I must say that since reading that Report it has always been to me utterly incomprehensible how, with that statement in his hands, he should have made that speech in 1859, exciting so much panic here and out of doors. I was not in Parliament when the right hon. Gentleman brought forward the Navy Estimates. I was in America. When I came home and found myself a Member of this House, I took this Report, which then lay waiting for me, but which the right hon. Gentleman may have forgotten, as others seem to have done; and the very first time I had an opportunity of speaking in this House—namely, about the month of June, I brought this document out, and I said, "Why, it proved the very opposite of what you stated in introducing your Navy Estimates." And here it is, bearing just the same interpretation now, but landing us in this dilemma, that the steps taken by the right hon. Gentleman have led, no doubt, to a waste of £10,000,000 sterling; and even that amount, I fear, is much under the mark. Well, if I turn from the right hon. Gentleman opposite to my noble Friend the present Secretary to the Admiralty, I am almost puzzled to understand which is the worse case. My noble Friend has been my teacher in this matter of naval architecture. I drew inspiration from him, ay, as long as six years ago. I remember his speeches, how admirable for their forethought, their intelligence, their perfect knowledge of his profession. But now what an absence there is of such utterances as we had from him in 1857! I will read some of them, that the House may mark the difference. I am not much addicted to troubling the House with extracts, but I want to show authority for the course I wish to see taken on this subject, and I appeal for that purpose from the Secretary of the Admiralty of 1863 to the Lord Clarence Paget of 1857. Speaking on the 18th of May, 1857, the noble Lord said—

"All his own experience went to show that line-of-battle ships were not now so important an arm in war as they formerly were. Formerly line-of-battle ships carried heavier guns than other ships; but now every corvette, sloop, and gunboat carried heavy guns, and he was convinced that no force of large ships could withstand the legion of gunboats, sloops, and corvettes which they saw at Spithead last year." [3 Hansard, cxlv. 438.]

Again, he recurred to the subject in the same speech, and said—

"In his opinion line-of-battle ships were not the instruments by which in future the fate of empires would be decided." [3 Hansard, cxlv. 439.]

He added that—

"Napoleon had observed, that if he could only command the Channel for forty-eight hours, he would subjugate this country. He might, however, come to our shores at the present day with seventy or eighty ships of the line, and yet not be enabled to effect a landing in the face of that noble fleet of small vessels which the First Lord of the Admiralty had given within the last few years."

Again, on the 12th of April, 1858, the noble Lord reiterated the same opinions with even still greater confidence. He said—

"He believed it to be the opinion of the navy that it would be wise to pause in the construction of these enormous vessels. That opinion was gaining ground in this country, and much more was it gaining ground in France. He had been lately at Paris, and had had conversations with French officers on the subject; and, whatever reports the late First Lord of the Admiralty might have heard respecting the French navy, he could give him positive information, that so far from there being any activity in building large ships, they were waiting to see what would be done in this country. He was persuaded, and it was the general opinion of the naval profession, that line-of-battle ships were not destined to play an important part in future naval wars. It was believed that these ships would be superseded in the line-of-battle, and more particularly in attacking forts, by ships with one tier of heavy guns, and their sides cased with iron. He believed with the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Southwark (Sir Charles Napier) that in ten years three-deckers would be unknown, being cut down into single-deck ships; and, holding that opinion, he thought it was a wasteful expenditure of the public money to go on year by year, constructing that class of vessels." [3 Hansard, cxlviii. 930.]

That was the noble Lord when out of office; and, really, when I think of what he was and what he is, it confirms me in the conviction I have long entertained of the great risk men run in taking seats upon the Treasury bench. Who can say that he would be proof against the contagion, or that he would remain free from that obliviousness of all his past opinions and declarations which a place on that bench seems calculated to engender? The noble Lord came into office as Secretary to the Admiralty in the spring of 1859, taking that office on the retirement of the Earl of Derby's Administration. I cannot make my noble Friend responsible for the first Estimates he administered to as Secretary to the Admiralty, because they had been practically framed and passed under the auspices of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington); but my noble Friend brought forward the Estimates in 1860; and he must have had considerable pain and suffering of mind when he had to recount to the House what had been done the previous year under his auspices. He stated that in the previous year the Admiralty had built 19,730 tons of ships of-the-line, and 13,654 tons in frigates, besides converting four sailing line-of-battle ships and five sailing frigates into screw steamers. There can be no doubt—indeed, I give the noble Lord some credit for having had considerable pangs and twinges of conscience when administering to that amount of mischief. But my noble Friend was now in office, and had got hardened, as I believe they do when they remain on the Treasury bench. How did he feel when he proposed the Estimates for the next year? I was in France at the time; but when I read his speech I was glad, out of my regard for him, that I was not in the House to hear him bring forward such Estimates. In proposing, in 1860, his Estimates for the following year, he said he proposed to build 13,216 tons of ships-of-the-line and 13,500 tons of frigates, besides converting four sailing line-of-battle ships and four sailing frigates into screw steamers. He expressed his hope to be able to add to the navy in the ensuing financial year eight line-of-battle ships and twelve frigates. This was proposed by the noble Lord, who only two years before had told the Government not to waste any more money on these enormous ships, that they had had their day, and would no longer play their part in the fate of empires; and he altogether forgot the 140 or 150 gunboats which he had ready to protect our shores. He proposed this enormous waste—I call it so on his own authority—to the House, which of course sanctioned it. In bringing forward the Navy Estimates on the 11th of March, 1861, my noble Friend recapitulated what he had been doing—

"We have expended during the present year, or at least shall have expended by the end of the month, no less than 80,000 loads of timber—more than double the ordinary rate of consumption. We have built during this year 9,075 tons of line-of-battle ships, 12,189 tons of frigates, 4,138 tons of corvettes, 6,387 tons of sloops, 1,409 tons of gun and despatch vessels, and 102 tons of gunboats—making a total of 33,290 tons." [3 Hansard, cxli. 1745-7.]

At a subsequent stage of the discussion he showed that we had 17 line-of-battle ships more than all the rest of the world. "We have," he said, "67 line-of-battle ships built or building. France has 37, Spain 3, Russia 9, and Italy 1—making 50." And he exclaimed with much nécessité, "So far as large vessels are concerned, we are in a very satisfactory position," making 50 for all the world against 67 of our own. I may say that the Duke of Somerset, speaking on the 1st of May, 1860, made this very remarkable statement—

"During the last eight months more men have been employed in our dockyards than at any previous period of the history of the country. I do not exclude the time of the great war down to 1815; and in this statement I exclude the factories altogether, which form another great division of our naval establishments. I speak of the ship-building department only."

I venture to say, looking at the results of that expenditure, looking to the consumption of 80,000 loads of timber in the year, and the employment of so large a number of artificers and men in our dockyards; knowing what every one knew, the tendency to improvement in naval construction—knowing what every one knew of the effects of the shell guns, and knowing as the Government ought to have known the great and absolute risk attending these large wooden vessels, I do not think the history of this country can produce a parallel case of such enormous—I might almost say, profligate—waste of public treasure as is recorded in these transactions. What ought to follow such a state of things? Practically, I know there is no responsibility. My noble Friend is in no danger, nor is the right hon. Baronet opposite in any danger. Tower Hill is abolished, and we have no secondary punishment for Ministers. There is not even a penitentiary; but I think what I have said—the reproduction in so concise a form of what the noble Lord and the right hon. Baronet have contributed to—must tend to produce some remorse in their minds; and what I should hope is this, that they will make a clean breast of it; that my noble Friend, at least, who, since he has been at the Admiralty, has been administering to a state of things altogether contrary, we know, to his judgment, and one which he, with his enlightened knowledge of these things, utterly condemns—that my noble Friend will tell us, with that frankness which becomes his profession, what it is in the constitution of the Admiralty Board that leads the noble Lord, with all his capacity, to administer blindly to a state of things like this, and, with his recorded opinions, to come to the House and ask us to sanction this enormous waste of public money. We know that he has not changed those opinions, but that he has been confirmed more and more in what he before told us. But we can do nothing with statesmen who, if dissatisfaction be shown to them, are most likely to be promoted and receive fresh honours. What is the House then to do with the matter? What is the first deduction it must draw from these facts? Let us resolve that we will never again let ourselves be frightened to do this kind of thing in consequence of the alleged preparations of a foreign Power. This has all been done because the right hon. Baronet, in 1859, chose to throw himself into a panic by a reference to the preparations of the French Government, and because the noble Lord the First Minister has always been keeping the country in a panic on this subject. Never again let the House for a moment be led away by such a representation. It were a useless recapitulation except for the future; but what has been the course pursued by the noble Lord? We have been told year after year, by the noble Lord, that the French were making immense preparations to rival us at sea; and when my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish), my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir M. Peto), and others in this House took the trouble to go over to France and visit the dockyards there, in order to bring back the strong assurance that the noble Lord's alarms were groundless, the noble Lord only reiterated more and more his vague and undefined assertions for raising continued excitement and alarm. So late as the 11th of March, 1861, when one of my hon. Friends of whom I have just spoken had taken the pains to show that all he had seen in France demonstrated that the noble Lord's surmises were entirely groundless, the noble Lord at the head of the Government jumps up and says, "Really, Sir, it is shutting one's eyes to notorious facts to go on contending that the policy of France—of which I certainly do not complain—has not for a great length of time been to get up a navy which shall be equal, if not superior to our own." Why, the facts—not French facts, but our own—now demonstrate conclusively that there was not the shadow of a foundation for the noble Lord's alarm. I will give those facts in a concise form, we know that line-of-battle ships have been the sole test of power with maritime nations up to the present time. Well, the French were accused by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington), in 1859, and by the noble Lord the Prime Minister always of making undue preparations to rival us at sea in line-of-battle ships. What are the facts? In 1857 the First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Charles Wood), stated that the French had forty screw line-of-battle ships built and building, while my noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty told us in 1861 they had thirty-seven—three fewer in that year than in 1857. We all know now that the panic got up on these stories—which nobody will repeat now, but which have been current for some time past—that the French were making undue preparations for war, were entirely unfounded; and if the noble Lord rises to-night to say a word on this subject, I warn him that the time is past for those vague generalities, under which we are told by an old law maxim fraud lurks. He must deal with the facts and figures I have given. What, then, is the House to do? First of all, then, we must never again allow ourselves to be put into a state of hurry or alarm. We must take warning by what has been done with those wooden line-of-battle ships and not again allow the Admiralty to frighten us with a story of a raw-head-and-bloody-bones somewhere, into permitting wooden ships to be cased with iron, when we know that we had better wait for a few months to have ships constructed entirely of iron. We must do more. I have said there are 106 large useless vessels, and I challenge any naval authority to show that they are not useless. What is to be done with them? What number of those vessels have we in commission? I believe we have about forty-seven in commission, and I have formed an estimate as far as I could of the number of men that are probably employed on board those vessels, or in the contingents ashore necessary to be kept up for manning those ships, and I am sure I am very much under the mark when I say that there are 30,000 seamen employed in those useless ships of war. Let it again be understood that these ships are not merely useless, but they would be positively dangerous to you if employed in time of war. I venture to say that a great inventor of artillery, like Mr. Whitworth, would desire nothing more than that an enemy should give him such a target as a wooden line-of-battle ship or huge frigate with 800, 1,000, or even 1,200 men on board—the vessel being composed of combustible material, with that number of men crowded into the smallest possible amount of space, and with thirty or forty tons of gunpowder under their feet. What artillerist could desire anything better than that an enemy should place himself in such a position to be destroyed? You know that all this is true. Can it be for the advantage of the country that we should keep 30,000 men in these useless vessels? Our ships of war existed for purposes of war; but if war broke out, could we employ one of those great wooden ships? I say you would not dare to send those wooden ships to the coast of America if we were at war there. But that is not all. Your security, your honour, your vital interests are bound up in this question. Is it fair to your naval officers and seamen that they should be placed in such a position, that they must be doomed to certain destruction in performing their duty, or must accept the dishonourable alternative of retreating before the enemy? I am not so technically informed as to be able to speak of my own knowledge, but I speak always from good authority, and I am told that the drill, the discipline, and experience which sailors are getting on board these line-of-battle ships is not such as to qualify them for the duties they would have to perform in case of war in another class of ships. In no point of view can I see that it is for the interest of the country that these enormous ships should be kept manned in this way. If they are useless, if they are dangerous, then, is there not the financial aspect of the question to be considered? Is the country in such a state as to be inclined to look on calmly and contentedly while this House is worse than wasting millions of money, expending it in a manner which imperils our honour and our safety? Will that meet the approbation of the country, and is not something more due to our constituents? We have heard what a noble Lord, a Conservative Peer, who has been First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, and is well versed in nautical matters, in another place has said. I have read that noble Lord's speeches upon other occasions, and although upon no other subject should we be likely to agree, yet upon nautical questions I have perceived that that noble Lord always speaks with the frankness of a sailor, and with a good deal of the sagacity of a statesman. After that noble Lord has declared that we have voted an excessive number of men, I put it to my hon. Friends around me, could we have a more severe rebuke administered to us? We are called, par excellence, the Reform party, and sometimes the party of financial reform. We represent generally the trading and manufacturing interests as contrasted with the territorial interests which are supposed to be represented by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. We know something of the arduous care and prudence, the due regard to ways and means which are necessary to our constituents, to enable them to apply their industry, and to compete with the rest of the world in the various pursuits in which they are engaged. Economy and frugality and a due attention to the various changes taking place in the mechanical and scientific world are among the first element of their success. Are we then doing justice to such constituents when we allow a Government calling itself a Reform Government and one of retrenchment to bring forward a Vote of 76,000 men, when it is demonstrated that they cannot be employed except with great danger to the country, and when we hear that Vote condemned by a representative of the higher orders of the aristocracy? What can come of such a state of things? Will not these facts sink into the hearts of the rank and file of the £10 householders, the industrious and struggling class which constitutes the strength of our electoral body? Are you not ashamed of it, as a mere question of statesmanship? I say that a statesman who pursues such a policy—who says he will have 76,000 men—that he will not reason or argue about the number, but would have 76,000 men because we had as many the year before—I say such a statesman must be as obsolete and as unseasonable as the wooden vessels themselves. I will make an appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite. You represent the territorial interest, and it is generally attributed to you that you have rather a desire to keep up these great establishments. It is generally attributed to you that you like to see the services well sustained; but can it be for your interest, can it be for the interest of any body so largely responsible as you are for the good government of the country—and I warn you that you have worse times to come than you have at present—can it be your interest to maintain such a state of things? I am not speaking now in the spirit of one bearing hostility to the navy. Liberal politicians have always avowed an attachment to the navy as contradistinguished from the army. We have no traditions hostile to the navy, which has never been employed by the Government for repressive purposes in internal struggles in this country. I say now, as I have said before, I would vote any sum to make these islands invulnerable by sea, but I shall never recognise the necessity of defending the country inland by means of fortifications. Can any party in this House wish to continue such enormous waste of money? Understand me, I do not mean to say that every one of these forty-six large vessels should be at once put out of commission. I know that is impracticable, but what I do say is that, under all the circumstances, I consider the proposal of a Vote of 76,000 men—a large proportion of whom are to be employed, as it is demonstrated they must be employed, if at all, in this useless manner—to make no reduction in this large Vote, is I think an insult and an outrage upon the common sense of the country. I appeal to both sides of the House, even yet before this measure passes into law, to reconsider the matter, taking into consideration the condition of the country, and the facts and merits of the question, and I think you will find that, with due regard to the honour and security of the country, and advantage to the best interests of the State, you can make a considerable reduction in the number of men which has been proposed to you for the service of the year.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that while he agreed with much that the hon. Member had said, he must, he confessed, allow that the issue which had been put before the House was very indistinct, because the hon. Member had varied it from time to time during his speech. The issue which he had at first put before the House (and again at the end of his speech) was that the number of men which had been voted (76,000) was far too large. He had argued that, on the ground that iron ships required fewer men to man them, while iron ships were the only efficient ships in war. But it would be a very courageous Government who would determine to maintain only iron ships, and sweep away every wooden ship from the navy. They had but eleven iron ships, and was that number sufficient to protect all their shores—to defend the colonies—to cruise in enemy's waters—to chase their merchant ships and make prizes? Would they even be sufficient for the service of the Thames and Severn alone? In such an issue he could not agree. Soon, however, the hon. Member changed the issue; it then became a party matter; the question then was, which side of the House should be most blamed? and he asserted that hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side, represented the territorial interest and encouraged a lavish expenditure. That taunt he (Lord R. Montagu) must retort on the hon. Member. Was the hon. Member ever present in Committee of Supply? Did they ever there obtain his support when they sought to reduce the expenditure? What was the appearance of the House on those occasions? They saw opposite to them (except on the Ministerial Benches themselves) nothing but empty seats and the green cloth shining in the gaslight. When did hon. Members ever bring forward financial Motions from the opposite side of the House? except, indeed, the Motion of the hon. Member for Halifax, last year, on which he made a speech, forsooth, to encourage lavish expenditure and a system of intervention in other countries. And when they on that side of the House had brought forward financial Motions, did they ever gain from hon. Members below the gangway opposite that support which they might have calculated upon in fulfilment of all their profuse promises? From that issue, also, he professed his dissent. The next issue, however, was the true one. The hon. Member desired that when they built ships, they should construct them after a full investigation of all the latest improvements which science had furnished. Last year he had moved for a Return of the inventions which had been sent in to the Admiralty, with the dates when they had been sent in; when they had been examined and reported upon, and the nature of that report. His object was to have in evidence that which every one knew—namely, that inventions were allowed to remain, among the dusty archives of the Admiralty, unexamined, and unattended to; while only the usual, formal, official answer was returned to the inventor. His object had been defeated by the mode in which that Return had been made. The hon. Member for Rochdale had alluded to Captain Coles' cupola ships, and said that the Government, in adopting them, had "shown a true patriotism." But what was the true state of the case? Captain Coles made this invention in the year 1854. It had been favourably reported upon by the Committee in the Black Sea; and recommended to the immediate attention of the Government; yet, even then, it had been laid aside and neglected, until the achievements of the Monitor, in 1862, had terrified the country and called the invention into remembrance. The fact was, that the Admiralty were always slow in taking advantage of the various inventions and improvements which might have been made. When screws were invented, they were instantly adopted by the whole merchant navy, but were for many years utterly neglected by the Admiralty; until, at last, the matter was so severely pressed upon them, that they were forced to convert many ships into screw ships. There was then a reconstruction of the navy. A few years afterwards, another reconstruction of the navy was commenced by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich. He had to do that, because his predecessors had neglected it; and therefore the hon. Member for Rochdale should not have blamed him for the expenditure which necessarily resulted. There ought to be another reconstruction, not of the navy, but of the Admiralty itself; for the Admiralty not only laid by many inventions which they received, but they also adopted others without previous trial. Thus, until after the Warrior had been launched, no experiments were made on Warrior targets. When these experiments were made, it was discovered that the plan of "tonguing and grooving" was a bad way of laying on the iron plates; so that an additional expense of £10,000 or £12,000 became necessary on each ship, to perform the required alteration. Those experiments ought to have been made beforehand, and then much outlay would have been saved. The very constitution of the Admiralty was bad. It consisted of Lords, a Controller, and a Secretary, the jurisdiction of whom was so ill-defined that it was impossible to know where the jurisdiction of one began, and that of another ended. The Lords were guided by the Controller; and yet the Controller was under the Lords. The Secretary was under both; and yet the Secretary, in Parliament, overruled both Lords and Controller; and each escaped censure by transferring it to the back of his brother. There was another improvement which had been urged by Admiral Elliott, in his evidence before the Admiralty Committee, in 1860—namely, that there should be appointed a school of ship-builders, trained in the science of naval architecture; a body of scientific men to stand between the Government—who knew nothing of naval architecture, and were by no means scientific—and the body of contractors with whom the Government dealt, and who possessed both these qualifications. Before he sat down, he wished to allude to the alleged decrease in the Naval Estimates. That decrease was made chiefly on the Store Vote. Yet, to prove how illusory was this decrease, he would quote the evidence of the head of the Admiralty, the Duke of Somerset, before the Committee of Public Accounts, last year. It was then proved that—

"Parliament pressed the Government to cut down the Navy Estimates, and the Vote that first goes is generally the Store Vote. But although the Vote for the quantity in store is reduced, the expenditure is very apt to go on very much the same; so that the result of that cutting down is simply to run upon the reserve for a time. . . . In fact, as matters stand at present, the House of Commons may very easily deceive itself with the idea that it is effecting economy when, in fact, there is no economy being practised, but only the stock being run down."

MR. LINDSAY said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord with regard to the position of the masters of the Royal Navy. In 1846 an Order in Council was passed recommending that masters should be promoted for distinguished services. During the Russian war their services were of great value in conducting the fleet through the difficult navigation of the Baltic and the Sea of Azov; but not a single master was raised to the rank of commander. He did not ask any increase of pay for these gentlemen, but he did think that officers who had served their country so faithfully and so well should have some improvement in position and in rank. One suggestion was, to abolish the grade of master, and require every officer to qualify himself for the rank of captain by four years' practical experience in navigation. However that might be, he hoped the noble Lord would do something for the masters of the Royal Navy.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, in answer to my hon. Friend, I may say that the Admiralty are perfectly aware of the great merits of the masters of the Royal Navy. Various schemes have been put before the Department and considered with a view to improve their position, and the whole matter was gone through lately with great care. Among other proposals, as my hon. Friend says, was one to do away with the grade of master, and to merge these officers into commanders and lieutenants. But we found that there was a general feeling adverse to this alteration, and under these circumstances the Admiralty have under consideration a scheme which will not be many weeks before it is out, and which, without doing away with the grade of master, will put these officers into a position commensurate with the honourable and responsible duties which they have to perform. I now turn to the remarks which fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale. I am prepared for an annual scolding from him. It generally comes in the month of June. This year it has come earlier; but the season itself is somewhat earlier. My hon. Friend has spoken of the opinions which I hold. The opinions I hold are those which I have always held. For a great many years I have been of opinion that line-of-battle ships are not vessels destined to play any great part in any future war; and I have stated that opinion in this House. My hon. Friend now takes me to task because, holding that opinion, I am a Member of a Government which has gone on with the construction of line-of-battle ships. Now, let me state, in passing, that my hon. Friend is utterly and entirely mistaken in his views as to what has been done by the Government in covering wooden ships with plate armour. The present Government have originated nothing except the five ships—iron-cased wooden ships—of the Royal Oak class, one of which we hope will be ready for sea next month. Those are the only ships which would come under the hon. Member's description, and I admit that they were laid down for line-of-battle ships, but before they had made any considerable progress Her Majesty's present Government thought it right that they should be adapted to carry armour-plates, with the view of giving the country an additional number of armour-clad vessels without so heavy an additional expense as we should otherwise have had to incur. I have been trying to discover in the striking speech of my hon. Friend—for every speech he makes in this House is always thrilling and striking—any recommendation as to how we should improve matters; but I have been trying in vain. Does he want us to reduce the number of men? After going into a statement of the number of iron-plated ships and obsolete ships of the line now in the British navy, he said he did not know what to advise; but then he added, "Reduce your men." He says we might reduce the number of our men because we had 30,000 men in ships which we could not dare to take into action. This broad statement of my hon. Friend was listened to with some surprise in this House, and, no doubt, it will attract considerable attention out of doors; and I would ask him to be a little more careful before he does make such statements. I understand the doctrine of my hon. Friend and of a noble Lord in another place to be this:—That our iron-plated ships will not require so many men as the ordinary ships of war; but my hon. Friend is mistaken in supposing that we have 30,000 men shut up in the large vessels to which he referred. The number in first-rates is 1,086; in second-rates, 5,790; in third-rates, 2,300—giving a total of 9,176, instead of 30,000. And I can tell the House this, that whether you have armour-plated ships or ships of another description, the number of men in the navy will be very little affected, because the great mass of your men are employed in small ships on distant stations, protecting your colonies and looking after your commerce, and therefore what you have in those heavy ships is really a very small portion of the whole number of men employed. But my hon. Friend says, "Why do you not take the example of the Americans?" Now, Sir, if my hon. Friend knows America as well as he professes to know it, he ought to be perfectly well aware that the Americans were the very last to take up the armour-plated vessels. Instead of being an example to us, the United States resisted the armour-plated vessels; and it was not till they saw that the South were building them that the Northern States commenced to adopt them. It has been said that the Americans never built line-of-battle ships; but they built frigates which were line-of-battle ships in disguise. These ships were called frigates, and the object of so styling them was, that in case of war against, say, this country, the Americans might be in a position to say that one of these frigates had been able to cope with a British line-of-battle ship. That was what they said in former wars—it is an old story. It is not my business to defend the Government in which my right hon. Friend opposite (Sir John Pakington) was at the head of the Admiralty; but I think it right to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) that he is under an erroneous impression when he says the Committee of 1858 did not recommend the construction of large ships. My hon. Friend says that Committee told you the French were doing nothing, that there was no necessity for exertion on your part, and that if the Government had taken up the Report of that Committee, and acted on it, they would not have put the country to expense. Now, here is a paragraph in that Report, which states—

"It will be seen that France, since 1852, has increased her steam line-of-battle ships from two to forty, of which there are five building and four converting, and that this has been effected by the conversion of twenty-six sailing ships and the building of fourteen screw ships. England in the same time has increased her line-of-battle screw steamers from seventeen to fifty, of which there are ten building and seven converting. This has been effected by the conversion of twenty-seven sailing ships, and the building of twenty-three as screw ships."

From that statement it appears, that while France had increased the number of her line-of-battle ships from two to forty, England had increased hers from seventeen to fifty. I ask, is not that a statement which would justify any Government in undertaking the construction of large ships? But the next paragraph states—

"The addition, therefore, to the French navy in steam line-of-battle ships, complete, building, and converting, is thirty-eight, and of England thirty-three, since 1852. France has at present four iron-sided ships (frégates blindées) in course of construction, as before stated. The steam frigates of France, screw and paddle, have been increased from twenty-one to forty-six; and England has increased her steam frigates, screw and paddle, from twenty-three to thirty-four, and her block-ships of sixty guns each from four to nine. It is necessary that we should notice this superiority in steam frigates on the part of France over Great Britain, which, in the event of hostilities, might form a serious detriment to this country, especially in relation to the interruption of commerce."

I say that any Ministry who did not act on that statement, and did not at once set about putting the country in the position she ought to occupy in respect of her navy, would deserve to be sent to the Tower or to that Penitentiary into which my hon. Friend wants to put me. I maintain, therefore, that the Government of that day, as well as the present Government, were right in making great exertions towards putting the navy in an efficient state. As to what my hon. Friend has said on the subject of our delay in the adoption of iron-plated vessels, I must remind him that I came down to the House for several years in succession, and lifted my voice in favour of armour-plated vessels; but all that time my hon. Friend was silent. However, I do not hesitate to assert that the course taken by the Government, whether the late Government or the present, has on the whole been the wisest that could have been adopted for the safety of the country. My hon. Friend says that periodical panics occur by which Parliament is frightened out of its propriety, and that, after all, they turn out to be bugbears. If that is the case, why did not hon. Members who now object to what the Government has been doing within the last few years come down to the House and ask for a yearly statement of the stocks in hand and the vessels which the Admiralty were building? Until I took the liberty of laying on the table an annual statement of your property in ships, and of what you were building, there was, as far as I am aware, no detailed information on these points supplied to the House. Why did not my hon. Friend come down and ask how we stood? We never should have had those panics if this statement had been put upon the table, because I believe the country would not have been allowed to be so behind-hand as she was in the construction of ships. My hon. Friend has asked the House to reconsider the question of the number of men. Now, for many years we were in a state of alarm as to the manning of our navy. We had ships in our ports month after month waiting for men, and my right hon. Friend opposite, only three years ago, was obliged to come down to this House and propose to offer what to men in the position of sailors is almost a small fortune—a £10 bounty; and now, having got them together, it would be a most unwise thing to disperse them again. The men we have now are almost all continuous service men; and if you were to break faith with them by listening to the startling suggestion of my hon. Friend, depend upon it you would never get them back again. The noble Lord the Member for Huntingdon (Lord R. Montagu) says that the present Government are not making any experiments with a view to getting the best armour-plates. If he had turned round to my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Sir J. Hay), he would have told him that we are spending very large sums of money in such experiments. Therefore it is not a just charge to make against the Government. I sincerely trust that the House will not depart from the Estimates which we have laid before them. It may be possible, in course of time, to reduce our force by not filling up vacancies as they occur, but now that we have for the first time got a standing navy, suddenly to make a great reduction in it I am positive would be a most suicidal step.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON:—Sir, I am sure that the House will grant me its indulgence for a few moments while I make a reply to a most unexpected attack which has been made upon me by the hon. Member for Rochdale. I came down to the House this evening expecting to hear one of those verbal duels between the two ends of the united party opposite to which we are so much accustomed; but I had no reason to suppose that I was myself to be made the subject of attack. [Mr. COBDEN: Oh, oh!] I know of no reason for the murmurs of the hon. Gentleman opposite. I say, I came down to the House quite unaware that my administration of the Admiralty—which terminated four years ago—was in its details to be made the subject of a very violent attack by the hon. Member for Rochdale, and that without notice of any kind. If the hon. Member for Rochdale had given me the slightest notice that he was going to make any reference to my administration, I might have had an opportunity of looking at the papers, which would have refreshed my memory.

MR. COBDEN:—I beg to remind the right hon. Baronet that on the last occasion when the affairs of the navy were being discussed I wrote him a letter to tell him that I wished him to be in his place, as I intended to take notice of matters in which he was concerned.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON:—That is perfectly true, and it is also true that that last occasion was last Session. I never before heard such an answer. In the course of the Session of 1862 the hon. Member wrote to me to say that he would bring forward the subject of the navy, and that in so doing he would refer to my administration. I ask, whether that is any explanation of his having now made an attack upon my administration without any notice to me beyond that included in the terms of his notice, from which I could not infer more than that he was going to refer to the Navy Estimates of this year, and to the conduct of the present administration. I heard, I must confess, with some surprise the speech of my noble Friend opposite (Lord C. Paget), in which he said that the hon. Member for Rochdale had made an "admirable speech." I cannot share in paying that compliment to the hon. Member. He has gained a great and well-merited reputation—but having heard him speak last Session, and also this Session, upon naval affairs, I must say, that if I might venture to offer him advice, it would be that in future he should avoid the subject altogether. I never have heard the hon. Member address the House on naval matters, including the occasion on which he delivered his "admirable speech," as my noble Friend calls it, without being reminded of the words of the well-known song—

"'Tis a pity when charming women

Talk of things that they don't understand."

I think these words apply remarkably to the hon. Member's speeches upon the navy. My immediate object, however, in rising, is to repel the attack which the hon. Member has made personally upon me, and I have no hesitation in saying that unless it be a charge against the administration of my Colleagues and myself that we did not know in 1858-9 that which was not known to anybody until several years afterwards—unless that be a charge, I am free to say, and I put it to the House, whether the hon. Member has made any single reference to me that is not utterly erroneous and founded in complete misconception. In order to make his attack more pungent, the hon. Member revived an expression which really I hoped was done with in this House. He charged me with having boasted that I had “reconstructed the navy,” and then he proceeded to attack the mode in which I carried out that reconstruction. I beg, however, to assure the hon. Member that I never used that expression of reconstructing the navy. As far as my recollection goes, that expression occurred in the Queen’s Speech in 1859, and I admit that, as a Member of the Cabinet, I was responsible for a share of composing that Speech. But that was not the sense in which the hon. Member brought the phrase forward to-night; he brought it forward as a personal matter to embitter his charge of maladministration of the navy, and wanted to make out that I had made a boast, which I never made, that I had “reconstructed the navy.” I repeat again that I never made any such boast, and in the discharge of my duty in this House I always endeavoured not to speak in a boastful spirit. The hon. Member says that successive Governments—referring, of course, to the Government which preceded the last—committed a great absurdity in going on building the obsolete class of wooden vessels. How did he support that argument? I cannot suppose that he meant anything so unjust and absurd as to charge the Government of the Earl of Derby with building or launching wooden vessels simply because we did not know what nobody then knew—because it was subsequently discovered—that this class of vessels would be subsequently superseded by the discovery of iron ships; and therefore the only way in which I can explain the meaning of his accusation is by what he said on the subject of the improvement which had taken place in the construction of shells. But does he really mean gravely to argue in this House that the navy of England was to be withdrawn from the seas because an improvement had taken place in the construction of shells? His argument really amounts to this:—Shells have been improved, and to such a point that they will set wooden ships on fire; therefore, the navy of England ought to have no wooden ships afloat. But at that time nobody had any idea of any other but wooden ships; we still talked of the “wooden walls of Old England;” armour ships had not yet been tried, and therefore to say that we ought not to have gone on sending wooden ships to sea is a charge so unfounded that I do not believe it will receive any support either in this House or out of it. The next charge which the hon. Gentleman brought against us is equally unfounded, and I put it broadly to the hon. Gentleman that he has no right to make such charges unless he has really taken some trouble to inform himself on the subject. He referred to the Treasury Minute to which the noble Lord has also referred. The hon. Member said that the drawing up of that Minute by the Earl of Derby’s Government was a very good party move. I repudiate the charge, and I say that a charge more unfounded was never made in this House. At the time the Committee was appointed which drew up that Minute it was a Secret Committee. It was appointed as a mere matter of detail; it was a departmental committee, solely appointed to draw up a report for the instruction of the Government. Under these circumstances I found it my duty, in considering the state of the navy in 1858-9, and I proposed to the Cabinet, that we should have a very large addition to the amount of the Votes to be brought forward for 1859. It was the feeling of the Cabinet that we should not be justified in calling upon Parliament to vote Navy Estimates which were of an almost unprecedented character for a time of peace without the clearest grounds for doing so. In the arduous position of First Lord of the Admiralty I had no time to make inquiry and to draw up the papers which were required, but it was the opinion of the Earl of Derby’s Government that inquiry had better be made into the whole of the circumstances. A paper was drawn up by a Committee solely for the guidance of the Government, and I can state broadly to the House that it was never intended that paper should go beyond the Cabinet which ordered its composition. There was not slightest intention of making it a Parliamentary paper or of making it public, and I ask whether the hon. Gentleman is justified now in saying that it was a good party move? Since the hon. Gentleman has spoken, I have been able, by the assistance of a friend, to refer to Hansard, and I can explain to the House how it ultimately became a public paper. It was in consequence of one of those Motions which my noble Friend the present Secretary to the Admiralty was in the habit of making when he sat on this side of the House, and which may account perhaps for the seat he now occupies. On the 11th March, 1859, my noble Friend brought forward a Motion, and to his speech it was necessary for me to reply—

"Impressed," I said, "with the deep sense of our responsibility in the proposals which it has become my duty to submit for the increase of the navy, and impressed with the conviction that the House had a right to expect the fullest possible explanations of the rapid increase of late years of the expenditure for the navy, Her Majesty's Government thought it desirable to appoint a confidential Committee, consisting of certain Members of the Government, in order to investigate what were the causes of that great increase." [3 Hansard, cliiii. 51.]

The fact of my using that language very naturally led to the remark from some hon. Member that I had referred to a paper which was not in the possession of the House. I immediately said that I had no objection to make that paper public; and under those circumstances, and those circumstances only, was that memorandum published, which was made solely for the guidance of the Government; and, so far from being made as a party move or with a party object, was made without any idea that it would ever be laid on the table of the House.

The hon. Gentleman accused the late Admiralty, as he did the present Admiralty, of building screw line-of-battle ships, and leaving sailing vessels to rot. Twice has he used that expression, and in the interval between the two occasions he has been guilty of the inconsistency of referring to a number of instances since the year 1850—under the Administration of the present Secretary of State for India, then First Lord of the Admiralty, under the Earl of Derby's Government, and under the Administration of the present First Lord—of sailing vessels being converted into screw ships. The two statements are perfectly inconsistent, because if we were converting sailing vessels into screw ships, we were not leaving the sailing ships to rot. We were doing no such thing, and it is one of those misstatements of which the hon. Gentleman's speeches on naval affairs are uniformly full. Under the Earl of Derby's Administration it was our constant and anxious desire to find out what sailing ships there were which were good enough to be converted. [Sir CHARLES WOOD: And which were of proper shape.] As my right hon. Friend opposite reminds me, it would have been waste of money to convert many old ships; but where the ships were sound enough, and where the shape was good enough, I believe, under his Administration, and most certainly under mine, those ships were converted into screw ships. The hon. Gentleman then went on to refer to the statement which I made and the plan which I proposed in 1859, and he used the expression that I began "frantically" building line-of-battle ships. Here he has been led into a positive misstatement of fact. I have had time to refer to the facts, and I confess that when I first heard him make use of the expression I was under the impression, that when I was First Lord, I had not ordered any new line-of-battle ship to be laid down, but I find that I did. In 1858 there were three laid down, but the House will recollect that in the year 1858 line-of-battle ships were the navy of England, and that armour-plated ships had scarcely been thought of. In March, 1859, the Bulwark was laid down, but that was the only new line-of-battle ship which was laid down. The hon. Gentleman then went on to say that this step of mine had led to the waste of £10,000,000. My experience in this House is not very short, and I think in the whole course of it I never heard so wild or so untenable an assertion. I really do not know what it means. The hon. Gentleman says this step of mine—the frantically building ships which I did not build and which I never ordered the building of—has led to the waste of £10,000,000. By whom and in what manner? I am afraid the hon. Gentleman is in this position, that he has rashly and lightly made charges which are utterly unfounded, and which he has no means whatever of substantiating. What were the circumstances under which I brought forward the Navy Estimates of 1859? Here again, no thanks to the hon. Gentleman, sufficient time has elapsed to send for a volume of Hansard. Perhaps the House will allow me to read a short extract from my speech of that year—

"I have shown to the Committee, that while France is nearly upon an equality with us in line-of-battle ships, she now very decidedly exceeds us in frigates. When we discovered our inferiority, the Government felt, and I believe the Committee also will feel, that we really had no option but to endeavour as soon as possible to redress that inseriority. Therefore, the plan which the Government asks you to enable them to carry out is this." [3 Hansard, clii. 909.]

I then stated the details of the plan. The easiest kind of wisdom is to be wise after the event. It is very easy in 1863 to blame men for not knowing in 1859 what we know in 1863. In 1859 England had never heard of an armour-plated ship. The wisest men only spoke of it as an experiment, the success of which was wholly uncertain. But, when we felt it our bounden duty to make that anxious experiment, what were the terms in which I asked the House of Commons to consent to an expenditure for that purpose of £700,000? I said, "I shall not conceal from the Committee that they will be the most costly ships ever built for the British navy." There was no misleading the House in that—

"But still, assuming, as I have no doubt, that our plans will receive the sanction of Parliament, we have resolved to lose no time in building two of these vessels (the Warrior and the Black Prince). I am bound to say, also, that we feel it no less our duty to throw away no chance whatever in endeavouring to make these ships as effective as possible."

Such were the spirit and tone in which, in the year 1859, I asked the House to try the experiment of spending £700,000 on two armour-plated ships. But I felt it was an experiment. I felt that no living man could tell us whether the Warrior and Black Prince would be fit to go to sea when they were built. But when that experiment has been successful, when it is found that these ships can go to sea, to come down and blame the Government who made the proposal as an experiment, and, while it was uncertain, neglected nothing to maintain the wooden navy equal to what we possessed in former years, and adequate for the grandeur of the country, is ungenerous and unworthy of an hon. Gentleman with the high reputation which attaches to the hon. Member for Rochdale. I am confident that, be he who he may and sit where he may, every hon. Member is anxious to maintain the power of England; and I feel as confidently as ever that the power of England and the naval power of England are convertible terms; and I say that any Government would be deeply to blame who neglected means within their power to keep the naval power of England in a state of efficiency. The hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by appealing to my noble Friend and myself as to whether we did not feel remorse at what we have done. I hope I may never live to feel remorse for anything greater than that which the hon. Gentleman supposes I ought to do for the part which I took as a Member of the Earl of Derby's Government in strengthening the navy of England. I feel pride in what I did. We may have made mistakes, but we threw away no care, we spared no pains, we took bold steps, we made bold proposals, and happily, though the result was uncertain at the moment, those proposals have turned out successfully. I am free to say, therefore, as far as I am concerned, that a more unfounded attack was never made than that to which I was exposed by the hon. Gentleman to-night, and, instead of feeling remorse, as long as I live I shall reflect with pride and satisfaction on the part I took in 1858-9.

SIR MORTON PETO said, in the few remarks he had to address he should rather refer to the future than to the past, for that was the question really before the House. Some of the main points in the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale had received no reply. His hon. Friend had stated that there were in the navy 66 line-of-battle ships and 40 large frigates, making in all 106 vessels. Now, the question they had to consider was the policy of keeping that large number of vessels in commission in the present state of naval architecture, when not one of them could be matched against an iron-plated adversary. The must also look to the question as it affected the number of seamen in the service of the country—the fact being that iron-plated ships did not require nearly so many men to work them and their guns as wooden vessels. The number of seamen voted that year by the House was 76,000 men. There were, in addition, 14,000 naval reserve force, 8,000 coast volunteers, and 8,000 coast guards, making a total of 106,000 men. He put it to the House, whether that number of men was not out of all proportion with the requirements of the country under the altered aspect of naval warfare. There were only 65,000 seamen during the Crimean war, with a very small reserve. The Naval Commission only recommended a naval force of 56,000 men to be kept on foot, with a reserve of 30,000. They had now 46 ships in commission which carried 2,600 guns. On the average 12 men were required to work each gun, which represented a force of 31,200 men, so that his hon. Friend was not far wrong in the number of men who he said were now employed in these ships. The right hon. Baronet said that in 1859 England had no idea of such a thing as an armour-plated ship; but the very Minute which had been drawn up for the information of Lord Derby's Government referred to the irresistible qualities which iron-clads, then in course of construction in France, were stated to possess.

SIR JOHN PAKINTON: I said that in 1858 England had no idea of armour-plated vessels; but I myself proposed the construction of two in 1859.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he was strongly of opinion that they ought to pause before they proceeded much farther. The Warrior, the Black Prince, and the Resistance had been referred to with satisfaction; but the Warrior had already shown some defects. It had been stated in an intelligent Report that the bolts of the Warrior and Black Prince, which fastened the armour plating, became loose. Therefore, they would hardly be justified in proceeding further without an extensive and careful trial. Mechanical engineers had foreseen from the beginning, that if you placed on the outside an 18-inch wooden backing, and on this 4½ or 5-inch iron plates, and simply fastened them with screws driven through the backing, the whole weight would hang on the screws, and that these screws would be likely to get loosened whenever a strain came on the vessels so constructed. The experiments which had been made proved the accuracy of that opinion. He had no doubt that the problem as to the best mode of fastening these plates might be solved so as to make the iron-plating as rigid as any other part of the vessel. An important report of Admiral Robinson, as to the comparative value of iron and wooden ships, had been placed in the hands of Government that morning, and he hoped that hon. Members would consider it with attention. The noble Lord at the head of the Government gave a pledge that the House should have ample time to discuss the question; and considering the apprehensions justly entertained in consequence of the experiments already made, he hoped that full time for consideration would be given.

MR. BENTINCK said, he did not propose to take any part in the triangular duel between the hon. Member for Rochdale, his noble and gallant Friend opposite, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich. He could not join in the landation which his noble and gallant Friend had passed on the speech of the hon. Member for Rochdale, for he must say that his noble and gallant Friend and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich had very much the best of the argument. The hon. Member for Rochdale was apparently driving at one object, that of inducing the House to reduce the number of men already voted. But he had been unable to detect any tenable arguments in favour of his suggestions, and it had been shown that his charges were perfectly unfounded. He could not agree with the hon. Member in thinking that any argument for reducing the number of seamen was to be found in any forethought shown by the Northern States of America, which appeared to be within a few months, not to say a few weeks, of a national bankruptcy. The hon. Member added that the Admiralty was an old offender, and that he objected to the constitution of the Board. It was very remarkable that that question had been again and again brought before the House, and yet this was the first time the hon. Member for Rochdale had uplifted his voice against the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. The hon. Gentleman refrained from making any attack when it might have been effective. The hon. Member charged his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) with having led to a waste of £10,000,000, which, by a singular coincidence, was about the sum the hon. Gentleman had been assisting his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in wasting during the last five or six years. Some hon. Members opposite had given the House the result of their observations in regard to what was going on in the French dockyards. He also had visited all the French dockyards, and he defied any one to see what was going on there without feeling that any Government in this country that neglected to maintain the English navy in the highest state of efficiency would deserve to be sent to Tower Hill. The hon. Member complained that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had told the House that the state of the French navy was such as to render it incumbent on the House of Commons to vote money in order to place the navy of this country in a more efficient state. But that speech of the noble Viscount's was re-echoed not only by that House but by the country; and if anything had contributed to what he would call the well-deserved popularity of the noble Viscount, it was his determination to maintain the naval defences of the country. The hon. Member for Rochdale complained that the Admiralty were maintaining 30,000 men in useless ships. The Secretary to the Admiralty had swept away that argument to the extent of two-thirds, by showing that only 9,000 sailors were employed in the class of ships alluded to. Did the hon. Member mean that these 9,000 men were to be dismissed the service until the Admiralty had got iron-sheathed vessels in which to employ all the men voted in the Estimates? Did he propose that until that time arrived they were to have no ships on foreign stations, and take no thought for the protection of our foreign commerce? Or did the hon. Member think that he could make a sailor in a day, or a month, or a year? Would he cut them adrift because he had not got iron ships to put them into; and then, when the ships were ready, would he expect to get them back again? That was the baneful system of which the hon. Member and his friends were the promoters. He would dismiss seamen to-day, and then, when he wanted them to-morrow, they would cost him twelve times as much. The hon. Member's cry for economy always came a day after the fair, for he never warned the country against the extravagance of the Administration until the Estimates had been voted. The hon. Member, then, resorting to his old platform rhetoric, asked if they were doing justice to their constituents by voting these large sums. But had it ever occurred to the hon. Member that the very existence of British commerce was dependent on the supremacy of the British navy? The hon. Member was quite mistaken in supposing that hon. Gentlemen connected with the agricultural districts were intent on maintaining taxation at the highest possible point. On the contrary, there was no class who would more gladly join him in diminishing the expenditure, if it could be done without impairing the efficiency of the national services. But the worst of all economy was that which was always reducing to-day in order to increase to-morrow. It was because they dreaded the economy which the hon. Gentleman recommended, and looked upon it as a source of extravagance, that they deprecated his suggestions. The hon. Member for Finsbury had stated that the number of men employed in the Crimean war was much less than the number of men now employed, including the Naval Reserve. But he (Mr. Bentinck) differed entirely from the hon. Baronet in the conclusion which he would draw from that circumstance. For what would have been the consequence had they had the same number of men employed during the Crimean war that they have now? If they could at that time have manned such a fleet as they could now, the Russian war would have been brought to an end in three months without the loss of a man. Did hon. Members doubt the fact? If, instead of playing with blockades, they had really blockaded the Russian ports, Russia could not have attempted to continue the war. The sham blockade which they carried on during the Crimean war was worth £26,000,000 sterling to Russia, and, in point of fact, left her the means by which she was enabled to carry on the war. The number of our sailors, therefore, so far from being a source of extravagance, was a true economy. Assuming that the object of the hon. Member for Rochdale was to induce the House to reverse the Vote as to the number of seamen to be furnished to the navy, he trusted the House would not listen to any such suggestion, for, in his opinion, it would be not only unwise, unjust, and unpopular, but a wasteful expenditure of the public money.

MR. C. BERKELEY said, that he sincerely hoped the Government would not be induced to diminish the number of men, as it was his opinion that the number voted was not greater than necessary. The hon. Member for Rochdale was quite mistaken in stating that there were 30,000 employed in useless wooden ships. The facts were these:—There were fourteen line-of-battle ships, with an average number of 800 men—making, in all, 11,200. Then there were nine block ships, but the whole of them, he believed, with short complements, not exceeding 400 men each, which would make a total of 3,600 in those ships. Then there were twenty-three frigates, with an average crew of 300 each, making 6,900. Therefore, the total number of men employed in those forty-six vessels was about 21,700, not including the crews of iron vessels.

tion made by the hon. Member for Rochdale, I do not deny that in 1859 I proposed a considerable increase in the Estimates, but that was principally for the completion of ships already in progress.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, I wish to make a few observations before this debate comes to a close. I cannot help thinking that the hon. Member for Rochdale has made certain assumptions in which he was not warranted by the state of our navy for many years past. The House and the country must be perfectly well aware that the navy has for many years been in a complete state of transition. Changes have been made not only in the construction of our ships but in the mode of propelling and arming them, and so rapidly have these changes followed one after the other that before one set of vessels were completed some alterations and improvements have been introduced which rendered it necessary to build others of a different kind. It is not so many years since the main part of our steam navy consisted of paddle-wheel vessels. A large sum of money was expended upon them. A few years afterwards, when the screw was introduced, it was equally necessary to expend a large sum of money in order to create a screw navy, and the sum was larger, because the screw was applicable to large vessels. A screw fleet, therefore, superseded, to a great extent, the paddle-wheel steamers of our old navy. I do not agree with the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) in what he said about blockading the Russian ports. For we did blockade the Russian ports in the early part of the Crimean war. At many of our commercial ports there were not vessels of war to protect our trade against Russian cruisers: but the fleet we had in the Sound prevented Russian vessels from coming out, and was a great deal better employed and afforded much more effectual protection than if it had been scattered here and there. But the circumstances of the Russian war rendered it necessary to build a description of vessels, gun vessels, gun boats, and mortar boats, which did not before exist, and during the greater part of the time that I was First Lord we were engaged in building those vessels. In the three years during which I had the honour to be First Lord we added to the fleet of England twenty line-of-battle ships and frigates, and 230 corvettes and small vessels, including eight iron-plated floating batteries and about 100 mortar-boats. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington), when he came to the Admiralty, set about converting such wooden line-of-battle ships as were fit into screw vessels. I do not believe there was a single vessel converted which was not fit for conversion, and surely it would have been a waste of money to convert vessels which were not of a shape advantageous for conversion. Now, the French line-of-battle ships were far better adapted for conversion than our own. The question of armour-plated ships was a moot question at the time. We had built eight floating batteries and before building any more vessels for iron plates, we were trying experiments with targets to ascertain the strength of the iron plating that would be required. Towards the end of 1857 we had come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to build vessels of this kind, and I had an estimate in the winter of 1857-8 prepared for building an iron-plated ship in 1858. In the spring of 1858 a change of Government took place, and I cannot pretend to say why that was not done; but, as had been truly stated, in the next year further experiments were made, which led to the then Government taking a large Vote for the construction of the Warrior and the Black Prince. With reference to the number of ships of what the hon. Member for Stockport called the useless class of large vessels, and the number of men engaged for them, which he stated at about 40,000, I have only to observe that on the 1st of February there were thirteen line-of-battle ships in commission and their crews amounted to 9,176. Another statement had been made, to the effect that some iron-plated vessels had come in from sea with the armour-plates shaken and hanging loosely about. The fact was directly the reverse, for the armour was not shaken at all, and any one of the vessels was fit to go to any part of the world. I am anxious to make this statement, because the contrary representation was calculated to produce a false impression in reference to the character of armour-plated vessels.

MR. LAIRD said, he rejoiced to hear the contradiction given by the right hon. Gentleman to the report respecting the armour-plated vessels. It was satisfactory to hear that those ships had proved themselves able to stand all weathers. An important paper respecting the cost of iron and wooden ships, signed by Admiral Robinson, had just been presented to the House, and he hoped a renewal of the pledge from the noble Lord at the head of the Government would be given that a special day should be set apart for the discussion of the question respecting the building of wooden vessels.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the pledge given on that subject by his noble Friend would be strictly adhered to. No steps would be taken in the matter until that House had an opportunity of expressing an opinion in reference to it; but if the proposition of the Government to build certain wooden vessels were not sanctioned, a considerable Vote would be necessary for iron armour-plated vessels.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(1.) £433,298, New Works, Improvements, &c.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the Parliamentary paper signed by Admiral Robinson, cast a most extraordinary reflection on the contract iron shipbuilders of this country. He had no hesitation in saying that the ships turned out by private builders in this country were an honour to the country, and reflected the greatest credit upon themselves. The reflection cast upon them had raised a suspicion in his mind that the Government were going to establish a large plant in the dockyards to displace with private shipbuilding. If that were done, the works would cost them more than at present, and they would not get such good ships. He wished to ask for an explanation of the item for new machinery. He also would draw attention to the Vote for naval barracks, and ask why it was thought desirable to have their seamen in barracks instead of afloat in vessels, as had been hitherto the custom.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET stated, that the item in the Vote was for hydraulic machinery for bending armour plates, and other machinery for sawing and other processes in the progress of shipbuilding. There was no intention at the present time to create another establishment beyond that which existed at Chatham. He need not apologize to the Committee for bringing forward a Vote for the construction of naval barracks, because, if there were one thing more than another which had been acknowledged to be of immense importance, it was the getting rid of the old hulks, and the housing of the men comfortably on shore, where they would be when their services were required.

COLONEL SYKES said, he observed a charge in the Votes for gas machinery, and also charges for gas; for instance, at Chatham it cost £900. It was recommended that the Government should make their own gas, and he should be glad to know if that recommendation would be carried into effect?

MR. JACKSON was understood to say, that he hoped the Government would not go to the expense of erecting works for the purpose of making their own gas for every dockyard.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, the vitality of the navy depended on the Government having proper docks and basins, and he should like to learn what the Government proposed to do in that respect. Last year they were told that Chatham dockyard would be enlarged, and that it would require a sum of about £1,000,000 to complete the works. The Government now proposed to take the small sum of £22,000, and at that rate the docks would be ready in about fifty years. The country had only one dock that would take in ships of the Warrior class, and he felt anxious that something more should be done. They had not sufficient dock room in time of peace, and in time of war there would be a positive deficiency.

MR. WHITE remarked, that he saw for the first time in the Votes a sum of £9,160 for a new establishment on the coast of China, namely, at Kowloon, and he should be glad to hear some explanation in regard to it.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would call attention to the new docks at Bermuda and Gibraltar, and should be glad to receive an explanation in regard to them.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Government were making considerable progress in the construction of docks, and at the end of the year they would have four docks capable of receiving ships of the Warrior class. The reason why so small a sum was taken for Chatham was that it was all that could be expended during the year. The necessary preliminary works were now being pushed on with all despatch, and next year the Government would no doubt be able to ask for and to spend a much larger sum. When the work was completed, the basin at Chatham would be the largest in existence, and would have an extent of eighty-two acres. The Government had found it more economical to manufacture there own gas, and they adopted that course at all places where they could not obtain it from public companies at reasonable prices. The Government asked that year for no further Vote for works at Bermuda; but if the war in America continued, and they had to keep a large squadron there, it would be absolutely necessary to construct a dock. All that it was at present proposed to do at Gibraltar, was to carry out the superstructure of the mole to the length of the foundations, about 600 feet. Many persons thought that it would be desirable to extend it to a length of 1,000 feet, in order that very long vessels might lie alongside it to coal. The establishment at Kowloon was intended for a coaling station. The situation was, owing to the depth of water, admirably adapted for that purpose. Admiral Sir James Hope, who had lately returned from his glorious campaign in China, had very strongly pressed upon the Government that the completion of the work ought not to be delayed.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask for an explanation of an item of £8,000 for the breakwater at Plymouth.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that during the last few years the breakwater had given way, and it had been necessary to undertake very considerable works for "towing" it.

MR. ADDINGTON wished to know whether the dockyard at Malta was capable of admitting vessels of the Warrior class.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he had just returned from Malta, and he could take it upon himself to assure the Committee that they might safely grant the sum required for that dock. Up to that time Malta possessed no dock capable of containing any ship but of the smallest possible class and when lightened of her burden. During the Crimean war there were no means of repairing their first-class ships at Malta, but they had to be brought home. The scheme of the Governor, which had been adopted by the Admiralty, would give a dock for one ship of the Warrior class, with a suitable fitting basin attached to it; and it would, at the same time, restore the best part of Malta harbour, which would be large and deep enough for the Mediterranean fleet, on an emergency, to rendezvous in.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, he had been informed that officers on the spot were dissatisfied with that work, and that they complained in particular that it was not less than two miles from the Government dockyard at Malta. He was glad, however, that a large dock was being constructed at Malta, because he had heard that the French were building at Marseilles one of a very extensive character, capable of taking in the largest ships in all states of the tide.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, there certainly was some difference of opinion amongst officers at Malta with respect to the site of the Dock. The colonial Government had agreed to give up for the accommodation of men-of-war a part of the harbour called the French Creek, which was surrounded with houses, and in order to construct a dock there it would be necessary to purchase those houses, at considerable expense, while the creek itself was so shallow that it would require to be deepened considerably before a man-of-war could enter it. It was, however, convenient to the dockyard, and a dock made there would be very convenient for the purposes of the navy. The construction of such a dock would at the same time, for the reasons which he had just indicated, occasion great delay and expense, and the Government of Malta had under the circumstances proposed to contribute a certain sum towards the construction of a large dock, capable of containing vessels of the Warrior class, at the head of the grand harbour, which was not two miles, but only half a mile, from the dockyard. It had, therefore, been deemed the wiser course to proceed at once with the building of a dock at the head of the grand harbour, but afterwards the French Creek would no doubt be found available for the purpose, if it were deemed expedient to make it so. There would be no difficulty, he might add, in rendering the site at present chosen capable of admitting ships of the largest class.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, he wished to know whether the amount of the sum to be contributed by the Maltese Government was to be made contingent on the site selected, and also what would be the depth of water in the new dock when built?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Maltese Government would not contribute.

unless the particular site in question were chosen. There would, he was happy to say, be ample water in the dock, the depth being some twenty seven feet or twenty eight feet over the sill.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER wished to ask how it was that the Maltese Government had agreed to contribute to the construction of a dock which could not in the slightest degree tend to the advantage of the commerce of the island? If he were told that the Maltese Council had consented to disburse a certain sum for the purpose, he would simply observe that the elected members of the Council were in a minority, the majority being composed of official persons.

MR. LAIRD said, he thought it would be well that it should be ascertained beforehand that the dock would possess the necessary depth of water.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, there was every reason to be satisfied that such would be the case. It was quite true that the Maltese Government was to contribute a portion of the cost of the new harbour works, but these works would be a great benefit, not merely to the navy but to the general trade of the port, which, he was glad to say, was increasing every day.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the Maltese Government agreed to pay a portion of the expense, in order to induce the Imperial Government to undertake the dredging of the new anchorage-ground, which was very much wanted.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought the people of Malta had made a very good bargain, as the improvements in the harbour would bring them a great deal of business.

MR. LINDSAY suggested, that instead of housing the naval reserve in barracks, they should be placed on board of some of the wooden ships which were lying idle, and that a number of the officers, for whom there was such difficulty in finding employment, should be attached to these vessels.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following:—

(2.) £66,000, Medicines and Medical Stores.

(3.) £99,370, Naval Miscellaneous Services.

(4.) £719,341, Half-Pay, &c.

(5.) £483,105, Military Pensions and Allowances.

(6.) £194,932, Civil Pensions and Allowances.

(7.) £270,150, Freight of Ships.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

COMMITTEE DEFERRED.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that clauses had been prepared for insertion in the Bill, giving a drawback on the exportation of manufactured tobacco, so as to return to the pockets of the manufacturers as nearly as possible the amount originally paid in duty. He also desired to give notice, so that there might be no misunderstanding, that he intended to ask for a Committee on the Customs Acts, on the following day, in order to introduce into the Tobacco Duties Bill a certain regulation with respect to the duty upon leaf tobacco which contained less than 10 per cent of moisture. In order to establish the system of drawback which he contemplated, and which would be constructed with reference to the quantity of moisture in tobacco, it was necessary for the protection both of the trade and the revenue to prevent the importation of tobacco in a very dry state. He should therefore on the following day, in Committee, propose a Resolution to the effect that the duty on unmanufactured tobacco imported into Great Britain, if containing less than 10 per cent. of moisture, should be 3s. 6d. per pound, instead of 3s. and 10 per cent.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to take into consideration one important point—namely, the ingredients introduced into cavendish and negro-head tobacco? He was informed that the foreign manufacturer was allowed to introduce a quantity of saccharine matter and spirits into the tobacco, which rendered it more agreeable to the consumer, whereas at present the English manufacturer was not allowed to do so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Bill would establish a perfect equality, and the English manufacturer would, therefore, be allowed to introduce the sweetening ingredients in question.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

MALT DUTY BILL.—[BILL 37.]

COMMITTEE.—REPORT.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Credit for Payment of a Portion of Excise Duty on Malt extended).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had to move an Amendment on the power given by the Bill to postpone the payment of the malt duty. As the Bill stood it gave the power of postponing a moiety of the duty on malt made between the 1st January and 16th January. He proposed to let that power stand, and to add words giving power to postpone the whole of the duty on malt made between the 1st April and 16th May.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

The other Clauses were also agreed to,

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

[BILL 22.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Transfer of Trust and Joint Accounts, and Accounts of Minors).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry not to see the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) in his place, because that hon. Gentleman had given notice of two Amendments—one limiting the operation of Clause 1, relating to minors' accounts, to cases where there was an intention to close a savings bank; and the other empowering the trustees of savings banks about to be closed to compensate their officers out of surplus funds. He was prepared to agree to the second Amendment, but he could not accept the first, and he hoped the hon. Member would take an opportunity of moving the recommittal of the Bill for the purpose of bringing the question under consideration. Meanwhile, he had himself two Amendments to propose, the object of which was to take securities against any possibility of abuse, and to insure, that while they gave a free power of transfer of minors' and trustees' accounts between the Post Office savings banks and the old savings-banks, the withdrawal of the money should still continue subject to all the restraints now in force. He would, therefore, move the addition of the following words:—

"But in the case of minors, the money so transferred shall not be withdrawn, except with the consent of the Postmaster General, or of any two trustees or managers of the savings bank to which the transfer is made, until the minor shall have attained the age at which it might have been withdrawn under the rules of the savings bank from which it was transferred, a note whereof shall be made on the said certificate."

MR. HENLEY said, he was afraid the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not satisfy the hon. Member for Evesham.

MR. AYRTON said, that what the hon. Member for Evesham wanted was that the conditions upon which the money of minors was now invested in savings banks should be strictly and literally performed. As the Bill stood, the danger was that third parties would seek a transfer to one of the Post Office savings banks for the purpose of getting the money out on easier conditions; thus, perhaps, defeating the object for which the money was originally deposited.

In answer to MR. HIBBERT,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that the conditions for the withdrawal of money standing upon trust and joint accounts were now laid down by statute, and the Postmaster General took them all over upon himself. The Postmaster General was surrounded by officers fully competent to apply the provisions of the general law to each particular case. With regard to the case of minors, he was prepared to render it obligatory that a note should be made on transfer certificates in those cases where the money of minors could not be withdrawn till the minors reached a certain age.

Motion agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (On Closing of Savings Banks, Funds, &c., to be paid over to Commissioners).

MR. AYRTON said, that in the absence of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby), he had to move the addition of a proviso—

"That trustees of savings banks which are desirous of closing shall have power to compensate their officers out of any separate surplus fund that may belong to any such savings banks, with the consent of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt."

Proviso inserted.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Warrant to be laid before Parliament).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as soon as the system was well on its legs, he proposed to bring it under the review of the House by moving an annual Vote for the expense of carrying it out, and it would be the business of the House to see that the receipts and expenditure were so nearly balanced that the public was not unduly burdened. He believed that the system would turn out to be entirely self-supporting.

Clause agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had to move a new clause, enacting—

(Appointment of Managers to sign Transfer Certificates.)

"That the trustees of any savings bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, may appoint any number of managers to sign transfer certificates; and that the signatures of any two of such managers to a transfer certificate should be a sufficient authority to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to transfer the amount set forth in such certificate; provided that a list of such managers, with their signatures, certified by two trustees, should have been previously deposited with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt."

In some cases the number of trustees of savings banks had been reduced to as few as three, and it was inconvenient to require transfer certificates to be signed by two of that number. That difficulty would be obviated by enabling trustees to empower certain managers to sign the certificates. The trustees would remain responsible for the signatures of the managers they might depute.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that such a clause would be attended with inconvenience, inasmuch as it would allow the trustees to run themselves out. He was of opinion that it would be better to compel the trustees, when they were reduced to a very few, to increase their number. If out of three trustees remaining two of them were to die, he was at a loss to know what was to become of the management.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman was no doubt an important one, but it was one that more properly belonged to the general question of the old savings banks. He thought it would be desirable at some future time to take into consideration the whole question of the management of the old savings banks. It would not do in the present

Bill to deal with the constitution of the old savings banks.

MR. HENLEY said, his objection was that the clause proposed would give facilities to parties to avoid doing that which under other circumstances they would be obliged to do.

Clause added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

MARRIAGES (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 32.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. VANCE said, that in the absence of his hon. Colleague (Sir E. Grogan) he had to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to place certain Churches in Ireland on the same footing as the Presbyterian Church, that of the Society of Friends, and the Synagogue of the Jews. The Churches upon which the Bill would confer that advantage were the United Presbyterians, the Covenanters, the Independents, the Baptists, and especially the Wesleyans, all of which laboured under certain disabilities.

In the first place, they were obliged to send a notice to the poorhouse by the registrar in the case of projected marriages. They felt that condition as very insulting to their creed. They therefore asked that the registrar should send the notice, when any person desired to be married, to the clergyman who was to solemnize the marriage and to the clergyman of the church or chapel at which the marriage was to take place. The Bill did not interfere, in the slightest degree, with the rights of Roman Catholics, who could marry at any time or place without the intervention of the registrar. Another case of grievance, particularly with the Wesleyans, was that the registrar must be present at all their marriages, and that he signed the register, whilst their clergymen were made only attesting witnesses. There were about 500 churches in Ireland which would receive advantages by the Bill if it should pass into a law. The Bill would also enable minors to obtain the necessary certificate for marriage, when their guardians were unwilling to grant it, by applying to the consistory judge at Dublin and Armagh instead of to the Court of Chancery.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2°.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought the Bill of very considerable importance, and he was sorry the hon. Baronet who introduced it was not present to give a more full explanation of its provisions. The Bill related to certain classes of Dissenting bodies in Ireland, who, he admitted, had grievances to complain of under the Act of 1844; but several provisions of the Bill would really require serious consideration. By one provision of the Bill the power which heretofore had been vested in the Court of Chancery to act in the place of parents or guardians of persons desirous to marry, when parents or guardians were incapacitated from acting—that power was transferred to the Judges of the Consistory Courts of Armagh and Dublin. He disapproved that provision; and unless some satisfactory explanation could be offered, it would be his duty to oppose it. In Clause 2 an important novelty was introduced, requiring that notice should be given to the registrar of the church, chapel, or registered place of worship, usually attended by one or both of the parties to the intended marriage. That was a novelty which he could not approve. It was true that some of the Dissenting bodies did complain of the existing law, but the Presbyterians did not, they having their own clergy to perform marriages. But one clause in the Bill declared that nothing therein contained should extend to giving validity to any marriage not found valid under the existing law. That clause would invalidate the whole Bill. According to the Registrar's Report, the number of Presbyterians in Ireland was 586,000, and of other Protestant Dissenters about 70,000. The last-mentioned bodies, which declined to accept the marriage law of the 7 & 8 Vict., had 150 churches, chapels, and places of worship, but only 109 marriages were celebrated in them in the course of the year referred to in the Report. He mentioned those facts to call the attention of the hon. Gentlemen to them. Unless Amendments were introduced in Committee to meet the objections he had stated, he should be compelled to oppose the further progress of the Bill.

Mr. BUTT said, that Protestant Dissenters in Ireland had grievances, but he feared the Bill would not relieve them. He would observe, that Clause 6 provided that the marriage must be solemnized by an ordained minister of the denomination to which one or both parties to the marriage belonged; but who was to decide whether a Wesleyan minister was duly ordained? He should, however, vote for the second reading on the understanding that he should be at liberty to amend the Bill in Committee.

Mr. LONGFIELD said, that as one of the promoters of the Bill he would not assert that its details were susceptible of no improvement. Its main principle, however, was a good one—namely, the removal of a grievance long complained of by the Protestant Dissenters of Ireland. He regretted that they could not on that occasion do what was suggested in a leader of The Times as a very great improvement—consolidate the marriage law; but, though he admitted that the measure was bit-by-bit legislation, the Bill as it stood would remedy a considerable injustice.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he should resist any attempt to enforce a religious ceremony in the case of a marriage before a Registrar, thus putting such marriages in Ireland on the same footing as they stood in England.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Dublin whether he would omit that portion of the Bill which extended the provisions of the 22 Vict. to the Consistory Courts of Armagh and Dublin? He thought that the 5th clause was very loosely drawn. It provided that the Registrar General should furnish to the minister of every registered place of worship books, forms, duplicates, &c., but did not direct what was to be afterwards done with them.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he could not agree to the proposition of the hon. Baronet, as the object of that part of the Bill was to extend to persons in the humbler positions of life the same facilities which were enjoyed by the wealthier classes. The 5th clause, he might add, was an exact transcript of the existing Marriage Act.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Friday, 13th March.

BURIALS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Burials—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR MORTON PETO moved for leave to introduce a Bill to make further Provisions with respect to Burials in England and Wales. The hon. Baronet said, that the Bill was in many respects similar to that introduced last year, but some alterations had been introduced which were recommended by the Committee which had considered the subject last year.

Resolved,

That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision with respect to Burials in England and Wales.

ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 17.)—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated that its object was to enable Boards of Guardians to recover costs of maintenance of illegitimate children in Ireland in certain cases. It was an amendment of the Law passed at the end of last Session upon the construction of which doubts had arisen and conflicting decisions had been given. The process against the putative father was to be by civil bill, to be heard before the Chairman at quarter sessions.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2°.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, he objected to the measure, as did many Irish Members of the House of Commons whose opinions were entitled to the highest consideration. No doubt these cases imposed a very unpleasant duty on the magistrates; but in his opinion they were far more competent to deal with them than an assistant barrister from Dublin, who could not understand the character of the people or weigh the value of the corroborative evidence. He objected also to the hardship it would inflict on the woman who had to make application under it. The existing law had acted well in Ireland, and he trusted their Lordships would not assent to this unnecessary alteration. He would move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that although the Bill had been introduced by the Government, he should not be induced to support the Amendment on that account. It would require some ingenuity to convert a question as to Irish illegitimate children into a party question; his only object was that their legislation should be satisfactory and adapted to the occasion that called for interference. The object of the Bill, as he understood, was to repeal the 10th section of the Irish Poor Law Act, and to substitute other provisions instead of it. He thought, however, that the necessity for the Bill had arisen in consequence of an erroneous construction which had been put upon the Poor Law Act by the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland. The Bill was, in truth, a declaratory Bill, to make law the erroneous opinion of the law advisers of the Crown. The 10th section provided, that oath having been made before any two justices by the mother of any illegitimate child, and that the same should have been supported by corroborative evidence, it should be lawful for the guardians to proceed by civil bill before the barrister at quarter sessions to recover from the putative father the cost of maintaining the child and the costs of the proceedings. He understood that, in consequence of the opinion of the Law Officers, a circular had been addressed to the magistrates, which stated that their duty was simply to receive the sworn information of the mother, and thereupon to return that information to quarter sessions, where corroborative evidence was to be heard. He did not think that this was the correct construction of the statute. He also thought that the course pointed out would lead to great hardships, and money would be extorted under threat of swearing such information. The noble Lord (Viscount Lifford) who had moved the Amendment to the second reading had himself brought in a measure by which he proposed to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of this country except in this, that proceedings were to be taken by the guardians instead of by the woman; and it was also provided that the money should be recovered by summary process instead of by civil bill. He (Lord Chelmsford) suggested that this Bill should be read a second time, and then that it and the measure of the noble Lord (Viscount Lifford) should both be referred to a Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE agreed that some legislation was absolutely necessary, but the subject certainly required a great deal of consideration.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the real question was whether the court of quarter sessions or of petty sessions was the proper tribunal for deciding questions of bastardy. The provision of this measure was in accordance with the recommendation of the Irish Poor Law Commission. He could not have acceded to the Motion of his noble Friend (Viscount Lifford), who wished to postpone the second reading of this Bill; but he thought his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) made a very fair proposal in wishing to refer this particular question to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that it was the intention of the Legislature, when passing the Bill of last Session, that the jurisdiction should be vested in the assistant barrister at quarter sessions, and the tenth section embodied the recommendation of the Irish Committee, ipsis verbis. The doubts which had arisen on the subject were in consequence of words which had been introduced in their Lordships' House without any intention of departing from the principle recommended by the Committee on the Irish Poor Law which sat in 1861. There was this strong objection to making the magistrates at petty sessions decide bastardy questions, that the board of guardians were to take the initiative; and as the magistrates were ex-officio guardians, they would be plaintiffs quod guardians, and judges quod justices at petty sessions. In addition to such a serious objection, it was to be remembered that the assistant barristers were gentlemen learned in the law; while the magistrates at petty sessions were not, as a general rule, learned in the law. With respect to the proposition to refer the question to a Select Committee, he was in the hands of the House; but after what he had stated, perhaps their Lordships would be of opinion that such a course was unnecessary. His own objection to it was that it would cause delay in the passing of a Bill to render the law certain on the point of jurisdiction.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in reply, said, that this Bill was accepted only as an alternative for the English system.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he should earnestly press upon the noble Duke that he should accede to the proposition; and he begged to state to their Lordships his conviction, that while the construction which had been put upon the existing Act, was, he believed, quite erroneous, yet that the measure involved questions very different from mere questions of tribunal. It had been held—quite erroneously, as he thought—that it was the duty of the guardians who made the preliminary inquiry to consider the question who was the putative father in these cases. But that would be instituting an inquiry behind a man's back. All that was required at the preliminary inquiry was, that the mother's oath should be supported by corroborative evidence. Unfortunately, that was not the view which had been taken by the law advisers of the Crown in Ireland, and hence the necessity for the present measure.

EARL GRANVILLE said, his noble Friend had no wish to oppose what seemed to be the general wish of the House, and would therefore accede to the Motion for a Select Committee, on the understanding that there would be no unreasonable delay in proceeding with the Bill.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, that with that understanding he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn: Then the Original Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]—(No. 12.)

COURTS OF LAW (IRELAND)—JUDICIAL STATISTICS.

RETURNS MOVED FOR. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to call the attention of the Government to several instances of inconveniences arising from the insufficient time allotted to the Irish Judges to complete the business of certain Circuits, and hoped that some steps would be taken to remedy an evil which caused much expense and delay to suitors in Ireland. He also wished to know, Whether the noble Earl the President of the Council could give any assurance when the Judicial Statistics for Ireland, promised in 1861, will be laid upon the table of the House? He doubted whether these statistics would be laid upon the table in sufficient time to be of any use this Session, as he believed that no steps had been yet taken to collect the civil statistics of the past year. The noble Marquess concluded by moving an Address for a series of tabular Returns relating to Judicial Business in Ireland.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was no objection to grant the Returns moved for, although they would take some time to prepare. With regard to the first point referred to by the noble Marquess, he was not aware of any inconveniences such as those alluded to; but if any such did exist, he was sure the Irish Judges would direct their attention to them, and take measures to prevent them in future. He had not received the Judicial Statistics that had been ordered, but understood that they were in course of preparation.

Motion agreed to.

THE GALWAY PACKET CONTRACT.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE rose to ask the Postmaster General, Whether, in connection with the proposed Restoration of the "Galway Subsidy," it is intended to make any Alteration as to the Port of Departure or Destination of the Vessels of the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company, carrying Her Majesty's Mails to America; and whether any Arrangement having such an Object in view is contemplated by Her Majesty's Government, or has been proposed by the Company in question? The noble Earl said, that though this matter had been designated by the Members of the present Government "a notorious job," it appeared that they were about to renew it. Under such circumstances it was not unnatural that he should put the Question of which he had given notice. It was understood that the subsidy was originally given upon the distinct understanding that there should be a mail packet communication between America and some port on the west or south of Ireland, with the object of conferring a benefit upon Ireland; and if it were now to be renewed, he hoped it would be on the ground of its being of advantage to Ireland. The Treasury Minute of the 3rd of January, 1863, was something to the same effect, giving, however, liberty to the Directors to state their views upon the matter. He believed that the Company since its first formation had undergone some changes, or had been formed afresh; indeed, he heard that it was not now the same Company that it was originally. From rumours which were spread abroad it appeared it was now contemplated to change the port of departure from Galway to some other port in Ireland or England; and Liverpool was freely spoken of as the place from which the vessels were to start in future. Much jealousy, in consequence of this report, had been created in the minds of other Transatlantic companies. And it was the knowledge of such a feeling existing that induced him to put this Question. He saw in a letter of Mr. Inman, of Liverpool, the owner of some vessels, and he believed the head of a steam-packet company, a statement to the effect that the writer had reason to know that the American mail was no longer to start from the port of Galway, but from Liverpool or some other English port. Mr. Inman said that the ground on which the subsidy had been originally granted was the benefit that would result to the port of Galway, and to Irish commerce generally; but it was obvious, that if Liverpool was to be the port of departure, the port of Galway would not be benefited, while the unsubsidized lines would be injuriously affected. He hoped that the noble Lord would [give some explanation on the subject.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that no communication had been made to the Company alluded to, on the part of the Government, further than that they were ready to listen to any proposition they could make in reference to the renewal of the contract. No communication whatever had been made to the Government by the Company in respect to any alteration of the port from which their vessels were to start. At the same time he might mention that the Government had laid down certain necessary conditions preliminary to their entertaining the question at all—namely, that the Company should be able to show that they had a sufficient number of vessels properly qualified for the service, which must be surveyed by the Admiralty, who must report to the Treasury and the Post Office that the vessels were adequate and competent for the service. As those reports had not as yet been received, the Government were not in a position to take any active steps in the matter.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: Then am I to understand from the noble Lord that those vessels are not to start with the American mails from an English but from an Irish port?

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: No application of the kind alluded to has been made to the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE was sorry to hear from his noble Friend below him—if he understood him right—that the ground on which the subsidy was granted was that of conferring an advantage upon Ireland. Now, the whole ground upon which the people of Ireland claimed the subsidy, and that by which they were prepared to stand or fall was this:—That by departing from a western port of Ireland there would be established a quicker communication with America than if the departure took place from any other port in the United Kingdom.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: Again, I say the question has never been entertained of the departure from an English port. The noble Marquess is perfectly right in his observation that this subsidy was obtained on the ground of a quicker communication by the departure from an Irish port. As to the particular Irish port for this departure, that was left an open question.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE:—It will be satisfactory to know that the question of selection is confined to Irish ports, and not an English port. Is not this the understanding?

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY:—I understand so. There can be no question about it.

AFFAIRS OF GREECE.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, seeing the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) in his place, who has a Motion on the Paper on our relations with Greece, I would take the liberty of saying to him that I think it would be attended with public inconvenience to call upon the House to discuss that question, and for Her Majesty's Government to make statements about it. If the hon. Member will have the kindness to put it off to-day, he will of course expect that I should give him the certainty of some future day, and I will offer him Monday week, if that will suit him, taking care, of course, that he shall have precedence on that day.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, there was an impression in the City that the apathy of the House of Commons on this subject had been very injurious to English interests. At the same time, it would be his duty to defer to the appeal of the noble Viscount, and to what he understood to be the general wish of the House. He would, therefore, postpone his Motion until Monday week.

THE CONVICT STUART FARQUHARSON. QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If a convict of the names of William Stuart Farquharson, alias Frederick William Stuart, who was tried on the 13th day of July, 1857, at Oxford, and sentenced to twelve years' penal servitude, is still at Bermuda; and, if not there, what has become of him?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that it appeared by the last Return from Bermuda that a convict of that name was there at that time.

CHOLERA IN THE PUNJAB.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay before the House the Report of a Scientific Commission, appointed in the Autumn of 1861, to inquire into and report upon the Epidemic of Cholera, which had just caused great mortality in the Punjab and in the Valley of the Ganges; together with any Correspondence that may have taken place upon the subject between the Home Authorities and the Cholera Commission?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied, that a very sufficient reason existed why the Government could not produce the Report in question—namely, that they had not yet received it.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND). QUESTION.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government have under consideration the steps to be taken with reference to the proceedings of the Commissioners of Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), which have occasioned complaints of by-laws having been framed and the approval of the Secretary of State obtained by surprise and mistake; and whether it is intended to introduce any Bill to amend the Act of last Session as to Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), so as to define the course of proceedings before the Commissioners, and to prevent any interference in matters which are the subject of litigation in the established legal tribunals?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he was not aware that there had been any ground of complaint as to the by-laws made by the Commissioners having been passed by surprise. The Act required that the by-laws should be made before the 1st of January in the present year, and after they were published that notice should be given to all the parties concerned. After an interval of a month from the date of publication, the Home Secretary was empowered either to confirm, alter, or disallow the by-laws. He had confirmed all those to which no objection had been made, and the rest he had reserved for future consideration. He was not aware of any alteration in the Act being contemplated, but he would communicate with his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, and answer the second question of the right hon. Gentleman on a future evening.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE.

ADJOURNMENT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish to give notice, that as it will probably be inconvenient to the House and to you, for many reasons, to meet on Tuesday, I shall propose on Monday that the House at its rising on that day shall adjourn until Wednesday.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BRAZIL.—RESOLUTION.

MR. BRAMLEY-MOORE rose to call the attention of the House to the Papers and Correspondence laid upon the table with reference to Brazil, and to move the following Resolution:—

"That this House has learned with regret the interruption of amicable relations between this country and Brazil; and this House expresses the desire that Her Majesty's Government may take such measures to restore a cordial understanding between the two countries as may be consistent with the character and honour of this country, having at the same time a just regard to the dignity and honour of a friendly and independent power."

The hon. Member said, he addressed the House on this occasion with great diffidence, but in the hope that he should receive the indulgence which was always extended to hon. Members under similar circumstances. The subject was one materially affecting the commercial interests and honour of this country, and the honour and dignity of an independent Power. The Empire of Brazil had been an independent State for forty years, and during that period, with very few interruptions, the most amicable relations had prevailed, and an extensive trade had been carried on, between the two countries. The only interruption to the harmony between the two nations had been on the passing of the Bill called Lord Aberdeen's Act, which had produced great excitement and an expression of feeling which he might say had not been got over to this day. That Act affected the very foundations of the independence of this Empire, for it assumed a power which had never been exercised, and which could never be justified even in our own courts. Brazil was governed by a constitutional Government, consisting of an Emperor, Lords, and Commons, on the model of the constitutional Government of England, the only difference being that in Brazil the peerage was not hereditary. No one had exerted himself more successfully to promote the permanent interests and happiness of Brazil than the present Emperor. He was advised by his Constitutional Ministers like the Sovereign of this country, and they were responsible for their acts to the Houses of Parliament. Our foreign trade with Brazil was of great importance, for it was well known to rank third in the order of extent and importance. The value of British property in Brazil probably amounted to £20,000,000 sterling, besides valuable lives, which had been jeopardized and endangered by the recent occurrences. The recent misunderstanding between this country and Brazil arose out of the wreck of a vessel called the Prince of Wales, in June, 1861. Reports were rife that the wreck was plundered, and that the crew were murdered. A demand was in consequence made upon the Brazilian Government for compensation, on the ground that they had not used due diligence in procuring justice to be done. Any one, however, who would read the correspondence between the British Minister at Rio Janeiro and the Brazilian Government would see that steps had been taken, not only to protect property, but to recover the bodies. The vessel was wrecked on a low shore, where breakers were found for three or four miles in extent, rendering it impossible for any ship to be saved in a south-east gale. Several vessels were wrecked on that occasion, but it was only with respect to the Prince of Wales that any unpleasantness had arisen between the two Governments. It was alleged that sailors belonging to this vessel had been murdered; but of this there was no proof whatever; there was merely suspicion; and according to English law, until you prove a man guilty, you are bound to assume he is innocent. On this occasion the Consul, accompanied by a body of men from Rio Grande, went down to a place called Albardao, to look after the wreck and the bodies. As the word Albardao implies a city or village, it might be well to state that in the present instance it is the name of a district so thinly inhabited that a hut could be found only here and there, perhaps twenty miles apart from its nearest neighbour. It was reported that ten bodies had been washed ashore, and that only four were produced for interment. These four he believed were seen by the Consul, but there was no trace of the others. It had been said that they were buried on the shore; but if so, it would be impossible to find the place, so rapidly does the surface of the shore change. It was stated by Mr. Consul Vereker that he expressed surprise that all the bodies were not found in the locality. But it was a well-known fact, that when a wreck took place, the bodies of the crew might be washed to the most distant and extraordinary places imaginable. For instance, after the wreck of the Royal Charter, the body of one lady was found washed on shore at Belfast. Mr. Consul Vereker examined the four bodies, and there were no traces, as far as he could find, of any murder having been committed; on the contrary, he asserted the probability, from the appearance of the skull, of death having been caused in one instance by the falling of a mast or spar. The question was then referred to Admiral Warren, who gave his opinion upon the circumstances as they were laid before him by Mr. Consul Vereker. But Mr. Vereker took his own view of everything, nor would he admit the facts laid before him by the Brazilian authorities—in short, he would believe nothing that did not suit the purpose he had in view, to vindicate himself and pick a quarrel with the authorities of the country.

Complaints were made of the dilatoriness of the Brazilian Government, but the fault really rested with the British authorities for allowing a matter to which they attached so much importance to sleep for such a length of time. When the wreck was first heard of, immediate steps were taken to recover the cargo and the bodies, and things went on in that way month after month, until, about seven or eight months after the occurrence, the British authorities applied for a further investigation, and asked that a naval officer should accompany those who were to conduct the inquiry. But the Governor General, while making no objection to the officer in his private character, very properly refused to allow him to accompany in an official capacity the persons who were to make the inquiry. With regard to the wreck, it was admitted that a portion of the cargo had been plundered. But when they came to analyse the nature of the cargo, they would find that the plunder must have been very trifling, and wholly inadequate to justify the measures that had been taken by Her Majesty's Minister in Rio. There was no doubt whatever, that if due diligence had been used by Mr. Consul Vereker, he could have traced the plunder, and found out the persons who were guilty. Mr. Vereker went down with an armed force, examined the few houses that were scattered about, and found no plunder whatever; and he then attempted to get out of the difficulty by saying that the people had removed the plunder into the thicket. But if so, why not have gone into the thicket, as he was accompanied by an armed force, and there was no reason for not following up the search? But it was attempted to fasten a stigma upon the inhabitants of that part of Brazil, to make it appear that they were wreckers and assassins; whereas he could assure the House that this was a libel on the inhabitants of Rio Grande, who were a brave and independent people, well known for their hospitality and generosity—so much so, that a man might travel through the whole of that country without a dollar in his pocket. He might give instances of the Rival in 1841, the Pym in 1848, the Ada in 1856, and several other vessels, to show that on every occasion the Brazilian authorities had done everything in their power to protect wrecks and save lives. In 1850, in the case of the Charles Buchanan, the Brazilian steamer of war Amelia was placed at the disposal of Mr. Consul Morgan, and not only saved the cargo, but the whole of the crew; and in 1861, at the same time that the wreck of the Prince of Wales occurred, the William Peel was saved by the Brazilian authorities. No doubt an erroneous impression on the subject had been produced in the public mind, partly in consequence of the reiterated assertions that had been made throughout the correspondence, and partly in consequence of auxiliary statements made principally by a merchant of Glasgow named Stephens, who wrote some very strong letters alleging that the crew of the Prince of Wales had been murdered and the cargo plundered. Mr. Stephens, in a letter addressed to Lord Russell, dated January 7, 1862, stated that he had ascertained that the captain, his wife, and crew, had landed safely with his boats on the Brazilian territory, with his flag, chronometer, logbook, &c., with provisions and all other necessaries, except fire-arms or weapons of defence. Persons reading such a letter, would suppose that this man had the most authentic evidence that the crew had been murdered; but, when applied to by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary (Mr. Layard) for his authority, he simply gave that of the Master of the Hound, a vessel which had been wrecked in the same gale as the Prince of Wales, but which, with its crew, had been saved by the Brazilian authorities. Now, this man put in a claim for compensation for the ship, cargo, and freight—freight which he had not earned; but in a subsequent letter he said, if Lord Russell would oblige the Brazilian Government to pay, he would at once bury in oblivion everything he had said respecting the murders—he would not make it public, nor say a word about it. It was perfectly clear, therefore, that the motive that had influenced Mr. Stephens in bringing this charge against the Brazilian people was to get money for his cargo, ship, and freight. With respect to the plunder alleged to have taken place, he had taken the trouble to send to Glasgow for a list of the cargo; and from its character it appeared impossible that any but a very small portion could ever have reached the shore. The cargo consisted of forty cases of merchandise, and some other things which would be rendered valueless as soon as they touched water; as, for instance, there were 150 tons of coal, 20 cases of nails, 12 cases of sewing cotton, 9 cases of paint colours, 100 cases of soda ash, 253 barrels of beer, 33 cases of glass, and 20 bales of canvas. Of a cargo of this nature it was not probable that any large portion would ever reach the shore. Consul Vereker stated that from the things washed ashore it was clearly proved that the vessel was fitted up with great luxury. This was another of Consul Vereker's exaggerations, for which there appeared no foundation whatever. The vessel was only 315 tons register, and twenty-two years old, having been built in 1840, at Sunderland, where they were not in the habit, especially at that date, either of building very smart vessels, or of fitting them up with very great luxury. In the first instance, the demand for compensation amounted to £6,525, the cargo and stores being valued at £5,500, and the freight put down at £1,025. The value of the total entries as declared at Glasgow was only £3,500. But he saw no reason why even this sum should be demanded, as the utmost claim on the Brazilian Government ought to be for the portion supposed to be stolen.

He would now pass to another part of the subject. He desired to call particular attention to the despatch of Earl Russell, dated February 28th 1863, wherein the noble Earl observed to M. Moreira, that had a Brazilian ship been wrecked on the coast of Cornwall, and dead bodies been afterwards found on the shore, the coroner of the district would at once have had the dead bodies produced, and would have held an inquest on them; that had any magistrate appeared with an armed force to prevent this being done, twenty-four hours would not have elapsed before the magistrate would have been dismissed, and a military force would have been sent to protect the judicial proceedings of the coroner. He wondered how the noble Earl could have drawn a comparison between cases so dissimilar. There was no justice in comparing the coast of Great Britain with that of Brazil. The province of Rio Grande was as large as this country, and had only a population of 340,000 inhabitants. Nevertheless, he accepted the challenge of the noble Earl, and he would maintain that there were proceedings on our own coasts quite as bad as anything complained of on the coasts of Brazil. During the year before last, the wrecks on the coast of Great Britain amounted in number to 1,494, and out of these 210 were wrecks of foreign vessels, and he need not tell the House that many of them were plundered, and in no case could he find that any compensation was ever made or had been claimed by any foreign Government. There might possibly be some exceptional case, in which compensation was obtained, but he had been unable to discover it, and therefore he must take it as the rule that compensation had neither been demanded nor paid. In reference to the state of things on the coast of Cornwall, he would read to the House an extract (Haydn, p. 559) in which it was stated, that—

"When a wreck took place, thousands of the inhabitants of the coast assembled with axes, hatchets, crowbars, and other instruments; men, women, and children fought by habit for plunder, utterly regardless of the sufferers."

That description was written about six years ago. It was well known that there was a time when it had been, and even now was, occasionally the practice, not only in Cornwall, but on other parts of the coast of this country, to use stalking horses to lure vessels on shore, in order that the wrecks might be plundered. The same, or worse, had been the case in the colonies. It was notorious that in the Bahama Islands a great many men lived by the plunder alone of wrecks, and he was not aware that any compensation had ever been obtained by the losers. On the St. Lawrence wrecks took place every year; and in one locality the party receiving the plunder actually turned the wrecked ship into a store, and sold portions of the wrecked cargo to passers-by.

He would now pass to the important subject of the negotiations at Rio. By reference to the Correspondence he found that great delays had occurred, more on the part of the British than the Brazilian authorities, in bringing the matter to a conclusion; and at last, when all might have been settled, the British Minister at Rio brought on by a precipitate proceeding most disastrous consequences. Great excitement existed there; and, finally, instructions were sent out by Earl Russell to Mr. Christie to make an offer of arbitration with respect to the case of the Prince of Wales. The instructions of Earl Russell would be found at page 95 of the Correspondence, but unfortunately the offer of arbitration was accompanied by conditions which the Brazilian Government could not accept; for one of these conditions was, that they must first acknowledge that they were in the wrong. After this, the extreme measure of reprisals was taken; but Mr. Christie, becoming alarmed at what he had done, and at the excitement which it had caused in Rio Janeiro, declared his willingness to consider the propriety of referring the matters in dispute to impartial arbitration. That concession, however, should have been made earlier. Had it been made in the first instance, on the receipt of Earl Russell's despatch, there could be no doubt that it would have been accepted on the other side, and that the disastrous consequences which had since arisen might have been avoided. On the 30th of December Mr. Christie ordered reprisals. On the 31st he proposed arbitration, and on the 3rd of January the memorandum of arbitration was agreed to. Had there only been a prudent and cautious man on the spot as the representative of the British Government, the matter might have been at once amicably arranged, and the lives and property of Englishmen would never have been endangered. He would not go further into details; he would only observe that it might be years before the consequences of the uncalled-for interference of Mr. Christie were obliterated from the minds of the Brazilians. There was no other country in the world with which we ought more anxiously to cultivate intimate relations than Brazil. It was the only country in South America which had a monarchical Government, and which had kept faith in its foreign engagements. This had attracted British capital to Brazil, which had obtained its loans on better terms than other countries from European states. Much British capital had been invested in Brazilian railways, and almost all Brazilian stocks were at a premium, which showed the confidence entertained in the loyalty and honesty of the Brazilian Government.

He had now to touch on a delicate subject; but when he considered the magnitude of the interests at stake, he felt he must not shrink from exposing the true state of the case. The whole of the mischief in Brazil had arisen from the conduct of Mr. Consul Vereker, who had distorted almost everything he had written home about. This would be shown by reference to page 202, where Mr. Christie, in a despatch to Earl Russell, states that Mr. Vereker, when he came from Rio Grande on his way home, was in a state of nervous excitement, with a delusion about attempts to assassinate him. Now, it was beyond a question that that excitement was not due to the visit to the wreck, but had existed for a long period; and he would ask his hon. Friend (Mr. Layard) whether he did not know that Mr. Vereker had been taken by Mr. Christie himself to a medical man in Rio Janeiro, in order to ascertain the state of his mind, and whether he was not sent away from Rio Janeiro on that account, landed at Bahia, returned to Rio, and sent away a second time? Yet it was upon the assertions of a man of disordered mind, who could not go from one place to another without dread of assassination, that the British Government had made reprisals upon Brazil. He learned from a letter which he had that day received from Rio Janeiro, that a very unpleasant feeling still existed there, and that a very unpleasant correspondence was going on between the Governments of Brazil and Great Britain. He would not say that Mr. Christie had wilfully exaggerated or misrepresented what had occurred; but his behaviour certainly gave some colour to General Webb's charges against him. In a letter to Earl Russell, General Webb the American Minister, said that Mr. Christie had quarrelled with the Envoys of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, and with the Pope's Nuncio; and that, lastly, he had had himself to interfere in order to protect one of Mr. Christie's own attachés. "All the circumstances," added the General, "go to prove a reckless disregard of truth on the part of Mr. Christie, which is not characteristic of a gentleman, and certainly not commendable in a representative of the English nation." That was not the way in which they were accustomed to hear a British representative described.

He hoped that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would adopt such a course as would restore the cordial feeling which formerly existed in Brazil towards Great Britain, among all classes, from the Emperor downwards. He trusted that instructions would be sent out by the mail to-morrow calculated to conciliate Brazil and re-establish cordial relations between the two countries. Brazil would be happy to receive friendly advances on our part, for she was comparatively helpless in our hands; but as we were great and powerful, we ought also to be just and generous. He disclaimed all party feeling—he was acting quite independently in bringing the matter forward—and he had endeavoured to frame his Resolution in such terms as might make it acceptable to Her Majesty's Government. In conclusion, he had only to express his hope that the next mail would not be allowed to depart without some step being taken on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers to reconcile the interests which were now jeopardized between the two countries. In conclusion, thanking the House for its attention, he would now move formally the Resolution.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House has learned with regret the interruption of amicable relations between this Country and Brazil; and this House expresses the desire that Majesty's Government may take such measures to restore a cordial understanding between the two Countries as may be consistent with the character and honour of this Country, having, at the same time, a just regard to the dignity and honour of a friendly and independent Power,"

—instead thereof.

MR. COLLIER said, that when the hon. Member first put his Resolution on the paper he gave notice of an Amendment which, he thought, would better express the sense of the House. The question now came before them in another form. In the ordinary course of business they should now go into Committee of Supply; but the hon. Member interposed and said in effect that they ought not to go into Committee until they had passed his Resolution. It was incumbent upon the hon. Gentleman to show some strong reason why the House should depart from the usual order of business. He confessed, for his own part, that having read the Resolution, he had great difficulty in understanding it. He could not make up his mind whether or not the hon. Member meant to censure the Government for the course they had adopted. If the Resolution was intended as one of censure, he should contend that the censure was undeserved; if it was not a Motion of censure, he saw no reason why the House should pass it; while, in either event, there was no good ground for the House abstaining from resolving itself into Committee of Supply.

Before dealing with the facts of the case, it might be convenient that he should state the principles of international law which appeared to him to apply to it. Vattel said, under the head of "Reprisals," that a Sovereign demanded justice or made reprisals, not only for his own concerns, but also for those of his subjects, whom he was bound to protect, and whose cause was the cause of the nation. The cause of reprisals, he added, ought to be just—they ought to be founded on either an actual denial of justice, or one which there was good reason to apprehend. Vattel subsequently stated that reprisals might be resorted to if justice were denied or unreasonably delayed, or if the decisions of the tribunals were manifestly unjust. When a claim was made by one country against another on account of an injury sustained by citizens of the first, it was no answer to say—"Our population are lawless, and we cannot restrain them. Our tribunals are incompetent, and they have not the means of enforcing the attendance of witnesses, of punishing the guilty, or of restoring the goods which have been stolen." The reply was this—"You are bound to maintain an effective police and an effective magistracy; and if, on account of default in your duty, our subjects have sustained injury without redress, we have a claim upon you." The imperfection of international law consisted in the fact that when one nation had a claim against another there was no tribunal to enforce it. The injured nation, therefore, must take the law into its own hands; and it did so either by reprisals, which was the recognised mode by which a nation righted itself, or by resorting to the dread alternative of war. It appeared to him that the case against Brazil might be thus summarized—"An English vessel was wrecked upon your coast. All on board her perished. Probably some of the crew were murdered. It is certain that their bodies were stripped and plundered. It is admitted by yourselves that wholesale robbery took place upon the cargo and the effects of the passengers. Those functionaries in the locality to whom you intrust the the administration of justice, for whose conduct you are responsible, whose duty it was immediately to repair to the spot to succour the survivors, if any, and to protect the cargo, or at least to take prompt measures for the apprehension of the offenders and the restitution of the stolen goods, and to hold an immediate inquest on the dead bodies, were in all probability accomplices in the atrocious crimes which they were bound to investigate and punish. It is certain that they failed in their duty." ["No!"] Yes; he would prove it by the facts stated in the correspondence. "For fourteen months we waited, during which time we exhausted every form of remonstrance, application, and intreaty. In the result we have not obtained justice, and we therefore make a claim against you." That was our case against the Brazilian Government, and he undertook to prove it by the correspondence, and even by the admissions of the Brazilian Government themselves.

The Prince of Wales was wrecked on the coast of Albardao. The hon. Member for Lincoln, like the agents of the Brazilian Government, had described the inhabitants of that coast as a simple, primitive, inoffensive, and hospitable race. Was that, indeed, their real character? He held in his hand a newspaper, The Echo do Sul, published in Rio Grande, which gave a rather different account of them. It described Albardao as "that classical district of depredations, robberies, assassinations, and stranglings." Such was the character of the people as drawn by one of their own newspapers. Gentlemen connected with insurance offices had told him that the character of this coast was notorious, so much so, indeed, that if a vessel were lost upon it, small hopes were entertained of seeing any thing more of either crew or cargo. He would prove, from the statements of the Brazilian authorities themselves, that such was the character of the inhabitants of Albardao; and if the fact were so, then he contended that if the Brazilian authorities had not instituted an efficient magistracy and police long before this, it showed a recklessness and disregard of human life and property little creditable to them. The Prince of Wales was wrecked on the 9th of June, 1861. There were three functionaries in the immediate neighbourhood, to whom was intrusted the administration of justice, and for whose conduct the Brazilian Government was responsible. The first was Senhor Soares, who was described as a justice of the peace and a man of great property and influence, exercising an extensive sway over the inhabitants of the coast, who were represented as being his dependents and retainers. He appeared to have occupied the position of a feudal chieftain in the olden time. The next was Faustino, a son-in-law of Soares; he was called the inspector of the district. The third was Gonçalves, the sub-delegate of police at a town six leagues distant from the scene of the wreck. It was manifestly the duty of these three functionaries immediately to repair to the spot to succour the survivors, if any, to hold an inquest on the bodies of the dead, to protect the cargo, or, if that were impossible, to take prompt measures for the apprehension of the thieves and the restitution of the stolen property. On the most favourable supposition they did nothing; but that supposition was far too favourable. Let the House see what they did. The information of the wreck was given at the house of Soares, who lived four miles from the spot, on the 9th. What did Soares do? He absented himself, and was found at Rio Grande on the 12th. He let out casually in conversation that some English bodies had been washed ashore. That was brought to the ears of our Consul, Mr. Vereker, who immediately supposed that there had been a wreck. Soares was questioned, but he denied all knowledge of the circumstance. The hon. Gentleman opposite had been ill-advised in the comments he had made upon the conduct of English magistrates. There was not a Cornish magistrate to be found who, on receiving information of a wreck and of dead bodies being washed on shore, would absent himself from his duty and deny all knowledge of the wreck. A most unfair attack had been made upon Consul Vereker. On the same principle as the Brazilian Government had whitewashed the innocent inhabitants of the coast, they had thought it necessary to blacken the English Consul, because he had performed his duty zealously but inconveniently. Was it fair to blame that gentleman because, on hearing of the circumstances, he immediately proceeded to the spot and made every inquiry into them? The hon. Member said that Mr. Vereker laboured under delusions; and it appeared that some months afterwards he had an attack of brain fever, which for a time, no doubt, affected his intellect to a certain degree, but he had since recovered. That attack was produced, in a great measure, by the excitement which this occurrence caused him. He was deeply affected, as it was probable he would be, by the murder of his fellow-countrymen, and by the apathy and indifference—to say nothing more—of the Brazilian authorities. He used his utmost endeavours, but in vain, to goad them to exertion. Throughout his correspondence, however, there was not a single expression betraying the least symptom of mental aberration; and it was not creditable to impugn his character because he had endeavoured to discharge his duty. Mr. Vereker obtained the assistance of the municipal judge; they went to the scene of the wreck, and proceeded to the house of Soares, the justice of the peace, who had then absconded. He found the daughter of Soares there, (the wife of Faustino, the inspector of police), who gave him an inhospitable reception. The Consul was evidently regarded as a most inconvenient visitor—and why? Because he found stolen goods in the house of Soares. He found two brand-new Bibles there, which certainly belonged to the crew, if not to the captain, and which were entirely undamaged by sea water. He also found there two empty crates for Manchester manufactured goods, which had recently been broken open. He went next morning to the shore, which he discovered to be strewn, for a great distance, with boxes and bales and fragments of the wreck. Some had been broken open by being dashed against the rocks, others bore traces of having been broken open a few hours before, the marks of the tools used for the purpose and the smell of turpentine being both fresh upon them. Faustino professed to have kept guard over them; but if Mr. Vereker was right, his guard must have been like that of the wolf over the sheep. The Consul also described the state of two boats, the long-boat and the gig, lying on the shore. They were near together, their prows being towards the shore. The long boat was but a little damaged at the bow, as if it had struck hard against the sand, and the gig was altogether undamaged. The oars of the boats were uninjured. Either in or close to the boats Mr. Vereker found certain trunks and boxes belonging to the crew lying broken open, and with the paper linings of the inside quite dry. If they had been washed ashore, it was not likely the linings would have remained dry. They must manifestly have been brought ashore in the boats, in which also it was almost certain that many of the unhappy crew had reached the shore alive. But the evidence did not stop there. Mr. Vereker was told that ten bodies in all were washed on shore, and that fact was admitted by the Brazilian authorities. He applied to the inspector Faustino to be allowed to see the bodies; but that official objected. When Mr. Vereker pointed out to Faustino the marks of instruments upon the opened cases, showing that they had been forcibly broken open, he did not answer him. The municipal judge promised an immediate examination of the bodies. Faustino was then present, but he quickly joined his followers, and after appearing to be engaged in earnest conversation for a time, he returned, saying it was impossible to go to the place where the bodies were that night. The municipal judge then declared that he had no power to do what the Consul required. Faustino, the inspector of the district, whose duty it was admitted to have been to hold an inquest on the bodies, not only omitted to hold one, but concealed from our Consul the locality in which the bodies lay. Nor was that all. On our Consul asking to see the bodies, and requesting the municipal judge to hold an inquest, Faustino interfered by armed force to prevent its being held. No doubt, in a despatch from M. Moreira, containing more special pleading than he had known of at the Temple for some time, it was said that Faustino did not prevent the inquest being held by armed force, because the force of the municipal judge was as strong as his; yet at all events, between those two functionaries, the inquest was not held, but was postponed till it was wholly useless. He would refer to one or two of the Brazilian despatches, in order to give the Brazilian account of the way in which justice was administered. Mr. Vereker, being unable to obtain a sight of the bodies, returned to Rio Grande, and very properly required the authorities to direct the bodies to be brought there, and an inquest to be held upon them. He had applied first to the municipal judge to order such an inquest; that officer said it was not his business, but the business of the delegate of police to do so; the delegate of police replied, that it was the business of the municipal judge; and thus the matter was bandied between them. The result of these disputes was, that the offenders remained unpunished, and gained time to conceal the product of their criminality. Well, an inquest was held on four bodies—only on four. There were two inquests alluded to in the papers; but hon. Members would find if they examined them carefully, that there were two inquests held at different places on the same four bodies. Now, nothing could be more unsatisfactory than those inquests. In the first place, one of those who held the inquiry was a brother-in-law of Soares. The result was this:—They said that death was caused by drowning; but they also stated that the bodies were in such a state of decomposition that it was almost impossible to ascertain the cause of death; and when the House recollected that more than a fortnight had elapsed in a tropical climate, they would be able to see that the inquest could not have been satisfactory. But a few awkward facts transpired. Faustino had said that all the bodies had been buried, and yet it turned out that of these four bodies three were unburied at a distance from the shore. How came they there? It was possible to conceive, that if a dead body had been washed on shore, it might have been drawn inland for the purpose of burial; but it was difficult to suppose that a body could be drawn in shore for any other purpose than burial. There were three unburied bodies, stripped of nearly all their clothes, no watches, rings, trinkets, or papers—they were stripped and plundered. He was afraid the inference was too strong that these four bodies were a portion of the crew who possibly had escaped the slaughter of their fellow-countrymen, and who, having got a certain distance inland, were overtaken and murdered. An inquest was held on these four bodies, and one or two awkward facts transpired. It turned out that the skulls of one or two were fractured. It was true that the injury might have arisen from the head coming in collision with a rock—but that was merely a supposition; while, on the other hand, the injury was quite consistent, at all events, with murder. There was also an expression used on the inquest to the effect that the bodies presented signs of strangulation. It was quite true that they subsequently explained strangulation to mean something else quite different; but the Brazilians had a way of explaining away every fact which turned out awkward. Now, so much for the inquest on these bodies, which at that time was a mere mockery, the delay having rendered the mischief irreparable.

If the House would permit him, he would now call their attention to one or two extracts from the papers, which showed the way in which justice proceeded. Mr. Vereker, after the first inquest, requested that a further inquiry might be held. In page 16 would be found a letter from Senhor Garcez, the delegate of police, in which he states he had done everything possible for the advancement of the process—they always said that. It was necessary, however, he stated, to have the deposition of the witnesses, and this could not be obtained, because it was necessary that various persons of Albardao and the neighbourhood should be notified to appear in his city (Rio Grande do Sul), and they all refused to attend. What was this but an admission that the tribunal was incompetent to procure the attendance of the witnesses? He did not care whether this was true or not; for whether the Brazilian tribunals were corrupt or incompetent, there was their own admission that justice could not be done, and in that case the State became liable for any claim that might be made by a foreign Government. Senhor Garcez also admitted that "the cargo of the barque was all sacked." Senhor Callado, secretary of the police in Porto Alegre, writing to Senhor Garcez, used this language—

"If the witnesses should refuse to swear the truth against the wealthy inhabitants of the district, who, according to your opinions, are the principal criminals, they ought to be processed."

The only offender who had been caught was Mariano Pinto, a small criminal, and he had not been tried to this day. ["No, no!"] Yes. If hon. Members read the despatch from Mr. Christie, dated September 18, 1862, they would find, that although the Brazilian authorities talked of eleven men as being in custody, they all ran away on processes being issued against them. Mariano Pinto was in truth the small minnow who had alone been landed; the sharks had all broken through the rotten net of Brazilian justice. In the only examination of Soares, on the authority of Mr. Bailey, the predecessor of Mr. Christie, and a gentleman against whom the Brazilians made no imputation, we were told that Consul Vereker had not the opportunity of being present. It was now pretended that no evidence could be obtained against Soares, but they conducted the only examination of him in the absence of Mr. Vereker, he being the man that could have deposed that he found stolen goods in the house of Soares. That was the way in which they conducted criminal justice in Brazil, so that, as Mr. Bailey further on said—

"It is much to be hoped that the Government will punish some of the local authorities, who have been clearly guilty of most culpable negligence."

He added that—

"The administration of justice is extremely faulty, and that an acquittal is almost invariably granted to those who can pay for it."

Another despatch from the delegate of police, dated December 19, contained a clear admission of the incompetency of the Brazilian tribunals—

"I used every diligence," he wrote, "to know of some other persons who may have robbed the cargo of the English barque; but all was unsuccessful; it resulting thence that the real robbers will remain, perhaps, unpunished, without justice having means to discover and process them."

The same document dwelt upon the difficulty of making the witnesses resident at Albardao attend and give evidence; their repugnance to appear before judicial authority, and the want of resources to compel their attendance—the first and most necessary function of all tribunals. Practically, nothing was done until the arrival of the gunboat. The Marquis Abrantes made a great parade of the constant endeavours which the central Government had made to induce the local Government to do its duty; but from an interview which took place with Senhor Rocha, the President of the province, on the 6th of April, it appeared that "no communication had reached him from the Brazilian Government" up to that time. The next day the President, having become apparently better informed of the circumstances, declared that he would direct the chief of police to undertake a searching inquiry, but that it would be difficult to find proofs, in consequence of the time that had elapsed. Of course it would be, and that was what they had all along complained of. However, another inquiry was ordered; but there being an objection to recognise Captain Saumarez as appearing in an official capacity, that officer consented to be present as a private individual. Captain Saumarez waited two or three weeks, but no investigation was entered upon; and, being then obliged to leave, it was admitted that the investigation had been purposely delayed till his departure. Well, another inquiry was instituted; but Consul Vereker complained, that the inquiry which was so entered upon, was held, not by the chief of police, as promised, but intrusted to a delegate with no powers, who might easily be frightened by the magistrates and powerful delinquents upon the spot. The irresistible impression left on the mind of the Consul was, that the proceedings were not undertaken for the purpose of discovering the truth, but rather of satisfying the Brazilian and British Governments by hushing up, through a mock inquiry, that part of the question which related to violence supposed to have been offered to the crew. The chief commissioner of police next appeared upon the scene himself—and this was one of the clearest and most manifest shams of the whole. His proceedings were thus described in the Echo do Sul—

"The chief of police, accompanied by the ensign and two or three police soldiers, went yesterday morning, and with luggage, outside the town. We believe that his Excellency proceeded to Albardao, the classical district of depredations, robberies, assassinations, and stranglings."

The paper proceeded to say—

"The distinguished chief of police goes very late in search of the criminals;"

Adding the significant expression—

"We believe, however, that if his Excellency should so desire, he will still meet with many vestiges of the crime."

Instead of going to Albardao, the chief of police only proceeded one-third of the way, and returned to town the following day. But the Consul, whom it was his object to deceive, found out the circumstances. The chief of police went away again, and after his departure Dr. Canarim, the delegate of police, informed Mr. Vereker that proofs had been obtained against six or seven individuals for plundering the cargo, but that no arrest had taken place, as others of greater influence were involved, and it was feared that the principals would escape if those of less note were prosecuted. This was reversing the course adopted in England, where it was always sought to reach the principals through the agents, the latter being frequently induced to give evidence for the prosecution. Dr. Canarim, who was the only one of the authorities that had shown the slightest desire to do justice, and who might possibly have done justice if he had not been thwarted by other authorities, persons in high positions, added, that the sub-delegate, Gonçalves, had been dismissed in consequence of not having performed his duties in connection with the wreck of the Prince of Wales, and that Faustino da Silveira, the inspector, who had been nominated to the same office, had been removed and prosecuted for his proceedings. Up to that moment, it had been contended that these officers had acted in the most exemplary manner. For a long time the Marquis of Abrantes would not admit that the officers had been dismissed for culpable conduct, because he knew that in that case the Government would by the law of nations be bound to make reparation; he said that the sub-delegate had been slightly negligent, had lost the prestige necessary for the discharge of his duty, and had therefore been dismissed. With regard to Faustino, he (Mr. Collier) was sorry to say that the Marquis knew very well, when he stated that the inspector had been dismissed for a slight negligence, that he had really been dismissed because he had not arrested a person who had been found with stolen property in his possession. That fact oozed out subsequently, for it appeared from the report of the chief of police, that Faustino had been dismissed for having thought he might let go one of the implicated persons, who afterwards escaped. Was it not manifest, then, that the Brazilian authorities had delayed the inquest till it was too late, that they had abstained from affording the protection which they were bound to afford, and that they had taken no real steps to apprehend the guilty persons and bring them to justice? For fourteen months only one man was arrested, and that man to this moment had not been tried; the great offenders had been suffered to escape. It was true, they had dismissed the inspector and the sub-delegate, but the main offender, Soares, in whose house the stolen property was found, who denied all knowledge of the wreck, and who had absconded when it was his duty to be present, was not only not prosecuted, but he was not accused; he still retained his office of justice of the peace, still represented the Brazilian Crown in that quarter, still exercised sway upon the coast; and those unfortunate persons who might be afterwards wrecked there, were to be still left to the tender mercies of that robber chieftain and his retainers.

These facts were conclusive against the Brazilian Government. It had been shown that justice had been denied, that it had been unreasonably delayed, and in either event, according to the principles of international law, a just claim arose against the Brazilian Government. He would not discuss the amount of the claim—it was enough to say, that Her Majesty's Government had always been willing to refer that point to arbitration. Her Majesty's Government would have been wanting in their duty if they any longer delayed to obtain by force that which had been denied to justice. He could not help thinking, if Government had quietly acquiesced in this denial of justice, there were many hon. Members opposite who would accuse them of indifference to British interests. He could quite suppose an hon. Gentleman opposite leading the attack, and asking, "Why we send our Consuls and Ministers abroad; why maintain fleets in all parts of the world; is it not to protect the lives, property, and liberties of Englishmen?" But what was the use of Consuls, Ministers, and fleets, if, when a great wrong had been committed upon British subjects, instead of demanding justice and insisting upon it, we allowed ourselves to be put off by words, subterfuge, and evasion? It appeared to him that Her Majesty's Government had acted in accordance with the principles of international law, and in accordance with the policy which the greatest statesmen of this country had pursued. It was upon this policy that Cromwell had acted, who, whatever his crimes, had almost redeemed them and rendered his usurpation illustrious by his resolution to enforce the just rights of Englishmen in every part of the world. Such was the policy of all our leading statesmen—of the noble Lord at the head of the Government—a policy which had been approved by the House thirteen years ago, when the noble Lord insisted upon redress from the Government of Greece in the case of Mr. Finlay and Don Pacifico. But the case against the Brazilian Government was much stronger, the outrage was of greater magnitude, and the tribunals of the country had been appealed to in vain. In the course of a long debate no one could be found to maintain that if recourse had been had to the ordinary tribunals and the appeal had failed, a conclusive case would not have been made out against the Government of Greece. It was only in the last resort that we had appealed to physical force to induce the Brazilian Government to do their duty. It was sometimes said, "Show forbearance to weak States." But weak States must learn not to presume too much upon their weakness. There were limits to the aggressions of the weak and to the forbearance of the strong. It was almost impossible to suppose that a case of this kind could have arisen with a strong or a highly-civilized Government. Did any one suppose that on the coast of France or America a justice of the peace could be found who was the possessor of stolen goods, and another who would resist by armed force the holding of an inquest? Had we such a strong case against France or America, he would venture to say, public opinion would scarcely brook the delay or the forbearance which had been shown to the Government of Brazil, and that hon. Gentlemen opposite would take Her Majesty's Government to task for having shown it. The interruption of friendly relations was an evil to be regretted, but it was an evil which, he believed, was past. Still, the evil of submitting to such treatment would be far greater, because such a course would permanently affect the security and comfort of every British resident in Brazil. He could not conceive a greater evil than that which would result if the House, by affirming the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman, should allow the intelligence to go out to British residents in foreign countries, and especially in countries half civilized, that the redress which they had a right to expect from England was now rendered precarious by the House of Commons. In a spirit friendly to the Brazilians, he trusted that this lesson would not be lost on them. If they aspired to take a place among civilized nations, they must no longer intrust such men as Soares, Faustino, and Gonçalves with the administration of justice, nor plead to other nations that their tribunals are incompetent. If the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs should, by the course he has pursued, have induced the Brazilian authorities to take measures to protect shipwrecked mariners and merchandise on the coast of Albardao, he would have done a service not only to this country but to humanity.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, the question was not whether the inhabitants of Albardao were robbers—not whether the barque Prince of Wales was plundered—nor even whether or not the tribunals of Brazil were or were not beyond our reach—the question simply was, whether the Brazilian Government had done anything which justified this country in adopting against that Government a measure of force, which, if resisted, would have occasioned war. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Collier) had made a great deal of a supposed fact, that the tribunals of Brazil were incompetent to render justice; but the hon. and learned Gentleman would scarcely have ventured to dwell so long on that point if he had been a responsible supporter of the Government. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to make war on every country where the tribunals were unable to afford redress to English citizens? The hon.

and learned Gentleman spoke of the bribery of Brazil. Was there bribery nowhere else? Was there not bribery in Russia; and yet would the hon. and learned Gentleman propose to go to war with Russia if any Englishman failed to obtain justice in a Russian court of law? Was Brazil the only power that could not enforce its criminal laws? Look at the present state of the South of Italy. Suppose that in the South of Italy an Englishman were carried by brigands into the mountains, and the Neapolitan authorities were unable to rescue the captive, did the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that England should seize a number of Italian ships in retaliation? Albardao was a strip of land on the southern extremity of the huge empire of Brazil and where in consequence the administration of justice was attended with extreme difficulty. As always happened in frontier districts, where two jurisdictions clashed, criminal classes congregated, as they could in such places more easily escape from the penalty of crime. The same was the case on the border of our own English counties. He believed that there was a great number of wreckers among that population, but the moment there appeared a chance of investigation the offenders crossed the frontier into the republic of Uruguay, and prosecution then became impossible. The wreck which gave rise to the present debate having occurred on a thinly-populated coast twenty miles from the nearest town, the police authorities, whose duty it was to investigate and report on such matters, did not arrive on the spot until two days after; and it would then have been impossible to recover the stolen property or arrest the offenders, as no doubt, they had fled over the border. All that took place after was perfectly immaterial. Consul Vereker, who went down to the coast, complained that the Brazilian authorities were slow in their proceedings; but that surely, could not be said to constitute a case of war. Consul Vereker demanded an inquest, and after some delay, in conformity with Brazilian law, the inquest was held; but of course it was perfectly useless, as far as the punishment of the wreckers or murderers was concerned, as they were far away over the frontier. This was the broad outline of the whole case, with the exception of Consul Vereker's impalpable suggestions and suspicions. The Consul had been defended by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and it was said that the Brazilian Government descended to run Consul Vereker down, describing him as mad; but there was the testimony of Consul Vereker's superior, Mr. Christie, in connection with that point. Mr. Christie wrote to Earl Russell—

"Your Lordship will understand the allusion made to Mr. Vereker's fallibility on questions of assassination. It is, of course, known to the Brazilian Government, as it is known to your Lordship, that Mr. Vereker, when he lately came to Rio from Rio Grande, on his way home, was in a state of nervous excitement with a delusion about attempts to assassinate him."

If, therefore, the British Government had been betrayed into the commission of an act of violence, it was because they had acted on the testimony of a man who was described by his own superior as being subject to delusion. Take the case of Soares. Consul Vereker stated that he found in his house a Bible which had evidently been taken from the wreck, not wetted and in a good condition, and upon this the accusation against Soares was founded. Now, did wreckers steal Bibles? Was that the kind of plunder about which they were most anxious? Why, it would be obvious, that when a wreck took place on a coast like that, an article such as a Bible might be carried to the chief family in the place without implying the least criminality. In this matter of reprisals the House must be guided by the masters of international law. Wheaton, the American jurist, said that reprisals could only be made in a case if clear and obvious; and Dr. Phillimore said—

"Letters of reprisal are not to be granted without a full knowledge of the causes that justify them. Moreover, it must be res minime dubia in which justice has been denied; and it must have been absolutely denied by all the tribunals of the country before which the cause could be brought. An erroneous sentence conscientiously given by free judges, unbiassed and unintimidated by any judicial authority, affords no just ground for reprisals."

The fact of finding the Bible Consul Vereker kept to himself, and there was no evidence in the papers that it was ever mentioned to the Brazilian authorities; therefore it could not be said that there had been a denial of justice. As to the packing-cases, they were never mentioned at the time, nor until some months afterwards, when these delusions were creeping upon the mind of Mr. Vereker, when he remembered that nine months before he had seen some empty packing-cases in the house of Senhor Soares. Was that evidence on which you could go to war?

Then they were told that Soares had absconded, but where did he abscond to? Why, to the capital of the province, Rio Grande, where all the authorities, judicial and military resided, and he was himself the first person to inform Mr. Consul Vereker of the wreck. The hon. and learned Gentleman tried to persuade the House that because Senhor Soares was at Rio Grande on the 12th, the wreck having taken place on the 8th, all inquiry was delayed by those four days. But the inspector whose business it was to deal with the matter had received the intelligence, had gone down to the coast, and was riding the eighty miles which were necessary to bring him to Rio Grande. After the principal offenders had escaped across the frontier, a delay of three months, six months, or eighteen months was of no consequence, because all subsequent proceedings were useless. There was, undoubtedly, a little delay. The inspector heard of the wreck on the 10th, and he did not reach Rio Grande until the 14th, and it was admitted by the Brazilians themselves, that if he had ridden faster, he might have been there a day earlier. It was true, that if that delay had been avoided, there might have been a better chance of catching the offenders; but before the House decided that on that account the conduct of the Brazilian Government justified a war, let them consider the length to which such a doctrine would carry them. There was no doubt, that owing to some delay on the part of the Foreign Office in applying to the Alabama the English law, the United States had suffered severely; but would they not have thought it the extremity of madness if on that account the United States had made reprisals upon our vessels? The difference was, that in the one case a strong Power was dealing with a weak one; and in the other, two strong Powers were dealing with each other.

But the act of violence which had been committed at Rio Janeiro was not founded solely upon the affair of the Prince of Wales. There was another case to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had thought it expedient not to allude, but about which a few words must be said. There was now before the King of the Belgians, for his arbitration, the most ridiculous case that had ever appeared in an English blue-book. Three young gentlemen, one of them a chaplain from the ship Forie, went upon an "outing" on the Brazilian territory. They were in plain clothes; and as they were going a long distance, he might assume that they wore shooting-jackets, or something analogous. They went to a public-house, and drank half a bottle of brandy and two bottles of wine. There was a good deal of dispute as to whether the wine was light claret or heavy burgundy, and the King of the Belgians would have to inquire into that question. If it was claret, such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been good enough to give the country, no impeachment could be made upon the sobriety of those gallant sailors; but on the other hand, if it was heavy wine, remembering that they had taken a long walk, and that the sun was hot, he thought that he might assume that their hearts were merry within them. The matter did not, however, rest upon à priori probabilities; an Englishman, named Robert Bennett, who kept a public-house, had made a deposition, which appeared at page 66 of the blue-book, in which he stated that these three gentlemen, when returning from their hotel, passed his house, and that they were then singing merrily. The Brazilian authorities asserted that they knocked the passengers about, and interfered with an old woman upon a horse. He did not think that there was any proof of that; and they themselves said that they were in an amiable frame of mind, and were distributing coppers to Blacks. That was evidence, not that they were drunk—no British sailor ever was—but that they were in a merry and generous humour. When they arrived at the post of a sentry, they went up to him, and one of them addressed him in bad Spanish. The sentry did not understand bad Spanish, and took it for a bit of Portuguese chaff, which was supposed, he could not see why, to be insulting to sentries. The sentry marched up to them in a very warlike attitude; and then began the conflict of testimony which was usual in the case of all encounters between the police and persons whom they arrested. The sentry declared that the three young gentlemen flourished their sticks; this they denied, stating that they had no sticks, although the chaplain had an umbrella; but they did not deny that the chaplain might have flourished his umbrella. They were arrested and taken to the watch-house; and if they had been ordinary travellers, he did not suppose that the greatest stickler for the doctrine of Civis Romanus sum

would have thought that there was much cause of complaint; but they were officers of the ship Forté, and, as representing the Majesty of England, were entitled to more consideration at the hands of the authorities. The officials, however, said that they did not know that they were officers of that ship; and although the gentlemen said that they repeatedly gave their names and addresses, yet it appeared that they could speak no Portuguese, and the police could understand nothing else. It was true that an interpreter was sent for, but he did not mend matters much, for he was a German, and could speak nothing but German. Mr. Pringle declared that he knew German; but if he spoke with the Hanoverian pronunciation taught in this country, it was probable that he would not be understood by men accustomed only to the vernacular German spoken in Austria. Müller, the interpreter, said that he did not understand the gentlemen; they declared that he did; but in this conflict of evidence probably hon. Members would think that Müller was the best judge. It further appeared that of the whole party the chaplain was the most disorderly and unreasonable. But, be that as it might, none of them could speak Portuguese, nor did they succeed much better with German. The consequence was that they were obliged to have recourse to gesticulations; one of them, a midshipman, who wore a naval waistcoat, pointing in an especial manner to his buttons. Now, he would ask the House whether, if a case of an analogous character had taken place in England, and three foreigners in dirty shooting-jackets were taken up for striking the police, and, having been brought before an inspector began, after jabbering a good deal in a language which no one could understand, to point violently to their stomachs, any great breach of international law would have been committed if the inspector did not well know what they were about? He was, of course, perfectly alive to the value of the Civis Romanus doctrine, but he at the same time was altogether opposed to our going to war because the authorities of a foreign country did not comprehend what a midshipman meant by an appeal to his buttons. Such, then, was the case of the Forté, one of the most disgraceful transactions by which the diplomatic proceedings of this country had been distinguished. The House would, perhaps, be glad to know what satisfaction Earl Russell under those circumstances demanded. He insisted that the guard should be dismissed the Brazilian service, that an apology should be made by the Government of Brazil for the outrage offered to British officers, and that a public censure should be passed on certain officials. Now, it appeared to him as if Earl Russell adopted a sort of tariff of insolence in his correspondence with foreign Powers. When he had to deal with a first-rate Power, nothing could be softer or more honey-like than the language which he used. Towards America, which was not only a first-rate but also a warlike Power, the tone in which he expressed himself was of that character; but he sometimes happened to be dealing with a nation which, although it stood in the first rank, did not happen to be fond of going to war; and even then, as was illustrated by the case of Captain M'Donald, who had been kept three days by the Prussian authorities in a filthy prison for no sufficient cause, the despatch in which our remonstrance with the Prussian Government was conveyed was of the most mild description, it being merely stated that the treatment of Captain M'Donald was not as friendly as it might be towards an English subject. On that occasion we ventured on no reprisals, nor were any Prussian vessels seized by an English admiral. In short, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs pocketed the insult inflicted on a British subject. But then he came to deal with secondary Powers, and the House would not fail to remember the despatch which he had written to the Government of Denmark in the autumn—a document couched in terms which an imperious man might indulge in towards his bailiff, but in which few gentlemen ever addressed each other. Whether the noble Lord intended it as a fitting prelude to the auspicious event which was to take place to-morrow he could not say. But, going a step lower in the scale of foreign Powers, the noble Lord lighted on Brazil, a young country, newly escaped from the throes of revolution, which had established order within her limits with the greatest difficulty and praiseworthy energy, and which had done more than any other State to diminish the atrocious traffic in slaves, while she had cultivated the most friendly relations with England, and had given to us the utmost commercial advantages, and which therefore deserved the utmost consideration at our hands. Yet upon such a country it was that the noble Lord had thought proper to make the demands which he had enforced upon her by seizing her property at sea, because of a trumpety charge which rested on the testimony of a mad Consul and three tipsy sailors. ["Hear!" and "Oh, oh!"] He was aware that, whatever folly or madness an English Government might commit, the appeal to the Civis Romanus doctrine was rarely without its effect upon an English audience. He should not on the present occasion attempt to combat its weight, but would remind the House that in these days, when moral influence counted for so much among nations, we should lose that influence if we were thought to cringe to the strong and bully the weak. He was anxious to wipe this stain from our escutcheon. He knew it might not be a popular task, and it might not succeed on a division of the House; but those who thought it a stigma greater than would be entailed by any disaster in arms were bound to importune the House on every occasion, till they had induced their countrymen to look at the matter in a more reasonable light. He, for one, thought the greatest glory of the country would be to treat all Powers weak and strong, with the same justice and the same courtesy, and not to take advantage of accidental strength, which existed to-day and might pass away to-morrow, to commit an outrage upon a friendly Power which she might never forget.

MR. BUXTON said, that Brazil had singularly strong claims to be treated with the utmost consideration by England. Even were that not so, it surely was one of the first and foremost principles of statesmanship that in our dealings with foreign nations we should not be quick and violent in taking offence, and in avenging provocation by force; but that when disputes arose we should display self-control, and, all the more because of our irresistible power, should treat them with tenderness for their feelings, generosity for their weaknesses, and reverence for their rights. No question of home politics, nor even any question as to which party would be in power, could vie in real moment with the maintenance by England of a gentle and generous policy towards foreign nations. So deeply did he feel this, that before he began to study this question, he resolved that however painful the mortification to himself might be of such a course, he would not shrink from giving his vote against the Government if it proved that

Lord Russell had broken through that great principle. And although he had come decidedly to the conclusion to support the Government, he should not feel easy to do so without discriminating between parts of the affair, and raising his humble voice in protest against the tone by which one portion of our proceedings was marked. It was fortunate that the two cases of the officers of the Forst and of the Prince of Wales stood quite apart. Into the case of the officers he would not enter; but he wished to make some comments on the other affair. At the outset, he thought the ground might be cleared of the allegations with regard to the murder of some of the crew. There were serious grounds for suspecting that they had been murdered, but of proof there was not a particle; and the blame for the obscurity in which that part of the matter lay rested in fact on Consul Vereker himself. He visited the scene of the wreck, and finding, to use his own phrase, some unwillingness on the part of the authorities to show him where the corpses were buried, he actually pressed them no further, and went away. Had he shown the least force of will, and insisted on seeing the bodies himself, it would have been impossible for them to refuse. However, he (Mr. Buxton) would not dwell on this, because in fact the British Government, though often referring to these suspicions, did not base any demands upon them. He would pass on, therefore, to the question of the plunder of the cargo and of the dead bodies. Lord Russell's demand for compensation was based on the ground that "the Brazilian Government was responsible for the losses occasioned by the culpable proceedings of the authorities;" and this culpability seemed to have consisted mainly in the long delays before the wreckers were prosecuted, and then that after all the justice of the peace of the district had not been even put on his trial on the charge of participating in the crime. Taking the last point first, the hon. Gentleman showed that the main ground for that charge was that two Bibles from the wreck were found in his house. But surely the fact that a gentleman of the neighbourhood should have received two books that had come ashore, and which he made no attempt to conceal from the British Consul, was very slender ground for accusing him of being a wrecker. The Brazilian Government would not, in his opinion, have been justified in putting the principal inhabitant of that district—the justice of the peace—upon his trial on such trifling grounds of accusation. But, after all, the main charge against the Brazilian Government was that of extreme slowness and ill-success in proceeding against the wreckers. With regard to this they must examine what had actually been done. The Brazilian Minister heard of the incident at the end of July. On August 10 he despatched—to use his own words—"most positive and stringent orders to the President of the province for a zealous and careful inquiry." He repeated these orders in October and in December, and on four occasions in the following year. The Imperial Government, then, had not treated the matter with indifference. It seemed that the President of the Province and the chief of police had also given immediate and peremptory orders, and that Consul Vereker himself declared that the delegate of police had acted with prompt energy. The result was that in about four months one man was arrested and two more had fled the country. This might seem a small result to an Englishman accustomed to the lightning speed of the Court of Chancery and of our other courts of justice. The differences, however, were very great: the scene of the wreck was 1,000 miles from the seat of Government; the local authorities complained that they had no force with which to compel the attendance of witnesses, and that from the strong feeling of the people against the inquiry no one would come forward of himself. Ultimately, however, two of the district officials were dismissed, eleven other men were prosecuted, and steps were taken to apprehend those who had fled to Montevideo. These circumstances hardly seemed to justify Lord Russell in making such vehement complaints, and basing on them a claim for compensation, and using violence to enforce that claim. It was also to be regretted that Mr. Christie should have written such insulting despatches. Upon the whole, up to this point, he thought that Brazil had scarcely been treated with the forbearance and magnanimity which always ought to mark the foreign policy of England. But at this point a step was taken by Lord Russell which seemed to him (Mr. Buxton) to make the most vital difference in the whole affair. He expressed to Brazil his readiness to entertain "any proposal for arbitration on the questions at issue." That suggestion was one of the highest importance. It had, indeed, been said that in the case of the Prince of Wales Lord Russell only offered arbitration as to the amount to be paid, but not as to the principle of the claim. In a previous despatch this was all that was offered; but in the one of November 4 Lord Russell distinctly offered to entertain any proposal for arbitration, without drawing any distinctions whatever. And Mr. Christie, on January 1, expressly wrote to the Brazilian Prime Minister—

“I declare my readiness to entertain, for the consideration of Her Majesty’s Government, any reasonable proposal, as, for example, a reference of all the questions in dispute to arbitration.”

This obviously included every part of each dispute. By this offer Lord Russell had, he thought, atoned for all his previous severity. They must bear in mind the immense value of such a precedent. Few were the examples—if, indeed, any could be found—of a powerful nation, which thought itself aggrieved, of its own will offering to refer the whole case in dispute to the judgment of an independent arbiter. If it once became the custom among civilized nations, instead of judging in their own quarrels, and enforcing their claims by violence, to refer them, wherever it was possible, to an impartial bystander, this would be a vast stride towards a reign of peace among the nations of the world. In the protocols of Paris that principle had been expressly laid down and agreed to by all the great Powers, but had hitherto been left in neglect. The precedent, however, now afforded would tend to give that principle practical sway over international policy. Seeing that amid all the irritation which the affair had excited, and in the plenitude of his power, Lord Russell had stayed his hand and offered to let all the questions in dispute be settled by an impartial arbiter, he had set an example of surpassing value to those who wielded the destinies of mankind.

MR. C. BENTINCK said, it was contrary to the principles of international law, as well as unreasonable, to ask a country, in a case of this kind, to do more than its own laws directed or permitted it to do. It was enough if the country appealed to acted in good faith; and if in this case Brazil had acted bond fide, we had no right to complain. Each State had its own form of procedure, and a foreigner might, perhaps, object to the English principle of not allowing an accused person to be examined. As to reprisals, it had been justly said that they were not allowable save in the case of res minime dubie, and hence they were very rare. There were only two occasions in the recent history of this country when reprisals were enforced. One was against Naples. The noble Lord now at the head of the Government, who was then Foreign Secretary, complained of a gross infraction of a treaty. Upon that allegation ships were seized, and, from an entertaining chapter by M. Guizot, they learnt that the noble Lord was advised by counsel against the course which he had pursued. The French Government interfered in the matter, and the noble Lord was extricated from a disagreeable position in which he had placed himself by his own rashness. The other case was against Greece. Mr. Pacifico’s claim was for £21,000; and after reprisals had been made and the matter referred to arbitration he was awarded only £150. When the circumstances were known, it became clear that the noble Lord was wrong. Since, therefore, the noble Lord was wrong in resorting to reprisals in both these cases, he should not be surprised if the same conclusion followed ultimately in the present case. There was very little positive evidence that the Brazilian authorities were at all in fault; the only evidence in fact was that of Mr. Consul Vereker. Mr. Consul Vereker was not a very trustworthy witness, and a great deal of what he said was neither positive nor direct. As to the Bibles, he thought it most unlikely they would have been produced had they been stolen; and as to the empty packing-cases, they were only mentioned after many months had elapsed. In fact, no answer had been given to the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Bramley-Moore), that the cargo was of such a nature that the greater portion of it must have inevitably gone to the bottom. The real question was whether the Government of Brazil had acted fairly and bond fide, and whether they had done all for the owners of the Prince of Wales which they would have done had the owners been their own countrymen. The despatches of Lord Russell were inconsistent, the first limiting the amount to be demanded as compensation to the value of the cargo, the last demanding compensation for the cargo and also for the negligence of the Brazilian authorities. He did not know how compensation could be demanded for negligence of authorities, or what part of the sum demanded was for the negligence, or to whom it was to be paid if recovered. As to the failure of justice, there was no evidence that the armed force outnumbered that which accompanied the municipal judge, and it seemed to be unfairly assumed that the municipal judge had the power of a coroner to hold an inquest. A justice of the peace had no such power in this country, and there was no evidence that a similar officer in Brazil possessed it. The noble Lord made an unfortunate reference to Cornwall in his despatch. But, even admitting the analogy, did the House know who was the coroner for the Scilly Islands? It was the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith) who, not being present, might be holding an inquest. Supposing a foreign ship were wrecked and plundered on the Scilly Islands when that hon. Member was attending, as he did with admirable diligence, to his duties in Parliament, would it be a casus belli or a case for reprisals by a foreign Power because the hon. Member or his deputy did not hold an inquest? Another very important matter to be considered was that in this country it was the custom in the case of wrecks for the coroner to hold an inquest upon only one body, if there were no prima facie evidence to show it to be desirable that more inquests should be held. He thought the less said about the wreck the better, seeing that the Brazilian Government guarded themselves over and over again by saying (and Consul Vereker confirmed them) that there was no political authority nearer than Rio Grande—a distance of eighty miles. They all knew that there had been frequently wrecks in this country, and no one had ever heard of a single instance of a demand being made against the Government or of reprisals being endeavoured to be enforced. As the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) had alluded to cases of violent despatches, written against weak and second-rate Powers, he would refer to the case of Mr. Watson Taylor, which he brought under the attention of the House last year. There was a close analogy between that case and the present. There was a denial of justice, and a plunder of property. Mr. Taylor was to inhabit an island under the protection of the Italian Government, and the Government, in breach of faith, withdrew that protection. The most trumpery and ridiculous charges were made against Mr. Taylor, who was cited to appear before a distant tribunal; and when he consulted our diplomatic agent, he was advised to absent himself. The Turin Government refused to stop the prosecution, and, instead of urging the claims of his countryman, Sir James Hudson wrote home to the Government that it was not possible to stop the prosecution, and Mr. Taylor was convicted. Upon the allegation that there was no power to stop the prosecution, backed by the opinion of a Turin advocate, the Government here determined that Mr. Taylor had no claim for relief. When he brought the case under the attention of the House there were no bounds to the indignation of the Treasury bench. It was said to be unjust and ungenerous to dispute the high authority and solemn verdict of Sir James Hudson; and the Solicitor General, one of the greatest ornaments of the profession to which he also had the honour to belong, gravely argued the untenable proposition that the Piedmontese Government had no power to stop a public prosecution. The eloquence of the Solicitor General had scarcely ceased to flow, when there occurred the outbreak at Sarnico; many persons were arrested, imprisoned, and prosecuted, when all of a sudden the prosecution was dismissed and the whole of the prisoners were set at liberty, with the exception of one Garibaldian colonel, who was committed for trial on a charge of burglary. Nor was that all. The same farce was played over again after the action of Aspromonte, when Garibaldi and his friends were set at liberty under an amnesty. It was plain that the Italian Government had the same power to stop the prosecution against Mr. Taylor, and what he wanted to know was, why Her Majesty's Government did not insist upon the withdrawal of the charge in that case? Why was undue favour to be shown to the Italian Government? Brazil had at least as many claims upon England as Italy. She had never humiliated us, she had always fulfilled her obligations, and her credit was better than that of Italy, for while the Brazilian Five per Cents were at par, at the present moment the Italian Five per Cents were only at 70. Could it be that the noble Lord at the head of the Government was still resting on the popularity of what he called his Italian policy? He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not changed his opinions upon these questions of reprisals. The right hon. Gentleman sat on the same bench with the noble Lord whose Pacifico policy he attacked with so much success; but he trusted the right hon. Gentleman still thought, as he thought then, that there should not be one rule for the weak, and another for the strong, and that we ought not to enforce against a small Power like Brazil, a claim which we ourselves would not concede to any other nation in existence.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, surely the Government would not allow such a case as this—a case involving the honour and justice of England—to pass without a single word of explanation or remark from the Treasury Bench. He had not intended to address the House until he had heard the views of the Government; but as no Member of the Government had risen, he now felt called upon to offer a few observations. He could not help saying that he had never listened to a more able and astute, and yet, at the same time, a more unfair or more untenable speech than that of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier). In this Brazilian case the position of our Government was a very curious one, because they had founded their claim to compensation on the ground of the neglect of the Brazilian authorities to render them justice. He would first deal with the question of delay, and here it was necessary that we should consider the peculiar circumstances of Brazil. Brazil had been established only about forty years. During that period, by the ability of those at the head of affairs, and by the entire good faith always shown by the Brazilian Government, they had succeeded in converting that which was only a province of one of the smallest kingdoms in Europe into a flourishing empire, with a credit, a reputation, and a power which those who contemplated their prospects forty years ago would have deemed impossible. Moreover, the Brazilian Government had been obliged to attempt to establish civilized rule, order, municipal institutions, judicial tribunals, and commercial relations over a coast exceeding those of Spain, France, and England together. Hence, it was not fair to institute a comparison between the circumstances of a country such as Brazil, and those of a country like England or France, which had for centuries enjoyed a regular and established Government, such as Brazil was only endeavouring to attain to. He could not admit, with the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord

Robert Cecil), that there had been something in the nature of neglect on the part of the local authorities in Brazil which might fairly be made a subject of complaint by Her Majesty's Government. The wreck took place on the 8th or 9th of June, at a spot seventy-eight miles distant from Rio Grande do Sul. It appeared that the district between the two places was a very difficult one, that to traverse it required a fatiguing journey of more than two days, notwithstanding Mr. Vereker's enthusiasm and zeal, which induced him to ride until late at night; and he arrived so exhausted that he and those with him could not go four miles further. The wreck was reported by the sub-delegate of police, who lived twenty-four miles further from Rio than the scene of the wreck, on the 12th, and our Consul started from Rio Grande on the 13th, arrived in the district on the 15th, and reached the wreck on the 16th. He immediately returned to Rio Grande, where he arrived on the 18th, after a journey of two days. Immediately the delegate sent his orders to the police in a letter, dated the 19th. The delegate also referred the Consul to the municipal judge, as the proper authority to institute inquiries. This he did on the 22nd. The papers were received in England on the 2nd of September, and on the 5th of the same month what was the course pursued by our Foreign Office? With nothing before them but the ex parte statements of Mr. Consul Vereker—with the proceedings of the Brazilian Government before them—with, as it appeared to him, not one single hour lost on the part of the Brazilian authorities, the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State wrote thus to Mr. Vereker, on the 5th of September—

"It is evident from your despatches that there has been gross negligence, if not misconduct, on the part of the Brazilian local authorities, and that there is even reason to suspect that the plunder of the cargo and of the effects of the passengers, and even the murder of some of the survivors from the wreck, have been the result of that negligence. Lord Russell has instructed Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Rio, to whom you will doubtless have forwarded copies of your despatches on this subject, to lose no time in calling the attention of the Brazilian Government to this case, and to request that a searching inquiry may be instituted, with a view to the punishment of the parties convicted of negligence, or of being concerned in the plunder of the vessel, and that those who may be convicted of outrages upon those who survived the wreck may be brought to justice."

Now, proceeding step by step in this matter, he would first ask the House, whether, bearing in mind the facts he had stated, there was any ground whatever for this allegation by our Government that there had been gross negligence on the part of the local authorities of Brazil as far as establishing a judicial investigation was concerned? Without charging his hon. Friend the Under Secretary with anything like negligence, it was nevertheless true that greater delay took place in writing his own letter, just quoted, on this important case, than had occurred on the part of any single one of the Brazilian authorities. Up to that time there was nothing on earth to justify that accusation of negligence, and yet at that date Her Majesty's Government adopted this arbitrary and offensive tone towards a Government which had the greatest claims upon their friendship and consideration.

He would, before proceeding, say a word as to the conduct of the Government in relation to Brazil. There was no country on the face of the globe that ought to be treated with so much friendly consideration as the empire of Brazil. From the very first moment after the Brazilian Government was established, it had manifested a desire to conciliate English good feeling, to protect English commerce, to promote the introduction of English capital, and had exerted itself in every possible form to make its good intentions well understood by the people of this country. Therefore Brazil was the State towards which, of all others, the British Government ought to have exercised all due forbearance. But he was bound to say that for many years past the very reverse of that had been the fact, and that the very case now under consideration was only one of a long series of indignities which had been offered to the Brazilian Government by the Government of England; and that principally during the time when the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) had had the greatest influence over our foreign affairs. He would not now speak of an outrage greater than was ever committed against international law, and in respect to which, when their acts were called in question, the English Government was afraid to justify them before an independent tribunal; but even within a recent period Her Majesty's Government had acted towards the Brazilian Government in a manner which they would not have dared to follow towards any other Government on the face of the globe. He alluded to their conduct in regard to the Mixed Commission at Rio. We established a few cases against the Brazilian Government before the Mixed Commission; and when that Government succeeded, by the unanimous decision of the Commissioners on both sides, in establishing some few cases against us, Her Majesty's Government stopped all further proceedings, tore up the convention, and refused to have anything more to do with it. The present case, therefore, was only another exemplification of the arbitrary spirit in which the British Government had dealt with the Brazilian Government for years past.

But to return to the facts of this question. Her Majesty's Government some time afterwards changed their ground. And when they spoke of the delay of the Brazilian Government, he would venture to notice the extraordinary delay on their part in presenting their view of the case to the Court of Brazil. The wreck occurred on the 8th of June; the various proceedings were instituted; and it was not till the 8th of February following that Lord Russell made the slightest allusion to any question of compensation. Up to that period our Government had confined their complaint to an allegation of the want of due diligence shown by the Brazilian authorities, and to a demand for an investigation, with a view to the punishment of the guilty persons. But on the 8th of February Lord Russell wrote to Mr. Baillie, insisting, in addition to these things, upon adequate compensation to the owners of the vessel. Thus, out of the whole fourteen months' delay, eight months were due to the delay of Her Majesty's Government in putting forth their claim, which claim they put forth in the most arbitrary manner, and which he would show was dealt with in the most energetic and straightforward spirit by the authorities at Rio, before whom it was then for the first time placed. That letter of the 8th of February was not presented to the Court of Brazil till the 17th of March. On that day Mr. Christie wrote to the Brazilian Minister, claiming compensation in the terms of Earl Russell's despatch. Taking a fortnight to consider a demand put forward by the British Government, and which that Government was going to enforce with all the power at its command, the Brazilian Government replied that no Government was responsible for outrages committed without its concurrence or instigation by its subjects upon foreigners, and that in such case it was only bound to use every available means for preventing and punishing them. The learned Solicitor General would scarcely deny that that was an accurate statement of international law. It was not till very nearly the end of May that the real issue was ascertained between the Brazilian and English Governments, and as soon as it was ascertained it was at once met by the Brazilian Government with a clear declaration that they were then willing and had long been anxious to fulfil the obligations imposed upon them by international law. It was worth while considering on what grounds compensation could be claimed. Clearly no claim for compensation could be put forward by the English Government upon the ground that the local authorities had been remiss in setting on foot and prosecuting a judicial investigation. That might be a question for diplomatic communication between the two Governments; and if those communications were not successful, it might be a ground for coolness between them, for the suspension of diplomatic relations, or even for ulterior measures; but it was no ground for a demand for compensation. The only ground for that must be that the authorities on the Brazilian coast were not there to protect the parties, or that they were responsible almost as insurers for the safety of property which the wind and the waves might wash on their shores. The hon. and learned Gentleman would scarcely assert that. The hon. and learned Gentleman might say that the Brazilian Government was liable for the negligence of their officers in not protecting property; but it could not lie in the mouth of the Government to make such an assertion. For from the beginning to the end of the correspondence, they had never taken that ground. The only ground they had taken was that the Brazilian Government had been remiss in prosecuting the offenders after the wreck had been plundered; or, as the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) had asserted on his own authority, after the British subjects had been murdered. For that assertion, however, there was not the slightest justification in the papers. The British Government claimed £3,200 from the Brazilian Government because British subjects had been injured by their negligence to that amount; but there was nothing whatever in the papers to show the slightest negligence on the part of the Brazilian Government contributing to that injury. The only thing was this, that there had been some slight negligence in communicating the facts from one officer to another; but that did not contribute in the slightest degree to the plunder of the wreck, for which compensation was claimed. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth had asserted many things in a manner which might lead persons who had not read the papers to think that they really were positive facts which had happened, and which were stated in the papers; but the truth was, that he had asserted as facts circumstances which were nothing more than inferences drawn by himself. For instance, the hon. and learned Gentleman positively asserted that Senhor Soares was concerned in the plunder of the wreck, and he treated him as one of the parties implicated in the outrages which occurred at Albardao. The fact was that the only evidence against Senhor Soares was, that two Bibles were found in his house long after, and something was said about one or two cases being seen in his yard. But from one end of the papers to the other it was never shown that Senhor Soares was even there at the time. The only evidence was that three days after he was at a place seventy miles off, and he mentioned there—not as a thing he had himself seen at all—that some bodies had been washed ashore near his house. When he was asked about the wreck, he said he knew nothing of it. From this fact the hon. and learned Gentleman asserted as a thing that was certain, that Senhor Soares was there at the time of the wreck, and that he knew of it; and he almost went the length of saying that he must have been present at the rifling of the trunks, and must have taken the Bibles which were afterwards found in his house. He took not the slightest notice of the statement in the papers that the articles found in Soares' house had been taken there by some of his servants, who might have been present at the wreck, and who, having picked them up, carried them home without him having the slightest knowledge of it. The hon. and learned Member led the House to believe that the Brazilian Government, knowing Soares' guilt, had done all they could to protect him, and had refused to dismiss him from his post. What the Brazilian Government had done was simply what the Home Secretary or any other English Minister would do. They had not taken the allegations of officials like Consul Vereker; they had not taken rumours and reports; but they had instituted a judicial investigation; and the Marquis D'Abrantes, when asked to put Soares on his trial, said, "I cannot do it, because we have had an investigation which has satisfied us that there is no ground for a prosecution, and we refuse to do what the laws of Brazil will not allow us." That is an instance of the manner in which the hon. and learned Gentleman has misled Gentlemen who have not read the evidence through. Again, the hon. and learned Member said it was the duty of the Brazilian officials who were on the spot to institute an inquest immediately on the bodies; but was he aware of what the law of Brazil was on this point? Was he able to state that the Brazilian law prescribed, that whenever a wreck occurred on the coast, any and every authority who happened to be on the spot should institute an inquiry? Suppose a wreck were to happen on the coast of Cornwall, would it be the duty of all the magistrates resident on the spot to institute an inquiry? The hon. and learned Member had never shown, nor was there the slightest proof in the papers, that the two magistrates referred to had in the slightest degree transgressed their duty, or that they neglected to do anything which the Brazilian law prescribed. In the same manner he said it was Senhor Soares' duty to send a message seventy-eight miles to get an inquest held. Speaking from his own feelings as a magistrate—whatever he might do in his private capacity from the promptings of humanity—in his magisterial functions he should hesitate some time before he expressed seventy-eight miles to apprise the coroner of any wreck which might happen in his neighbourhood. He contended that in this case the communication was made as speedily as it could be made, that as soon as the authorities could be called on to act they did act, and beyond that there was nothing in the papers to show that there was negligence.

The next point to be considered was the conduct of the authorities at Rio Janeiro: and here, so far from taking the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought that the conduct of the Brazilian Government, under circumstances almost approaching to intentional provocation, had been considerate and dignified. His hon.

and learned Friend said that nothing could be more reasonable than the proposition made by Her Majesty's Ministers, and that the Brazilian Government showed their mala fides by refusing it. Now, that was not the position of the Brazilian Government. To show that it was not, he would refer the House to the following, which were the concluding passages in the despatch of the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, dated October 8:—

"But the time is come when Her Majesty's Government must ask compensation for the plundering of the wreck and of the bodies, and they must look for this compensation to the Brazilian Government, as being responsible for the losses occasioned by the culpable proceedings of their authorities, whose guilt they have at length discovered and admitted. I have therefore to instruct you to demand from the Brazilian Government compensation for the losses that have been occasioned to the owner of the Prince of Wales by the wholesale plunder of the wreck and crew. Mr. Stephens claims for cargo and stores, £5,500; for freight, £1,025 19s.; in all, £6,525 19s. But this claim is not at present sustained by any sufficient evidence; and it would be incumbent on Mr. Stephens to produce a properly certified estimate of the value of the cargo and stores; and if any demand is to be made for personal property belonging to any passenger on board, proper evidence on this point must be adduced. But on the Brazilian Government admitting the principle, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to accept a fair arbitration on the question as to the actual amount of compensation to be made, and they will leave the same arbiter or arbiters to determine the amount of the compensation to be made to relatives of the people on board whose bodies were stripped and plundered. At the same time Her Majesty's Government, having regard to the extraordinary delay and procrastination of the Brazilian authorities in the investigation of this grave matter, must insist that any such arbitration shall be set on foot without loss of time, and shall be conducted with all possible speed to an issue."

That despatch sought to make the Brazilian Government responsible for violence committed by persons over whom it had no control. He did not use the term in an offensive sense when he said that a more untruthful statement of a case than that contained in the passage he had quoted could not be made. He meant that the statement was utterly inaccurate. Then the offered arbitration was made on these terms—

"But on the Brazilian Government admitting the principle, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to accept a fair arbitration on the question as to actual amount;" and so on.

That was not the kind of offer stated by his hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. COLLIER wished to explain that what he had said was, the British Government had offered to refer the amount to arbitration, the principle being admitted.

Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD was glad of the correction. What he had to deal with now was not the arguments of his hon. and learned Friend, but the position of Her Majesty's Government. It was utterly impossible for the Brazilian Government to assent to such a species of arbitration as that. It did not make any difference whether they might have to pay 3,200 pence or 3,200 pounds. The question was whether they were responsible for losses by winds or waves, or by the violence of subjects of their own over whose proceedings they had no control, but whom they had done their best to prosecute, and whom they had pursued with all the energy in their power. It was quite impossible they could admit a principle which was entirely new in international law. The question really was, whether the Brazilian Government had done their best to pursue the guilty parties—had used all the means in their power to secure the administration of justice. They might judge of that from results. Two of their officials had been dismissed, and up to the present time eleven persons had been prosecuted and convicted. It was perfectly true that some of the parties concerned in those occurrences had escaped over the boundary before the authorities had been able to apprehend them; but there was a law in Brazil under which persons who were summoned and did not appear might be adjudged contumacious, and though such persons could not be put in prison, they would never dare to return to the country from which they had escaped. The Government of the country had done their best to enforce the law against those who had escaped for the moment. He thought, therefore, that he had now shown that neither as regarded the local authorities or the Central Government at Rio Janeiro was there the slightest ground for saying that there had been that failure of justice on which alone, according to international law, any claim for compensation could be grounded. His noble Friend (Lord R. Cecil) had pointed to another grave objection to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government. It was laid down, not only in one book, but in all the books to which he had been able to refer, that reprisals were not to be taken except where there was the clearest case of a failure of justice. His hon. and learned Friend (the Solicitor General), would say that such was the case in this instance; but he begged to submit that where there was a conflict of testimony, where many of the circumstances had not yet been ascertained, and where, at most, the ground of action was not a denial of justice in any way, but a certain omission or neglect of duty—for that was the furthest Her Majesty's Government could go—there was no ground for reprisals according to the best authorities on international law.

A good deal had been said regarding the relative positions of Brazil and this country; and he must confess that, as an Englishman, he did feel it was a painful thing that year after year cases should be brought under the notice of the public, showing that, without exception, the rights of British subjects were enforced in an arbitrary manner where the Powers against whom those proceedings were taken were weak, and that almost at the same moment there occurred the most flagrant instances of British interests being neglected and trampled upon where the guilty parties were subjects or officials of a strong Power. What was at present going on between this country and the Federal States of America? Within the last few months there had occurred a case of a British vessel peacefully navigating the waters between Matamoras and the Havannah; she was chased by a Federal cruiser, and took refuge in Spanish waters, into which she was followed by the cruiser, chased ashore, and burnt. Had we heard of any reprisals in the case of that transaction. Take the case of the Adèle. She was carrying the British Mails between one port and another; she was seized by a Federal cruiser and carried into Key West, where the seals of the mail bags were broken. Had reprisals been ordered for that transaction? There was a third case, that of the Pearl, which had some bales of cloth on board. She was on her voyage from a neutral to a British port, when she was seized and carried into a Federal port to await a trial. We had not heard of any reprisals there. In those cases we were told that Her Majesty's Government could not interfere with the judicial authorities of the United States—that they must abide the decision of those authorities. The reason might be a very good one for not interfering; but when the Government paid that deference to the judicial authority of one Government, why did they refuse to pay it to that of another? They could not draw a distinction between the

ter, he would first ask the House, whether, bearing in mind the facts he had stated, there was any ground whatever for this allegation by our Government that there had been gross negligence on the part of the local authorities of Brazil as far as establishing a judicial investigation was concerned? Was he able to state that the Brazilian law prescribed, that whenever a wreck occurred on the coast, any and every authority who happened to be on the spot should institute an inquiry? Suppose a wreck were to happen on the coast of Cornwall, would it be the duty of all the magistrates resident on the spot to institute an inquiry? The hon. and learned Member had never shown, nor was there the slightest proof in the papers, that the two magistrates referred to had in the slightest degree transgressed their duty, or that they neglected to do anything which the Brazilian law prescribed. In the same manner he said it was Senhor Soares' duty to send a message seventy-eight miles to get an inquest held. Speaking from his own feelings as a magistrate—whatever he might do in his private capacity from the promptings of humanity—in his magisterial functions he should hesitate some time before he expressed seventy-eight miles to apprise the coroner of any wreck which might happen in his neighbourhood. He contended that in this case the communication was made as speedily as it could be made, that as soon as the authorities could be called on to act they did act, and beyond that there was nothing in the papers to show that there was negligence.

The next point to be considered was the conduct of the authorities at Rio Janeiro: and here, so far from taking the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought that the conduct of the Brazilian Government, under circumstances almost approaching to intentional provocation, had been considerate and dignified. His hon.

and learned Friend said that nothing could be more reasonable than the proposition made by Her Majesty's Ministers, and that the Brazilian Government showed their mala fides by refusing it. Now, that was not the position of the Brazilian Government. To show that it was not, he would refer the House to the following, which were the concluding passages in the despatch of the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, dated October 8:—

"But the time is come when Her Majesty's Government must ask compensation for the plundering of the wreck and of the bodies, and they must look for this compensation to the Brazilian Government, as being responsible for the losses occasioned by the culpable proceedings of their authorities, whose guilt they have at length discovered and admitted. I have therefore to instruct you to demand from the Brazilian Government compensation for the losses that have been occasioned to the owner of the Prince of Wales by the wholesale plunder of the wreck and crew. Mr. Stephens claims for cargo and stores, £5,500; for freight, £1,025 19s.; in all, £6,525 19s. But this claim is not at present sustained by any sufficient evidence; and it would be incumbent on Mr. Stephens to produce a properly certified estimate of the value of the cargo and stores; and if any demand is to be made for personal property belonging to any passenger on board, proper evidence on this point must be adduced. But on the Brazilian Government admitting the principle, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to accept a fair arbitration on the question as to the actual amount of compensation to be made, and they will leave the same arbiter or arbiters to determine the amount of the compensation to be made to relatives of the people on board whose bodies were stripped and plundered. At the same time Her Majesty's Government, having regard to the extraordinary delay and procrastination of the Brazilian authorities in the investigation of this grave matter, must insist that any such arbitration shall be set on foot without loss of time, and shall be conducted with all possible speed to an issue."

That despatch sought to make the Brazilian Government responsible for violence committed by persons over whom it had no control. He did not use the term in an offensive sense when he said that a more untruthful statement of a case than that contained in the passage he had quoted could not be made. He meant that the statement was utterly inaccurate. Then the offered arbitration was made on these terms—

"But on the Brazilian Government admitting the principle, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to accept a fair arbitration on the question as to actual amount;" and so on.

That was not the kind of offer stated by his hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. COLLIER wished to explain that what he had said was, the British Government had offered to refer the amount to arbitration, the principle being admitted.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD was glad of the correction. What he had to deal with now was not the arguments of his hon. and learned Friend, but the position of Her Majesty's Government. It was utterly impossible for the Brazilian Government to assent to such a species of arbitration as that. It did not make any difference whether they might have to pay 3,200 pence or 3,200 pounds. The question was whether they were responsible for losses by winds or waves, or by the violence of subjects of their own over whose proceedings they had no control, but whom they had done their best to prosecute, and whom they had pursued with all the energy in their power. It was quite impossible they could admit a principle which was entirely new in international law. The question really was, whether the Brazilian Government had done their best to pursue the guilty parties—had used all the means in their power to secure the administration of justice. They might judge of that from results. Two of their officials had been dismissed, and up to the present time eleven persons had been prosecuted and convicted. It was perfectly true that some of the parties concerned in those occurrences had escaped over the boundary before the authorities had been able to apprehend them; but there was a law in Brazil under which persons who were summoned and did not appear might be adjudged contumacious, and though such persons could not be put in prison, they would never dare to return to the country from which they had escaped. The Government of the country had done their best to enforce the law against those who had escaped for the moment. He thought, therefore, that he had now shown that neither as regarded the local authorities or the Central Government at Rio Janeiro was there the slightest ground for saying that there had been that failure of justice on which alone, according to international law, any claim for compensation could be grounded. His noble Friend (Lord R. Cecil) had pointed to another grave objection to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government. It was laid down, not only in one book, but in all the books to which he had been able to refer, that reprisals were not to be taken except where there was the clearest case of a failure of justice. His hon. and learned Friend (the Solicitor General, would say that such was the case in this instance; but he begged to submit that where there was a conflict of testimony, where many of the circumstances had not yet been ascertained, and where, at most, the ground of action was not a denial of justice in any way, but a certain omission or neglect of duty—for that was the furthest Her Majesty's Government could go—there was no ground for reprisals according to the best authorities on international law.

A good deal had been said regarding the relative positions of Brazil and this country; and he must confess that, as an Englishman, he did feel it was a painful thing that year after year cases should be brought under the notice of the public, showing that, without exception, the rights of British subjects were enforced in an arbitrary manner where the Powers against whom those proceedings were taken were weak, and that almost at the same moment there occurred the most flagrant instances of British interests being neglected and trampled upon where the guilty parties were subjects or officials of a strong Power. What was at present going on between this country and the Federal States of America? Within the last few months there had occurred a case of a British vessel peacefully navigating the waters between Matamoras and the Havannah; she was chased by a Federal cruiser, and took refuge in Spanish waters, into which she was followed by the cruiser, chased ashore, and burnt. Had we heard of any reprisals in the case of that transaction. Take the case of the Adèle. She was carrying the British Mails between one port and another; she was seized by a Federal cruiser and carried into Key West, where the seals of the mail bags were broken. Had reprisals been ordered for that transaction? There was a third case, that of the Pearl, which had some bales of cloth on board. She was on her voyage from a neutral to a British port, when she was seized and carried into a Federal port to await a trial. We had not heard of any reprisals there. In those cases we were told that Her Majesty's Government could not interfere with the judicial authorities of the United States—that they must abide the decision of those authorities. The reason might be a very good one for not interfering; but when the Government paid that deference to the judicial authority of one Government, why did they refuse to pay it to that of another? They could not draw a distinction between the courts of the Federal States of America and those of Brazil. The Government were not entitled to more than this in the case of the Brazilian or any other authorities—that as far as courts had been established, as far as judicial proceedings had been taken, they should be impartial—that the courts of the country should proceed according to its laws. A great deal had been said about the position of the Brazilian Government, and the utter want of power they had shown in obtaining evidence against the guilty parties. That was a very uncertain and dangerous argument to use, and depended for its applicability upon the feeling of the people in the particular district where the crime occurred, and upon many other circumstances, which rendered it impossible to say that, because a Government found it difficult to obtain evidence, they therefore had shown no eagerness in bringing the offender to justice. What had happened within a very short time in Ireland? A French gentleman was murdered in Tipperary. Why did the prosecution fail against his supposed murderer? Because the attendance of witnesses could not be enforced, though some persons had absolutely been present at the moment the murder was committed. His hon. and learned Friend said it was another mark of the impotence of the Brazilian Government that they could not arrest the defendants, and therefore were responsible for these outrages. Now, suppose that Hayes, instead of murdering an Irish landlord, had murdered a French or German gentleman. Would a foreign Government believe that the English authorities had used every means in their power to arrest that man, backed as they were by a force of constabulary more like an army than a body of police, and scouring the whole country far and wide? It would probably be difficult in such a case to convince a foreigner that the British Government were earnest and zealous; and yet they all knew that the Government exerted every effort in vain to arrest this criminal. Under these circumstances, it was not for us, looking at the particular circumstances of Brazil, and at the difficulties with which a Government had to contend in a country so extensive, to institute comparisons between such a nation and the more civilized countries of Europe as to the administration of justice and the safety of life and property.

Apart, however, from the merits of the case, he could not disguise his feelings of regret and almost of humiliation at the tone and temper in which these despatches were written. Take even the last two letters. The Brazilian Government announced their intention of submitting to force, and said they would pay the money; but their Minister in London was instructed to protest against the violence put upon his Government. Accordingly, in energetic language, the Brazilian Minister protested. What was the language which the Foreign Minister of England addressed to a Government with whom for the future he himself said he was anxious to cultivate the most friendly relations? Why, he told them that they had been guilty of equivocation, of subterfuges, and of mean delay. If language like this were used by the Foreign Minister of this country, though we might be on what might be called friendly terms with other Powers, we should never have friends. Nor was this the only case. The same thing had happened with regard to France. In the most sarcastic letter that was ever written, Earl Russell as much as told the French Government that they connived at assassination and plunder in Southern Italy; and M. Drouyn de Lhuys, in his letter to the Duc de Montebello, expressly pointed out that the English Minister accused the Imperial Government of connivance at the horrors resulting from the brigandage there. His noble Friend (Lord Robert Cecil) had referred to the noble Earl's despatch to the Danish Government; and with the Russian Government the same irritating communication had been going on. Now, he thought that, quite apart from the question of right in this case, the expressions so employed by the noble Earl would not add in the slightest degree to his influence as a Minister, and would not add in any way to the dignity of the country which he represented.

MR. LAYARD said, that after the very able speech of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) he should be intruding upon the House if he went over the ground which that hon. and learned Gentleman had so well trodden. He should endeavour to confine himself to the diplomatic action of the Government in the case of the Prince of Wales, and should seek to show that that action had been neither hasty nor unjust. Before proceeding to that part of the Question he must recall the attention of the House to a few facts which had either been forgotten or misstated by those who had followed his hon. and learned Friend. It would be remembered that the wreck of the Prince of Wales was believed to have taken place, not as the hon. Gentleman who last spoke had said, about the 8th or 9th, but between the 7th and 8th, upon the occasion of a gale which raged upon the coast. It was not until some days afterwards that any notice of the fact was brought to the knowledge of the English Consul at Rio Grande do Sul, Mr. Vereker, and it came to him then by mere chance. It was not, as had been stated, reported to him, but the fact of the bodies having been washed on shore, was casually mentioned by Senhor Soares, and on the following day the wreck itself was known in the house of the delegate, but the fact came to Mr. Vereker as a mere rumour. One thing was undeniable, that it was the duty of the authorities to give the earliest information of a wreck to the Consul of the country to which the owners of the vessel belonged. No such step was taken in this case. It might be asked, was there any proof that the vessel belonged to British owners? There was such proof, because a portion of the vessel's papers, which proved the fact, were actually found in the possession of the delegate. No notice was given, as it should have been; but when information did reach Mr. Vereker, he applied to the municipal judge, who accompanied him to Albardao. That officer behaved well, and went with the Consul to the coast—the distance not being so very great, for the bodies were afterwards brought to Rio Grande do Sul in two days. Mr. Vereker and the municipal judge proceeded to the house of Senhor Soares, a man of large fortune, upon whose land the wreck took place, and the bodies were found. It was believed in the country, although he could not say with what amount of accuracy, that Senhor Soares owed his wealth in a great measure to sharing in the plunder of wrecks upon the coast. ["Oh!" and "Hear!"] Well, hon. Gentlemen might know Senhor Soares better than he did, but he could only repeat what had been told him by those best acquainted with that country. In the house of Senhor Soares were found, not one Bible but two Bibles and a Commentary; and besides there were certain cases which had contained English goods. Senhor Soares, as the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) had suggested, might have had a desire to collect English Bibles, but a desire to collect cases of English goods was not so laudable. Senhor Soares had absented himself from the place. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) said he had only gone to Rio Grande do Sul; but the fact was, that although he had passed through Rio Grande, he had gone to a distant place called Pelotas. Upon the morning after his arrival at Albardao, Mr. Vereker went to the coast, and endeavoured to find some traces of the crew and to take a list of the property saved. He found the cargo scattered over the shore, boxes recently broken open, and the very significant fact which had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend, and which must be regarded as conclusive by those who viewed the facts in a calm and impartial spirit—two of the vessels' boats with their oars. Again, some miles to the northward another boat was found on the coast, uninjured, which was a further strong proof of the crew having landed. Now, although ten bodies only were mentioned, there were fourteen or fifteen persons on board to be accounted for. Mr. Vereker heard that bodies had been washed ashore, and he understood from something he overheard that those bodies were in the neighbourhood, and he asked to see them. Why was he not allowed to see the bodies? It was never denied that the bodies were there, and four of them were afterwards brought to Rio Grande; but why did not the municipal judge do his duty and insist upon seeing them then? The hon. Gentleman said that in this country it was the duty of a coroner to examine bodies of persons found dead. In Brazil, however, there appears to be no such officer. Mr. Vereker, who was acquainted with the laws of the country, said, that it was the duty of the municipal judge to make the examination, and of the delegate, when he heard of the wreck, to visit the spot, to take a catalogue of the cargo cast on shore, to secure what papers he could find, and to furnish all the evidence he could procure concerning the wreck to the Consul. This officer failed in his duty; in fact, all the constituted authorities had failed in their duties; and he contended that the Brazilian Government, by dismissing two of those officers, although afterwards explaining away the reasons for such dismissal, had admitted them to be culpable. Until the 22nd no inquest was held, and then an inquiry was held at Albardao upon four of the bodies, and two days later at Rio Grande upon the same bodies. There was a remarkable fact connected with that examination which to his mind carried great weight; the secretary and witnesses who signed the report as having been present at the examination, were not present; and Mr. Vereker signed the report under protest that he did so merely "as having been present," and not as admitting the truth of the report. The next step would naturally have been to have given Mr. Vereker a copy of the report; but although he applied for it over and over again, it was not until the year following—twelve months after the event—that he succeeded in obtaining a copy. No one, who calmly read Admiral Warren's able summary of the evidence furnished to him by Mr. Vereker, and by the report of Captain Saumarez, could avoid the moral conviction that the men had been murdered. If they had not been murdered, why were not the other bodies produced? Where had they been buried? Some vague excuses were made about the drifting of the sand and the erasure of all traces; but how was it that three of the bodies were found unburied a considerable distance from the shore? He thought that no impartial mind could resist the conviction that the crew had been murdered. He must say that Consul Vereker had been dealt with most unfairly in this debate. He regretted to hear what fell from the noble Lord the member for Stamford in reference to that honourable public servant, who had done everything in his power to discharge his duty, and who, in consequence of his great exertions and exposure, several months afterwards suffered severe illness, which for a time led to a nervous excitement. And after what had been stated by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bramley-Moore) as to the lives of British merchants being placed in jeopardy in the city of Rio itself, it was not wonderful that he should have been under considerable apprehensions.

Then as to the action of the Government—what did they do on receiving a report of what had occurred? He was much surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. S. Fitzgerald) say that those who taunted the Brazilian Government with negligence had themselves been guilty of it. But what did the British Government do? They wrote at once to Mr. Baillie, our Chargé d'Affaires, and expressed their conviction that the Brazilian Government would of themselves institute a proper inquiry. Nobody had been arrested but some miserable Indian, who was not even a Brazilian subject. The hon. Gentleman said compensation was not demanded till the 8th of February. If it had been asked for at an earlier period, the Government would have justly exposed themselves to the taunts of the hon. Gentleman. They did not demand compensation till they had given the Brazilian Government an ample opportunity of doing justice. The hon. Gentleman was not particularly happy in his speech. He said we did not understand how justice was administered in Brazil any more than Brazilians knew how justice was administered in this country. Then he alluded to the escape of the murderer Hayes in Ireland, and asked whether foreigners would believe that there was a due administration of justice when they were told that the whole country had been scoured, and that the criminal had nevertheless escaped. But the case of the Brazilian Government was very different. Had they done all they could to arrest the guilty parties? If they had scoured the country after Soares, and if the Government had been convinced that a fair investigation and trial had taken place, he did not believe they would have insisted on the reparation they now thought it their duty to ask for. Why did not the Brazilian Government send a vessel of war to the coast of Albardao, which the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Bramley-Moore) stated was so wild, and an exception to every other part of Brazil? One of two things were to be expected—either that the Brazilian Government would assert their authority, or if they were unable to protect foreigners whose vessels had been wrecked on their coast, the British Government must protect their own subjects. What was the use of our fleet and our consuls if not to protect British subjects and property, in such a case as this? The action of Her Majesty's Government had been strictly within diplomatic usage. The Brazilian Government stated that eleven persons had been condemned and punished; but it turned out that such was not the case, and that proceedings only had been instituted against them. We had therefore had a right to demand compensation for the loss sustained. His hon. Friend had endeavoured to prove that we demanded compensation for the murder of this crew. Now, we might have been morally convinced that murder did take place, but we carefully avoided mixing up that with the demand for compensation. The hon.,

Gentleman had adverted to M. Moreira's notes. M. Moreira assumed somewhat offensively, after a distinct disclaimer on our part, that the British Government had demanded compensation for the vessel and freight. We did no such thing. Compensation was demanded for the cargo which had been plundered, and the property of the persons whose bodies had been washed ashore, founded on the negligence of the Brazilian authorities in instituting proper inquiries, and administering justice according to their own laws. It was contended that there was no proof of any property belonging to the crew having come on shore. How was it that the persons on the coast spoke of the body of the captain; and how could they have identified his body without some distinguishing dress? It was said we had left no opening for arbitration; but if hon. Gentlemen would turn to page 99 of the printed papers, they would find from Earl Russell's despatch to Mr. Christie that an opening for that arbitration was distinctly left; and again, on the 4th of November, it was stated that Her Majesty's Government were very reluctant to proceed to extremes, except as a last resource, and to the offer of arbitration no condition whatever was then attached. Mr. Christie, in his despatch, spoke of arbitration as an amicable solution of the question. It was not for the party who demanded redress, but for the party of whom it was asked to offer arbitration; and Mr. Christie was authorized to accept the offer.

Now, as to the question of reprisals, he would leave it to be dealt with by those who were more competent than he was to deal with legal points; but he might call the attention of the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Seymour FitzGerald), to the action of the Government of which he had been a Member on a question of reprisals. There was a case in which his hon. Friend had more than once justly claimed some credit—the case of the Cagliari, which was seized by the Neapolitan Government. Lord Malmesbury gave that Government ten days' notice within which he required they should give up the British engineers, with an intimation that if the Neapolitan Government still persisted in refusing reparation, the British Government would be entitled to have recourse to reprisals. If hon. Members would refer to Hansard, they would find that Lord George Bentinck in 1847 brought forward a Motion in which he pressed on the noble Lord now at the head of the Government, that unless the claims of the Spanish bondholders were paid, the British Government should have recourse to reprisals; and his noble Friend on that occasion made an admirable speech, in which he showed that the doctrine of reprisals was not applicable to the circumstances. It was said the action taken by the present Government was an unheard-of proceeding; he hoped to show that there were good precedents for what they had done.

The noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) asked somewhat querulously why nothing was said about the case of the officers of the Foro. The hon. Member for Lincoln, who brought forward this Motion with good taste and good feeling, which he should have been glad if the noble Lord the Member for Stamford had imitated, omitted all reference to this question, because it had been submitted to the arbitration of the King of the Belgians. Her Majesty's Government had entire reliance on the wisdom and justice of that monarch, and therefore it would ill become him to say a word upon a question which was still under consideration. But anything more unfair than the statement made by the noble Lord he had never heard. The noble Lord, of course, might put the honour and veracity of English officers and an English clergyman as low as he thought proper; but for him only to state a fragment of their case, and to conceal the whole of that part of it on which the British Government had taken action, was unfair alike to those officers, to the Government, and to the House. It was not for their arrest at the guard-house that reparation had been demanded. They might have been arrested under a misapprehension. The Government did not assume that English gentlemen necessarily got drunk after dinner; and when three English gentlemen solemnly declared that they did not get drunk, and did not assault the guard, they took their evidence in preference to the swearing of an hotel-keeper and a common soldier. But why did the English Government demand redress? Because these English officers, after their rank had been known, were confined in a common prison, marched, as if they had been manacled felons, through the town, refused a conveyance, and detained as prisoners for two days. It was for these indignities, and not for the arrest, which might have been a mistake, that the British Government demanded reparation. The policy of Her Majesty's Government had been very much condemned by Gentlemen on the other side, but he had not heard from them any alternative. Was there any proof of undue haste and undue pressure upon the Brazilian Government? Eighteen months had been given to the Government of Brazil. Suppose Her Majesty's Government had not adopted the course which was taken; suppose they had not answered those energetic letters of Mr. Stephens, who, like a thorough Briton, believed it was only the duty of the Government to look after his property—what would that Gentleman have done? He would certainly have gone to his hon. Friend opposite, and his hon. Friend—assuming that tone of solemn reproof which he could put on so well when occasion required—would as certainly have charged the Government with apathy, have dwelt upon the facts of British subjects murdered, and British property plundered, and held that the Government which suffered such wrongs deserved the reprobation of the House and the country. It had been said that there was much British property in Brazil, in banks, mines, railways, and public works. But his experience of foreign affairs had satisfied him that it was exceedingly easy to get British capital into the South American States, but it was exceedingly difficult to get it out again. His hon. Friend's acquaintance with the Foreign Office would doubtless enable him to corroborate the statement that the most troublesome business of that Department arose from claims of British subjects upon the Governments of the Southern States of America. [Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Not Brazil.] Hon. Gentlemen were always coming to the Foreign Office and asking how the claims of their clients were progressing, and all the reply the Department were able to give was, "We have written again;" "We have given instructions;" and that sort of thing went on year after year. And what description of claims were those so constantly urged? Denial of justice. Seizure of British property. Repudiation of debts to British subjects. Outrages on the person, and infraction of treaties. [Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Not in Brazil.] He was sorry to differ from his hon. Friend, but he would point out two or three matters, even as regarded Brazil, which led him to form the opinion he had expressed. We had unsatisfied claims upon Brazil amounting nearly to the sum of £350,000. His hon. Friend just now said that the present Government had broken up the Commission that was to inquire into those claims; but his hon. Friend must have certainly known the true history of that transaction. The Brazilian Government brought forward claims before that Commission which had already been settled by Courts competent to deal with them. The Brazilian Government were well aware that the British Government had stated their determination not to allow the discussion of these claims to be reopened, as they were considered to have been finally disposed of. As the Brazilian Government nevertheless persisted in bringing these claims again forward, the British Government had no other alternative but to break up the Commission. The English Government would have been well pleased to have settled the vast amount of claims, many of which had been hanging over for the last forty years. What happened only four or five years ago, and still formed the subject of correspondence between the two Governments? Without rhyme or reason a triple tax was imposed on all British commerce in Bahia; that enactment was still in existence, and though it had not been acted on, calls were constantly being made upon the Brazilian Government to repeal this unjust and iniquitous law. In the papers on the subject of the Prince of Wales reference was made by Mr. Christie to intimidation and to the purchase of justice. That allusion referred to a letter which had fallen into Mr. Christie's hands from an influential officer employed in the Department of Justice, and written to a judge who had to decide in a suit in which Mr. Reeve, an English subject, was concerned, and calling upon the judge to decide against Mr. Reeve. A distinguished member of the Brazilian Legislature had denounced the venality and corruption of the judge in the chambers. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) eulogized the Brazilian Government for having done much to put an end to the slave trade. He did not want to go into a history of that question; but if credit was to be taken for that measure, it was due, not to the Brazilian Government, but to the noble Lord now at the head of the Government, who had put down the slave trade there, as he had put it down elsewhere. What were the actual facts at this moment? The Brazilian Government, had entered into a distinct agreement with this country, that the negroes now in Brazil should be liberated at the end of a certain period of apprenticeship. That period had elapsed some years since, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the British Government, those negroes were still used as slaves; it was impossible to obtain a list of them, or to trace what had become of them. These were some of the causes of complaint existing against Brazil. Were the British Government to stand with their arms folded? Were they to rest satisfied with the plausible and, he must add, disingenuous notes of the Brazilian Minister? Would those who had been robbed, and the relatives of those who had been murdered, rest satisfied with such explanations? He ventured to say that no Government could have acted otherwise than Her Majesty's Government had done. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Cecil) had quoted the opinion of a well-known legal authority, Dr. Phillimore. Now, it was no secret that Dr. Phillimore was the legal adviser of the Government, and that the Government, in deciding upon making reprisals, must have acted upon his opinion. It has been said that this was one of those cases in which a strong Power had taken advantage of a weak one. Nothing could be more reprehensible than for a strong Government unnecessarily to use its strength against a weak state, and according to the noble Lord we had the reputation from one end of the world to the other of bullying small Governments. But was it not astounding to hear, on the other hand, from his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Seymour FitzGerald), that there was not a great Power in Europe which we had not insulted and bullied within the last eighteen months. We had written threateningly to France, insultingly to Denmark, offensively to Russia; in fact, according to the hon. Gentleman, there was not a great State which we had not insulted and bullied in turn. [Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Insulted?] Well, to which we had not used strong language. The noble Lord opposite said we would not have acted similarly to the United States. But he appeared to forget what had taken place not very long ago. He did not wish to travel over the face of the globe, like hon. Gentlemen opposite, but any reproach with regard to the attitude of this country towards the United States certainly did not fall justly on the present Government. It was a misfortune to have to deal with a weak State, because a weak State, relying on its weakness, in some cases exacted undue forbearance on the part of a strong Power; and in other cases —and perhaps the present was one of them —there existed a morbid sensitiveness on the score of dignity, and a forgetfulness that, after all, true dignity lay in doing what was right and just. If the Brazilian Minister, instead of writing all the notes which he had done, and carping at all the little mistakes and errors that might have crept into Mr. Christie's statements, had boldly done what he possibly could towards effecting justice, he fully believed the Government would have accepted his endeavours, and would have been spared taking the step they had been forced to take.

It had been asked, what would have been the conduct of the British Government if a similar occurrence had taken place in England? In 1850 an Austrian vessel, called the Sollicito Bocchese, was wrecked in Cloggen Bay on the coast of Galway, and plundered by the inhabitants of Biffin island, who, he believed, enjoyed rather a bad reputation for such acts. Every measure was taken by the Government to punish these persons. They were brought to trial; a considerable expense was incurred in procuring interpreters who spoke the language of those who had been wrecked, and everything was done to bring the culprits to justice. But the grand jury threw out the bill, on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the Court. His noble Friend now at the head of the Government, who was then Foreign Minister, thereupon immediately sent the Austrian Ambassador a cheque for £540, the amount demanded for compensation. In that case everything had been done that could be done according to our laws, and the responsibility of the British Government consequently ceased; and the case, therefore, was not to be compared to the one under discussion. But suppose that in the case of this Austrian vessel the stipendiary magistrate had plundered the wreck, and the coroner with an armed escort had resisted all attempt at inquiry, what would then have been the responsibility of the British Government? He declared, that if the facts stated in the papers were proved, the responsibility of the Brazilian Government was fully established. The hon. Member had cited the seizure by the Government of the United States on insufficient grounds of the Blanche, the Pearl, and other vessels that had attempted to run the blockade, and had asked why the Government had not interfered in those cases? Because there were legal Prize Courts in the United States before which these cases would be brought. Their decisions were given upon known and accepted principles of law, and were consequently respected as just decisions by other nations. There were fair trials, and that is all we ask of any nation. Did the Motion of the hon. Gentleman mean anything or nothing? If it were a reflection on the Government, he should be sorry to see it carried; and he believed that if the Motion were pressed to a division, it would be successfully opposed. If, on the other hand, the mail of which the hon. Gentleman spoke should carry out to South America the decision of that House in favour of the Motion, whatever might be its real meaning, a shout of triumph would be heard from Panama to Cape Horn; every debtor would hail with joy the establishment of a principle which seemed to be a vital one, to be struggled for to the very death, in South America—the privilege of not paying debts; and every creditor would sit in sackcloth and ashes. Such a decision would exercise the most fatal influence on British interests. Her Majesty's Government regretted with the hon. Gentleman that a misunderstanding had occurred between the two Governments, and they were equally desirous with him that friendly relations should prevail between Great Britain and a Power which had, from its peculiar form of government, special claims upon our respect, and which, from its great wealth, the magnitude of its resources, and the intelligence of its inhabitants, was well entitled to hold a great and independent position among the nations of the world. But Her Majesty's Government had a great, solemn, and peremptory duty to perform—namely, to protect the property and lives of Her Majesty's subjects. He believed that the country would support the Government in performing that duty. It was with the conviction, that if this Motion were carried, British property would be sacrificed, and even British lives imperilled throughout the world, that he called upon the House to reject the Motion of the hon. Member for Lincoln.

MR. COBDEN: Sir, I must say I scarcely remember ever to have listened to a debate in this House in which the speakers have wandered so far from the immediate question before it. I shall say but a very few words at this late hour, but what I will say shall be to the purpose. I have listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Collier) who led off this discussion in defence of the Government. He stood behind me; I could not see him, but I could fancy he had his gown and wig on, and, in fact, on one or two occasions he seemed to have thought so himself, for he addressed us as though we were "Gentlemen of the jury." On the other hand, I view the speech of my hon. and learned Friend precisely as a practised jurymen regards the speech of a counsel who opens a case in court. He knows that he is speaking from his brief, that he pledges himself to nothing, and that he does but follow his instructions. I am in this difficulty with regard to this case, that I cannot believe in the competency of the witnesses. We have, in fact, only one witness to the main point at issue. Mr. Christie, our Representative in Brazil, tells us, at page 71 of the Official Papers—

"All that is known as to the plunder, and all the circumstances suggesting suspicions of murder, are set forth in Mr. Vereker's despatches."

Now, I take exception to Mr. Vereker as a witness in this case. I cannot accept him as such. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen have read this book from the beginning with the attention that I have, but I was struck, from the very first despatch dated June, 1861, and signed H. B. Vereker, to the end of his correspondence, with this feature, that there is a morbid suspiciousness pervading it throughout. For instance, in announcing the receipt of the first intelligence of this disaster in his despatch to the Secretary of the Board of Trade, from the beginning to the end of that despatch, giving the description of the wreck, the mode in which he heard of the wreck, and what he was about to do in consequence of the wreck, every line of it is tinged with a degree of suspicion and excitement. It conveys the impression that he had actually viewed the wreck as a sort of conspiracy against himself. A magistrate who happened to visit Rio Grande, mentions in conversation that a wreck had taken place, Mr. Vereker takes exception to the way in which he related this rumour, as if a wreck was something that happened periodically in his district, as if it came within the ordinary functions of a magistrate to come to Rio Grande once a month or once a quarter to announce a wreck, and that he had come on this occasion and had not given all the information that was expected of him. Mr. Vereker sets about to find out evidence as to whether the vessel that had been wrecked was a British vessel; he finds papers, and imagines that somebody wanted to keep them from him. Immediately he obtains evidence that it is a British vessel, he applies to the municipal judge of the place to accompany him to the scene of the disaster; and here he is obliged candidly to admit that the municipal judge, with the utmost promptness and frankness, agreed to accompany him. They started forthwith with an escort of soldiers and an armed body of custom-house officers, proceeding forty miles the first day and thirty-eight miles the next day, through a desolate region. This armed body of men arrive at night at the house of the magistrate Soares, the very person who had been in Rio Grande and had reported the wreck. He arrives at the house in the evening, accompanied with an armed escort, and he there finds two young ladies, the daughters of this magistrate, who is himself from home. They receive this body of armed men coming in the evening with some reluctance, and appear disinclined to admit them into the house. That circumstance is immediately put down by Mr. Vereker as a confirmation of his suspicions that Soares had something to do with the robbery. Next morning he sallies out, and goes to see the scene of the wreck. He finds out that there are four bodies somewhere which he wants to have removed, and he inquires for the other bodies. He sees two officers talking together, and he immediately draws a conclusion as to what they are saying. He wants to have an inquest, but he says he has not an escort strong enough to compel the neighbourhood to agree to an inquest. Then it is suggested that they should search the houses, and he who was afraid of the power of the parties in the neighbourhood detaches himself with half of the escort, and proceeds to search a portion of the houses, while he despatches the other half of the escort to search the remainder. Nothing is discovered in the houses; and immediately Mr. Vereker declares that the plundered property is in the adjoining thickets. He returns to Rio Grande, and he demands that the four bodies which had been found should be sent on to Rio Grande in order that an inquest should be held on them. The bodies are in a state of decomposition, but an armed escort is immediately despatched to convey them to Rio Grande, and an inquest is held on them. There are competent medical men in attendance, who pronounce that these unfortunate persons had died of suffocation from drowning. This only confirms Mr. Vereker's suspicion that murder had been committed. Now, I mention this suspiciousness to show the mental condition of this gentleman, which is of importance in this case, and this state of his mind appears in all this correspondence. In a despatch to Earl Russell, at page 14 of the papers, and received February 3, 1862, Mr. Consul Vereker has occasion to speak of the sub-delegate of Tahim, and he says—

“The sub-delegate had to collect such goods as he could in benefit of the customs, and yet most of the goods which he delivered to me had been taken out of their cases, and there is no real doubt but that those cases were broken by his order, and the goods of least value given up. In making this statement according to my conviction, I feel it right to say I cannot legally prove it.”

That is the tone that pervades the whole of this correspondence. Now, in the account given of the inquest there seems to be a little misunderstanding respecting the Portuguese word which has been translated as “strangled,” when it is said it meant “suffocated.” Mr. Consul Vereker, in writing to Earl Russell on the 20th March, has occasion to allude to the examination of the bodies, and he says at page 20 of the papers—

“In the report of the examination of the bodies on the coast, among other allegations not creditable to the local residents, it is stated by those appointed to examine the body of one of the unfortunate persons from the wreck that he was strangled. Such statements may account for the unwillingness of the authorities to give the required information, and possibly for the limited nature of the inquiry instituted, as there seems to exist a fear that under a more searching investigation disclosures might be made which would throw discredit on the country.”

Having formed this supposition, he builds an hypothesis upon it, for he continues—

“If this is so (I put the suggestion forward only hypothetically), it shows on the part of the local authorities either a culpable sympathy with evil-doers or a want of moral courage which is highly reprehensible.”

Now, I will not read more than one more extract; but I say that if you follow up this correspondence, you will find the same tone pervading it throughout. In a despatch to Earl Russell, dated April 24th, at page 35, Mr. Consul Vereker, in referring to the inquiry which the President of the Province is about to institute into the circumstances of the shipwreck, says—

“Its necessity is alleged by his Excellency the President to arise from my having reported to Her Majesty's Government that the crew of the barque had been assassinated, and the delegate in his despatch invites me to be present, as it were, to sustain my suspicions; thus the inquiry comes to bear the character of an attempt to disprove these alleged statements, which, as your Lordship is aware, were never uttered; for though I have endeavoured most faithfully to report the facts, I have with equal caution avoided hitherto drawing any conclusion."

In the same letter, a few lines farther on, he says—

"I feel it suitable at this time, and after mature consideration of the various bearings of the case, to declare my opinion that the deaths of some of those who composed the crew of the Princes of Wales cannot, in view of the facts and circumstances, and position of the bodies, be accounted for in any reasonable manner excepting on the suspicion that they were the result of assassination."

So that in the very same despatch he states in one place that he refrained from drawing any conclusion, and in another that there was no reasonable way of accounting for all the circumstances but upon the supposition of assassination. Now, I take his unconsciousness of the infirmity under which he was labouring to be a strong proof that the infirmity was of a very grave description, and this brings me to a matter which should be alluded to with great delicacy; but the facts and the causes remain. I am not going to speak of the causes—they are not such as have been volunteered by my hon. Friend (Mr. Layard). There are matters to which I might allude, there are other circumstances than those which have been mentioned to which I might refer; but I shall say no more than that the painful fact is disclosed in the despatches, that last year Mr. Consul Vereker had been seized with mental aberration, and symptoms of the malady under which he was labouring pervade the whole of his correspondence. He appears to have been seized with the delusion that he was himself going to be assassinated, and he took refuge in Rio Janeiro. He went to Mr. Christie, who appointed a medical man to examine him, and that Gentleman was obliged to say to the Marquis D'Abrantes that the whole was a delusion, and Mr. Vereker was then sent to England. Now, I say that such a person as Mr. Consul Vereker would be held in any court of justice an incompetent witness upon whose testimony the case should be decided. I would wish you to bear in mind that Mr. Consul Vereker's evidence is the only testimony we have to show that these minor and inferior agents had neglected their duty, or had been in any way compromised in this affair. The matter to which I desire to draw the attention of this House is, that we have the testimony of the highest class of witnesses in opposition to the statements which have been made, and I maintain that they are the parties by whose evidence we should be guided. We do not find it stated in the blue-books of the Government; but we have it from the highest authorities, persons who have been long resident in the country—that the present Emperor of Brazil is a Sovereign of the highest attainments—one who, in fact, if he were one of the potentates of Europe, would take a foremost rank among the monarchs of the old world. You find, in the correspondence of Mr. Christie, that he speaks very highly of the Brazilian Minister of Justice, and you find him also speaking highly of the President of the Province of Rio Grande. You will find, also, that Mr. Consul Vereker is obliged to admit that from the municipal judge and other authorities of the country he received the most prompt and generous attention. Now, these—the highest authorities—are those from whom we should expect, and do receive, the most satisfactory proofs of the policy which they desired to adopt towards another nation. I do not intend to enter into the jumble of details which have been laid before the House for the purpose of showing that property was stolen. I am perfectly satisfied that there was a wreck, and that the vessel experienced the same fate it would have done in other countries. No doubt some of the property was carried off, and that, as the district borders upon a neighbouring State, the parties implicated could not be secured when the Government wished to bring them to justice, I can also believe it possible that some of the men were even murdered when they came ashore. I do not believe it, but it may have been possible. All those circumstances, however, would not be sufficient to constitute a ground of claim against the Brazilian Government, unless you can find that there has been something like complicity in the proceedings on their part. Why, Sir, it would be a tremendous evil in the international relations of the world if a foreign State, one of whose citizens living abroad had suffered wrong, should claim to be the sole judge as to whether that citizen had been treated properly or not, and to assume for itself the functions of both judge and jury, and insist upon justice being done according to its own behests. Now, I apprehend there is one simple but invariable rule by which we should be guided in such cases, and that is, that if you go into a foreign country—except, perhaps, China or Turkey, into which countries you claim to carry your own laws,—you must be content if your countrymen receive the same treatment which the citizens of that country receive. You cannot claim more, and you have a right to receive that. Can anybody doubt that the Brazilian Government behaved just in the same manner and with the same good faith in their desire to bring the guilty to justice as if the vessel belonged to one of their own citizens? But what charge does Mr. Vereker, as a matter of fact, bring against the magistrate Soares? I suppose Soares is a gentleman, as he was appointed a magistrate. I was sorry, therefore, to hear my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Collier) speak of him as a brigand with his retainers. Now, what is proved against him? That two Bibles were found in his house. Does anybody suppose that in a Portuguese Catholic community any value was attached to an English edition of the Protestant Bible, or that these two volumes of the Sacred Scriptures were taken as plunder? Let us suppose that a Brazilian vessel was cast ashore on the coast of Cornwall—a district rather famous in connection with shipwrecks—and that a cross or a rosary of no intrinsic value was found in the house of a magistrate near the place; would it be taken as a proof of piratical robbery? I think that the case of Senhor Soares is just such a one as might have occurred in England. From the facts before us I contend that we have no proof of connivance on the part of the authorities of Brazil. But there is one point which I wish to bring out, which will have some weight with the noble Lord at the head of the Government. That noble Lord professes very great anxiety to protect the interests of Englishmen living abroad. Well, there is a body of English merchants living at Brazil, men of high respectability; and what would be the testimony of those men with respect to the conduct of the Brazilian Government? I will venture to say that the community of Englishmen in Brazil are treated with as much consideration and respect, and as much fostering patronage and protection, as it is possible for any country to show to foreigners residing within its boundary; and what is the opinion of that community of British merchants in Brazil on this very transaction? I say, on the authority of men connected with the Brazilian trade—and I beg the noble Lord at the head of the Government to bear this in mind—that the merchants at Rio and in Brazil generally are unanimous in disapproving the course taken by the English Government. [“Hear, hear!”] What I have just stated has been cheered by the hon. Gentleman who brought forward the present Motion, himself largely connected with the trade of that country. I go further, and say that the feeling of the British merchants there on this question arises mainly from the fact that they do not believe the evidence of Mr. Consul Vereker to be sufficient to prove that the Brazilian Government have sought to do any injury or to evade their responsibility to English merchants; and they bear testimony to the desire of the Brazilian Government to cultivate the most friendly relations with England and the English residents in Brazil. What is to become of the maritime States of a weaker order if the principle is established, that where a shipwreck occurs the country where it happens shall be held responsible? As the Brazilian authorities said in one of their despatches, the coast where this shipwreck occurred would become a favourite resort for a certain class of mariners if the country is to be made responsible for all shipwrecks there. We have lately had an exposure, which shows, I think, pretty conclusively, that a new kind of industry has been established in the world. It is a sinister kind of industry, that of making a profit by wrecking ships; and if the Brazilian Government are obliged to submit to the demand made on this occasion, then I say that the coast of Rio Grande will be a favourite resort of mariners of that odious description. Before I sit down I will say one word as to, perhaps, the only practical benefit to be derived from this unfortunate business. I want to draw public attention to the evils which arise from such secret diplomacy as has been practised in this matter. Here is a correspondence carried on for eighteen months upon a purely commercial question of the very smallest magnitude; vast interests in Brazil have been jeopardized, and yet we have been kept in complete ignorance of these secret proceedings. We have lately had a movement among a number of chambers of commerce, calling on the Foreign Office to put itself in greater communication with them in reference to commercial arrangements with other countries; and I think that they might take a hint from what has occurred on this simple matter. I have read these despatches with a greater distaste for diplomacy than I ever felt before. They exhibit such an amount of verbal criticism and special pleading, and the correspondence is altogether of such an order, that I was really ashamed when I perused it. I wish to make a suggestion with regard to all such correspondence as this, having simply no other than a commercial interest. I do not speak of diplomacy in Europe, having reference to State affairs, the balance of power, and old treaties, with respect to which, in deference to third parties, it is thought proper to keep the diplomacy secret; but I am referring to correspondence simply on a commercial question; and I think that it would be a very prudent course for that correspondence to be published before the proceedings are brought to a close. I venture to say, that if this correspondence had been published from the beginning, if it had been laid on the table of the House at the commencement of the last Session, and we had known what was going on in Brazil, the body of English merchants there, whose public opinion would have been far more effectual to preserve peace than your diplomacy, would, if you had let in the wholesome light of publicity, have put an end to that envenomed style of diplomacy which has been going on for so many months, and which has hatched all this mischief. What has been the result of the course of proceeding adopted? Why, without even twenty-four hours' notice, the British merchants in Brazil found their country on the verge of a war with the Emperor of Brazil. The act of the Admiral in making reprisals on Brazilian vessels was taken in secret, and the consequence was such a perfect panic that great alarm was felt for the lives and property of English subjects in Rio. Your Minister barricaded himself in his house for protection. It should be mentioned, for the credit of the Brazilian Government, that, to allay the alarm, the Minister of Commerce went down to the Exchange and assured the English merchants there that they should have the whole power of the State exerted for their protection; and the Emperor went into the streets and harangued the populace with the object of calming their agitation. But, suppose the Emperor had taken another course—and I have heard from some shrewd men that he might probably have consulted his interest better if he had, for I am told that you have imperilled by your proceedings the existence of the only constitutional Monarchy in America, and given ascendancy to the Republican party—but suppose the Emperor had taken a different course when you seized his ships, and had made reprisals tending to war. See in what a predicament you place the vast interests of Englishmen in Brazil. The hon. Gentleman who brought forward the present Motion states that £20,000,000 of British property were at stake. In one hour the lives of British citizens might have been placed in danger, and their property rendered liable to confiscation, because of a state of war. This is a state of things which it behoves the commerce of the country to take steps to avert in future. Where we are connected with another nation only for the purpose of commerce, let the merchants and manufacturers of this country demand publicity in cases like this, so that public opinion may be brought to bear on them, and then we shall never have such a discreditable production as is the blue-book on this matter. I will not refer to that other topic dealt with by the noble Lord the member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil). I feel humiliated to see an aged Sovereign in infirm health like the King of the Belgians called upon with all his abilities to condescend to arbitrate on a question such as that of the three young officers who went from a ship of war to enjoy themselves in the country—at the Star and Garter of Rio—and who becoming merry committed the not very serious offence of mocking a sentry, who was perhaps half asleep, and contrived to get themselves put into the guard-house. We should think that a venial offence here; but what invested it with real importance is the absurd manner in which the Foreign Office took up the subject. I say that diplomacy must be in its dotage, when it can find no better occupation than the case of these officers. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman the proposer of the present Motion will divide the House, or whether he will be content with having elicited opinion on the subject. If he will divide, I shall vote with him; but I would not advise him to be in a minority on a division. I would rather advise him to be satisfied with being in a majority in the debate. I venture to say, unless it be my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth—who, I say, holds a brief, and is a kind of legal adviser to the Government in such matters—you will not find outside the ranks of the Government many men in this House distinguished for influence and independence who will take their stand with the Government in support of their measures on this occasion.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, nothing is more easy than to claim a majority in debate. Those who are not willing to take the sense of the House by a division may always applaud their own arguments, and say that they have the majority in point of reason; but I think we may safely conclude, that if hon. Members sitting on the opposite side of the House are not inclined to divide, they do not agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Cobden) in thinking that they have the majority of arguments in the debate. Being a great admirer of the hon. Gentleman's undoubted abilities, and of his eminent services to the country, I always listen with interest to his speeches, and I hoped to have received some new light on this occasion; but I have been disappointed, for the hon. Member appears mainly to have addressed himself, though without success, to an object unworthy of his influence and abilities—to the object of throwing discredit on an honourable servant of the country, who, from motives most laudable, and in the discharge of an imperative duty, has endeavoured to see justice done in a case of crying wrong. The hon. Gentleman has devoted his energies on the present occasion to making a most feeble attack on a gentleman who, he says, is the sole witness for the Government. Now, I wish to show that we do not rest our case on the testimony of that gentleman. We may safely take our stand upon the Brazilian authorities themselves. I do not want to go out of their despatches to prove the case of the Government. The hon. Member has taken so strange a view of the principles involved in this discussion that he has said, "You are starting a new principle; you are making every nation responsible for every shipwreck that occurs on its coast." The hon. Gentleman has of late years given no small part of his attention to international law; he wishes to establish a general system of arbitration—although upon this occasion he is humiliated because the Government have recourse to it—in all such questions, and undoubtedly he is a great authority upon that subject; but certainly a more remarkable inadvertence as to the principles of international law it would be impossible to conceive.

Now, what are the principles on which the Government has acted? I do not think that any one in this House who has given attention to the subject will challenge them. There may be those on the one side of the House or the other who may think that the facts did not call for the application of those principles, and there I am ready to meet them; but the principles themselves are not open to serious mistake or misunderstanding. It is the duty of those who, in any country, take upon themselves the responsibility of government to see that that government is efficient for the repression of outrage and wrong, especially of outrage and wrong against the citizens of other nations. It is a duty correlative to, and inseparable from, the territorial rights which they assume; because, if it were otherwise, of course foreign nations who suffered wrong would be entitled to take the law into their own hands, and seek redress against those from whom the wrong has been received. But because the sovereign power is vested with responsible authority, and undertakes to see justice done to the subjects of other countries, for that reason it is that the Sovereigns of those other countries cannot execute justice in their own favour within the territory of the country the subjects of which have done the wrong, but must go to the Sovereign of that country, and require from him that justice should be done. And I say that it is a duty inseparable from sovereignty to provide the means of repressing outrage and wrong against foreign nations, and, having provided them, to see that they are honestly and effectively carried into effect and used. Now, that is no new doctrine, no strange doctrine. A great ornament of the jurisprudence of the northern part of this kingdom, one worthy to be ranked with the greatest jurists of Europe—the Lord President Stair—has laid down that doctrine in terms at once so forcible and so applicable to the present case that the House will, I have no doubt, excuse my reading an extract. He says—

"Reprisals are granted by princes or States to seize upon the goods of all persons under the dominion of such princes or people who have refused to make just reparation for the wrongs and damages done by any of their subjects, which the law of nations doth justly and necessarily allow for the common good of mankind. For, if private persons be injured by those who are not under one common authority with them, by piracy, pillage, or otherwise, oftentimes they cannot know the injurer; and, all force being vested in public authority, they cannot make use thereof to redress or avenge themselves; and therefore they can only make application to the sovereign authority of that society of people whereof they are members, and represent and instruct the injury and damage sustained by them, by the subjects of those princes or States, and thereupon desire that a redress may be demanded, which is ordinarily done by ambassadors, or other Ministers of State; and, if redress be not so obtained, the sovereign authority of the persons injured may and ought to give commissions for seizing upon the goods of any of the people of the society whereof the injurers are members."

There is no jurist who has not laid down the same doctrine. The alternative would be most monstrous. What is the alternative? If the Government of Brazil do not accept the responsibility for the piratical acts of a whole population living under their control—if they do not admit that they are bound to provide means of doing justice and repressing wrong, and to use those means honestly and efficiently—are we to say, that because a nominal sovereignty is established in Brazil, therefore wrong is to go on with impunity? There are no means in Brazil of redressing it; and then we are not to be at liberty to do it for ourselves, because, forsooth, we should be violating the territorial sovereignty of that nation. Suppose we had sent a ship-of-war to this coast, and our marines had gone to the house of the magistrate Soares, whom I, in common with my hon. Friend, believe to be the principal of this gang of plunderers, and had enforced redress from him and the other wealthy inhabitants, what would have been said? "You are violating the territory of Brazil." Then, of course, we go to the sovereignty of Brazil and say, "Do us that right which by the law of nations we are not at liberty to do directly for ourselves." But it is said by my hon. Friend the Member for Hordsham (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) that it is wrong to seek pecuniary compensation for a denial of justice, if justice would take the shape of punishment, if justice would not necessarily result in pecuniary reparation from those who have done the wrong. My hon. Friend is quite mistaken. I have here a short passage from Vattel which I will read. He says—

"The Sovereign who refuses to cause reparation to be made for the damage done by his subject, or to punish the offender, or, finally, to deliver him up, renders himself in some measure an accomplice in the injury, and becomes responsible for it. But if he deliver up either the property of the offender as an indemnification in cases that will admit of pecuniary compensation, or his person, in order that he may suffer the punishment due to his crime, the offended party has no further demand upon him." (Vattel, B. ii., chap. vi., sec. 77.)

If he does any of these things—that is, if he executes justice to the utmost of his power, either by obtaining pecuniary compensation, or, if that cannot be done, by executing punishment upon the offender—it is enough; but he must do what is possible in these respects, and it is his duty to provide such means of administering justice in his country that it shall be possible. I do not mean of course in every individual case, but where a wrong is done on a great scale, as in this instance, by a combined population. It is said that we should only make reprisals upon just grounds; what is meant by that? Grounds which the nation making the reprisals is satisfied it can demonstrate to be just by good and sufficient reasons. Writers say this, "You are no doubt in the first place to do all you can, to use all peaceable means of getting justice done in the ordinary course in the country where the wrong has been done; you are not hastily to take the law into your own hands and assume that justice cannot be done." But some writers accompany that with this caution; Vattel following up the passage in which he lays down that doctrine with these words—

"But, in order perfectly to understand this article, it must be observed, that if in a disputable case our adversary either refuses to pursue or artfully evades the necessary steps for bringing the matter to the proof—if he does not candidly and sincerely accede to some pacific mode of terminating the dispute, . . . he gives justice to our cause, which before was problematical."

Let us now come to the facts. I undertake to show that we have, upon the evidence of the Brazilian authorities themselves, all the circumstances necessary to make out the justice of our demand. In a despatch which is at page 16, written by Senhor Garces, who was, I think, delegate of police, to Senhor Callado, the chief of police—written among themselves, by one Brazilian authority to another—we have their own statement of the facts, which, although my hon. Friend read it, I will read it again, because it is short, and is evidence of the most important character. Senhor Garces says, "The cargo of the barque was all sacked." So that the main fact that the cargo was plundered is stated on their own authority—

"Mariano Pinto and Manuel Maria Rodrigues (who fled for the Oriental State) were not the only ones who robbed it; it is known that many of the inhabitants, perhaps the wealthiest of the place"—who was the wealthiest? Soares, the justice—"are devoted to this industry; but against these no proofs appear; there will be no witnesses who would depose against them."

He then goes on—

"The inhabitants of the more neighbouring parts interested in concealing it, having robbed almost all, . . . as has been the custom to practise in other epochs and in identical circumstances."

Showing that this is not an isolated act, but that it is the habit of the people of that coast. After passing over many similar statements, we come to one at page 39, where Mr. Vereker writes—

"Dr. Canarim, the delegate of police of this city, informed me this day that they had obtained proofs against six or seven individuals for plundering the cargo, but that no arrest had taken place, as they were satisfied that others of greater influence were involved; and it was feared that the principals would escape if those of less note, with whom the others had combined, should be prosecuted; they wished to connect the proofs so as to reach the principals. The delegate added that almost all the inhabitants of the coast were implicated in the robberies."

So that they might have arrested six or seven persons, whom they did not, because they wished to collect proofs to implicate the principals. And after the statement that almost all the inhabitants of the coast were implicated in the robberies, what becomes of the assertion that the perpetrators of this crime were a few persons who crossed the frontier the moment, it had been perpetrated, and that unless they had been discovered at the moment, it was utterly useless to attempt to prosecute them? We have the authority of the Brazilians themselves to the contrary. The whole fixed population of the place was known to be concerned in these transactions, but they omitted to prosecute these six or seven against whom they had obtained proofs—observe "obtained proofs"—because all the inhabitants were involved; by some very strange course of reasoning, they thought that they ought to complete the proof so as to include every one who was guilty, especially the principals, before they proceeded against the five or six against whom they had proofs. Was there ever plainer evidence of complicity, or a plainer confession that they did not do what they could? Then what happened besides? The House has heard the name of Faustino, the inspector of the district, son-in-law of Soares, who ought to have taken charge of the property, and who denied that the chests had been opened, although there was under his eyes the evidence that it had been done, and who was there with the force which overawed the judge who came with Mr. Vereker to see the wreck. Now, it is upon his statements that, according to that despatch to which Senhor Moreira refers as containing a satisfactory summary of the whole case, he and others are sought to be exculpated by the Brazilian Government. What do they admit about him? It came out in that very memorandum that he was dismissed for having intentionally allowed to escape persons who were in custody for complicity in this robbery. So here you have evidence of an inspector permitting the escape of prisoners under such circumstances. I would now ask the House to allow me to go back to what took place between Senhor Callado and Senhor Garces. At page 16 you will find the despatch from the latter to the former, in which he speaks of the wealthiest inhabitants being implicated. He goes on to say—

"It is my duty to assure you that I have adopted every measure, I have done everything possible, for the advancement of that process, which it is not possible to advance, seeing that it being necessary to have the depositions of witnesses to form the accusation against the only culprit who is in gaol, this cannot be obtained, because, having ordered three times that various persons of Albardao and the neighbourhood should be notified to appear in this city, they all refused; they did not appear before the officer of justice, pretending that they were sick."

Here we have evidence that there were persons within the Brazilian territory who ought to have been produced to give evidence, and who, though not actually sick, but pretending to be so, were not compelled to appear. Now, does my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald), or my noble Friend the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), who seemed to be so enthusiastic on the side on which they spoke in this debate, seriously believe that the authority of the Emperor of Brazil was not such as to enable him to enforce the attendance of those men? And if there be anybody who imagines that a mere refusal on their part to come forward ought to constitute a sufficient obstruction to the course of justice, I can only say to him that Senhor Callado did not take that view of the matter, because in reply to Senhor Garces he uses the following words:—

"I have to point out to you that as that process should terminate, and the reluctance of the witnesses to come before Court cannot serve as a motive to delay it, you should make use of the resources of the law, ordering them to appear under the rod of justice."

Again—

"Finally, if the witnesses should refuse to swear the truth against the wealthy inhabitants of the locality of the wreck, who, according to your opinion, are the principal criminals, shown guilty of perjury, they ought, as such, to be processed, it being necessary determinately to show ('determinar') to the sub-delegate of Tahim and to the inspector of the district that they should investigate where the articles robbed remain, and who detain them, in order that they may be brought to judgment."

Thus, it appears that the chief of police, who seems to be an honest man, gives it as his opinion that the witnesses ought to be compelled to come forward. Is there, I would ask, any evidence in the papers before us to show that the officers of justice in Brazil used the means at their command to effect that object? None whatsoever. Now, in the last despatch of Senhor Moreira I find some facts and arguments which are not in the Brazil papers. It is said that five inquests were held by different authorities, and that Consul Vereker might have been present at all those investigations. Now, for that statement there is not a particle of foundation. So far as the earlier investigations were concerned, he was simply told that proceedings would be taken, and that he would be informed of the result. He never was, however, informed on the subject until after the proceedings had taken place, and during the most important part of them, when the truth might have most easily been discovered, he was furnished with no opportunity of being in attendance or making a statement. There is also another assertion with respect to the conviction of eleven prisoners, which my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham has adopted from the last despatch of Senhor Moreira, for which, except in that despatch, I have found no foundation. In page 77 there is a letter of the Marquis of Abrantes, dated the 16th of August, 1862, an extract from which I will read, and which is thus reported in the English translation—

"I think I have given as lucid an answer as possible to each of the propositions of Mr. Christie's note, thus having enabled him to furnish his Government with what explanations he wishes. I will not, however, conclude without informing Mr. Christie that on the day on which I received his note, to which this is an answer, I also received a despatch from the President of Rio Grande of the 31st of last month, from which it appears that the investigations and inquests to be held by the authorities have been concluded, resulting in the conviction of eleven persons for robbery."

The Solicitor General

Now, any one who reads as far as that, and no further, might well suppose that that took place with respect to these eleven prisoners, which was reproduced in the last despatch of Senhor Moreira; but on looking to page 85, I find that Mr. Christie communicates a correction of that passage which he had received from the Marquis Abrantes, and which is as follows:—

"I will not conclude without informing Mr. Christie that on the same day on which I received his note I received also a despatch from the President of Rio Grande, dated the 31st of July, from which it appears that the examination and inquiries to which the proper authorities proceeded have been finished, the result being that eleven individuals are accused of the crime of robbery, and that the competent order of imprisonment has issued against them."

That, the House will see, is a very different thing from the apprehension or conviction of these men. Again, at page 122, the following passage occurs:—

"The President finally made a communication that a fresh process had been instituted against eleven individuals, and that endeavours were being made to send descriptions of those supposed to have taken refuge in the Oriental State. At the commencement there were only three, but by means of the continued efforts of the authorities eight more had been discovered."

Now, I do not suppose my hon. Friend will believe that since this blue-book was completed these eleven persons have been convicted. [Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD; Yes.] Well, all I can say is, that I am led to make a totally different inference on the matter from that which my hon. Friend has drawn. I am persuaded that Senhor Moreira's last despatch is not founded on independent information received by him, because he would have said so if such had been the case. My conjecture is that the person who wrote that despatch had not read all the papers, and had been misled by the first mistranslation. I have now, I think, satisfied the House, not on the testimony of Mr. Vereker alone, but from the Brazilian authorities themselves, that the whole population of the district in question were accomplices in this outrage; and I contend that the Government ought to furnish the means of redressing a crime of which the whole population were guilty. I add, that the Brazilian authorities did not, on their own showing, use all the means at their disposal to bring the offenders to justice; and if this be not a denial of justice, I know not what is to be regarded in that light. The facts connected with the bodies appear to me to be equally irresistible. I agree with those who contend that it would not be right to ask for compensation on the ground that murder was committed unless we had positive proof of the fact. We may, nevertheless, be morally convinced that murder was committed, and that the Brazilian Government did not take the proper means to investigate the matter. How does that case stand? It appears from the papers, and not simply on the evidence of Mr. Vereker, that he wrote to the proper authorities immediately after returning from the spot, and demanded that all the bodies should be disinterred and an inquest held. Now, it has not been denied that there were ten bodies in all—five were admitted to have been buried in one spot. But only four bodies were sent in answer to Mr. Vereker's demand. He immediately called attention to the deficiency, and asked why all the bodies had not been forwarded. The reply was, that orders had been given to have the matter strictly investigated; but nothing ever came of it. It was never alleged that the position of the bodies was not known till a long time afterwards, when it was suggested that the sands might have drifted so that the bodies could not be found. Is it unreasonable to suppose that Mr. Vereker has told the truth in regard to these things? What could be more extraordinary than the explanation which has been suggested of Mr. Vereker's condition? Is it to be said that because that gentleman was so zealous on behalf of his countrymen—because he was so eager to uphold the honour of his country—because he exerted himself so ardently to obtain redress that his mind for a time gave way—is it to be said that because this misfortune fell upon him through over-anxiety, therefore every statement he had previously made is to be discredited? I was surprised to hear such observations from the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), of whom I expected better things. I think the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) would also have done more honour to his high character if he had abstained from such insinuations. These Gentlemen have no right or reason to assume that because Mr. Vereker became ill through the over-excitement of business, which is what might happen to any of us, and was temporarily subject to certain delusions, everything he had written before that concerning what he had seen with his own eyes and heard with his own ears was a misrepresentation and a delusion, especially because it tended to criminate the Brazilian Government. It seems to me, Sir, that the Brazilian Government has sufficiently criminated itself. There is no trace of aberration in the statements of Mr. Vereker. They are perfectly rational and consistent. Does the hon. Member for Rochdale believe this is purely imagination? Mr. Vereker states—

"I also saw in Senhor Bento's house two cases belonging to the Prince of Wales empty, but dry and in perfect order. I noted the marks, and am informed from Glasgow by the shipowners that they had contained fine manufactured goods, yet no part of these goods was given up."

If the hon. Member calls that an effort of fancy, it only shows into what sad delusions those sometimes fall who are so ready to think evil of the efforts of their countrymen in distant lands, when the wrongs of British subjects are in question. Some Gentlemen have talked as if Senhor Bento Soares had been charged with going to the ship expressly for the purpose of stealing the Bibles. He was suspected of having been concerned either personally or through his subordinates in the work of pillage, because these Bibles were found in his house, along with the cases, and these things constituted conclusive evidence of the corpus delicti. The Brazilian Government themselves did not dispute the connection between these articles and the robbery. On the contrary, they said that there was a certain carpenter who was implicated in the robbery, and who resided in Bento Soares' house, and suggested that that might account for some of the things from the wreck being found in the Senhor's house. And it is rather significant that all the people implicated appear to have been retainers or dependents of Soares', and at least one of them lived in his house. If they ventured to commit such acts, it might be supposed it was because they knew the Senhor would not object to them. It is important also to observe that the books and cases were dry, showing that they had not been cast ashore from the wreck, but had been deliberately stolen therefrom. According to Mr. Vereker, one of Soares' own boys admitted that his father knew of the wreck on the 9th; yet Soares took no steps to preserve the property. He went to Rio Grande on the 12th, and knowing that the circumstances would soon be notorious, mentioned casually that some bodies had been cast ashore; but when questioned as to the wreck, he denied all knowledge of it. The admission of the Brazilian Government that wealthy persons were implicated in the outrage, the fact that the suspected delinquents were connected with Soares and his house, the release of one of the prisoners by his son-in-law Faustino—all these things pointed to Soares as a participator in the crime. Among other irrelevant episodes in this discussion, the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) fought his battles over again, and once more slew the slain, in regard to the case of Mr. Watson Taylor. It is rather odd, that the hon. Member who was last Session so angry at our non-intervention, is this Session so indignant at our intervention. Whichever course we take we cannot please hon. Gentlemen opposite. I trust, however, the House is now satisfied that the action of the Government has been bonâ fide, and that their only object has been to prove that British subjects cannot be wronged with impunity, either by a weak or by a strong Government. If proof were wanting that the administration of justice in Brazil is by no means so pure as has been represented, it would be found in the fact to which my hon. Friend (Mr. Layard) has referred, that in the case of Mr. Reid a person high in office canvassed the judge for a decision against that gentleman without regard to the justice of the matter, and in the subsequent avowal of the Brazilian Government that there was nothing unusual in such a proceeding. Moreover, at the very time that the decided protest of the British Government led to Faustino's dismissal it appears that that officer was about to have been promoted. I think the House will have no doubt about the matter. I wish we were going to a division, but I trust, that although the House is unanimous, the effect of the discussion will not be less than if we had divided.

MR. BRAMLEY-MOORE said, that after the expression of opinion by the House he begged to withdraw the Amendment.

CUSTOMS ACTS—TOBACCO DUTIES.

COMMITTEE.

Custom Acts (Tobacco Duties)—considered in Committee:—

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved a Resolution—

"That the duty of Customs on unmanufactured Tobacco imported into Great Britain and Ireland which shall contain less than 10lbs. per cent of moisture shall be 3s. 6d. per lb.

MR. AYRTON said, it seemed as if they were about to increase the duty on the class of tobacco consumed by the poor, when they were reducing it on that kind of tobacco which was consumed by the rich. This would have a bad effect upon the public mind. He did not care how much the duties were reduced, his only desire being that they should be fairly levied upon all classes of the community.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not detain the House now by giving detailed explanations of the effect of the clause, but he would only say that the Resolution merely proposed to fix a test of moisture in tobacco in reference to drawback, and was not intended to have any bearing whatever upon the ordinary duties on tobacco.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Duty of Customs on unmanufactured Tobacco imported into Great Britain and Ireland, which shall contain less than 10lbs. per cent of moisture, shall be . . . per lb. 3s. 6d.

EDUCATION OF FACTORY CHILDREN

BILL—[BILL 28.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Baxter.)

MR. FERRAND said, he understood that, practically, the operation of the Bill was confined to Scotland. Nevertheless, he viewed it with great alarm, for it was introducing the thin end of the wedge for the purpose of upsetting the Factory Act, which limited the labour of children to ten hours a day. The Bill proposed to extend the labour of children in factories in Scotland to ten hours and a half a day on three days in the week. As it was entitled a Bill for the Education of Factory Children, he had no hesitation in saying, without meaning offence to the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), that it had been introduced under false pretences. He had received a letter from a manufacturer, who had done more, perhaps, than any other man in England for bettering the condition of factory operatives, in which the writer characterized the Bill as a barefaced attempt to make children of eight years and upwards work on alternate days ten hours and a half, while the law limited them to ten hours. It had been stated, that the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) had agreed to withdraw his opposition to the Bill on condition that it should be confined to Scotland. Nothing could well be more suprising than that the hon. and learned Member, for whom he had a high respect, should consent to allow the working population of Scotland to have a burden placed on their shoulders which he would be the first to protest against in the name of the factory operatives of England. He hoped the hon. Member for Montrose would postpone the second reading until the public were made acquainted with the nature and objects of the Bill.

MR. BAXTER said, he believed that great advantages had been derived by all parties from the Factory Act, and he had not the slightest intention to interfere with it. The hon. Gentleman was labouring under a misapprehension as to the objects of the Bill, which he had not brought forward in the interests of the masters, but in consequence of certain communications which had passed between the Factory Inspectors and operatives themselves. The truth was, that owing to the lateness of the dinner-hour in Scotland, the half-time system could not be worked in that country. There were, consequently, a large number of children growing up in idleness and ignorance, who would be far better employed on alternate days, going to school the rest of the week, which was all that was proposed by this Bill. The existing evil could be remedied only in one of two ways—either by such a Bill as the present, or by passing an Act for altering the dinner-hour in Scotland, which was of course impossible.

MR. COLLINS hoped that the Bill would not be pressed at that hour (twelve o'clock), as it, in fact, altered the framework of factory legislation under a title which was calculated to mislead. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

MR. COBBETT said, he put on the paper last night a notice of an Amendment that the Bill be read that day six months, because he thought it a bad Bill. Practically speaking, the half-time children in England were only worked five or six hours. But in Scotland it appeared, from the arrangement as to the dinner-hour, they could not adopt that system; and it being stated that an alteration would be agreeable to the workpeople themselves, and was recommended by the Factory Inspectors, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment if the Bill were confined to Scotland. He thought, however, English millowners would have a right to complain of the Bill, and he hoped the hon. Member would either withdraw it or postpone it until there had been time to learn what was the general opinion with respect to it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Bill did not provide for an increase of the hours of labour, but only for a fresh distribution of them, which had been strongly recommended in the Report of the Factory Inspectors. He did not know whether his hon. Friend would postpone his Bill; but if he did, he hoped that those Members who objected to it, and who had not, evidently, read the report of the Factory Inspectors, would in the mean time read it.

MR. CRUM-EWING joined in the request that the discussion should be deferred for some time.

MR. KINNAIRD said, the Bill had been brought forward in the light of an English Bill, and had not attracted that attention in Scotland which it would have done if it had been expressly confined to Scotland. He thought it would be better to postpone the Bill.

SIR FRANK CROSSLEY said, the difficulty in Scotland arose from the dinner-hour being from two to three o'clock, which was a most inconvenient time. He suggested that the hon. Member should bring in a Bill that an hour and a half be given for meals before two o'clock, which would obviate the difficulty.

MR. BAXTER said, he would comply with the wishes of his hon. Friend, and agree to postpone the debate till Wednesday week, the 18th.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday 18th March.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INLAND REVENUE AND CUSTOMS ESTABLISHMENTS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that Mr. Milner Gibson and Mr. Peel be discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on Inland Revenue and Customs Establishments, and that Mr. Cardwell and Mr. Bagwell be added to the Committee.

MR. HORSFALL objected to the Motion, and thought the change proposed ought not to take place.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he felt surprised at the objection, and must persist in his Motion.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MILNER GIBSON and MR. PEEL discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on inland Revenue and Customs Establishments:—MR. CARDWELL and MR. BAGWELL added to the Committee.

BAKEHOUSES REGULATION BILL.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 9, 1863.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Charging of Entailed Estates for Railways, appointed, and nominated.

BRAZIL.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he had an appeal to make to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) in reference to a notice which he gave on Friday, that he would call the attention of the House to the case in dispute with the Government of Brazil with regard to the officers of Her Majesty's ship Foro. He (the Duke of Somerset) had received a communication from the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, stating that the question had been referred to the King of the Belgians, who had accepted the arbitration, and that under those circumstances it might be inconvenient to enter into a discussion upon the subject at the present time.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had no apprehension, considering the great ability and clearness of judgment of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, that His Majesty's decision would be influenced by anything that might be said in either House of Parliament; but as he understood from the noble Duke that the Minister for Foreign Affairs was anxious, in the interests of the public service, that he should postpone his observations on the subject, he had no hesitation in saying at once that he would do so. At the same time, however, he could not help expressing his surprise at the appeal, inasmuch as the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in another place had permitted himself, only three days before, to speak for a considerable time on the question, and to enter further into detail of the accusations against the Brazilian Government than appeared in the papers on their Lordships' table; having then added a new charge against the Brazilian Government, of having "manacled" the officers, a charge not anywhere mentioned in the papers before the House. But he could assure their Lordships, feeling what the noble Earl (Earl Russell) had said about the question being sub judice, he had not intended to give any opinion whatever as to which of the two parties to the dispute was right and which was wrong. It was perfectly evident to all their Lordships who had read the papers on the table that the unfortunate collision between Her Majesty's officers and the Brazilian police could not have taken place, and would not have taken place, but from the circumstance of the officers being in plain clothes. Looking at the question in a general point of view, and without reference to this particular case, he would press upon the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) the necessity of a reasonable observation of what he believed to be a most important regulation, and that was, that the officers should not be allowed to go on shore out of uniform. He did not desire that the rule should be pressed to an unwarrantable extent, so as to prevent officers who might be taking long journeys using the most convenient kind of clothing for the purpose; but he was sure that the noble Duke himself, with his knowledge of human nature and of the habits and feelings of young officers, who, having been confined a long time, were delighted to obtain a little liberty, must admit that these officers would be likely to have more respect for themselves—and, certainly, foreigners would have more respect for them—if they wore on shore the ordinary uniform of the service. On such an occasion as Saturday last, or great reviews, notice was very properly given that officers in Her Majesty's service would not be permitted to pass the lines, and that the police would not treat them as officers, unless they appeared in their uniform. The case against the Brazilian Government was that in the execution of their laws they offended the British navy. He did not say that we had not a right to be offended. All British citizens had a right to the protection of the Foreign Office wherever they might be; but in this case it could not be held that the British navy had suffered an insult, seeing that the officers were not wearing the uniform of the navy at the time of the occurrence complained of; and out of uniform they would have no legal authority even over their own men ashore. For these reasons he wished very much that the noble Duke would exercise his judgment and authority to prevent as much as possible what he was told was growing into a common custom in the navy—namely, permitting officers to go ashore in plain clothes.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he believed the rule was that our officers should always appear in uniform in those countries with which we had little intercourse, or in which any local disturbances or other cause rendered the wearing of uniform necessary; but where, as had been the case in Brazil, the two nations were on the most friendly terms, officers when going into the country were permitted to go on shore without being in uniform. It was a matter in which the commanding officer of the station should be allowed to exercise his discretion, according to the circumstances.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he regretted to hear the latter speech of the noble Duke. No doubt, discipline, like everything else, was a fashion, and it must vary with the opinions of the day. The intention of uniform was not so much to dress a man up to look fine, as for the purpose of insuring a system of discipline over the men who wore it. If this were the case, he would put it to the noble Duke whether the wearing of uniform was not an important part of the discipline of the naval service which it was especially necessary to enforce in foreign countries. He regarded this as of very great importance. Before uniform was introduced and enforced it was no uncommon thing for men to throw away their muskets and run away; and there was no knowing which side a man was. With regard to the police, of what use were they, except as secret spies, unless they were in uniform? How otherwise could they gain the respect of the multitude? When he was in the navy, for an officer to leave his ship without wearing his uniform was unknown; to go over the side in a plain suit was a thing unknown. No doubt, when an officer went ashore and engaged a lodging he put on his plain coat; but when he did so, he took the consequences. The printed orders of the service directed an officer to wear his uniform constantly, and never take it off except to go to bed. If the officer in command or the governor of a port thought proper to wink at a violation of the order, that was one thing; it was altogether another for the head of the navy to lay it down that it was usual for officers to go on shore without uniform.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he had only repeated what he had ascertained from officers in the service to be the practice; but he could not say whether the statement referred to officers leaving the ship in uniform. He knew that a custom had for a long time prevailed for officers to leave their ships in uniform and change their dress when they got on shore, and he saw no reason to make the practice in this respect more strict than it had been for years past. He had found that on all occasions where the navy had been employed there had been no difficulty in preserving discipline, and the conduct of naval officers had been universally praiseworthy wherever they had gone on shore.

CHARGING OF ENTAILED ESTATES FOR RAILWAYS.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

EARL GREY rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire as to the expediency of extending the powers now possessed by landowners, to charge their estates with terminable annuities for the purposes of improvement, to the case of railways calculated to promote the value of their property. The noble Earl said, that he had no doubt he should be able to satisfy their Lordships of the propriety of the investigation for which he asked. Their Lordships were no doubt aware that some years ago, owing to the necessity for applying capital to the drainage of land, and the difficulty experienced by many owners of land in raising it, Parliament gave power to owners of land to borrow money for draining, building, and various other permanent improvements; and if it could be shown to the Inclosure Commissioners that the proposed improvements would add to the permanent value of the estate, to raise the money by way of rent-charge, which should be a first charge upon the estate. Very large sums of money had been raised under these powers, especially for drainage, and by these means a great addition had been made to the permanent wealth of the country, much employment had been found for the labouring classes, and great benefit had been conferred upon the landowners themselves. Nor had he heard that any abuses had arisen. The Inclosure Commissioners had, he believed, used the powers intrusted to them with so much judgment and discretion that no holders of reversionary interests or prior incumbrances had been exposed to loss or injury. That being the case, it had been proposed that this power should be extended, so as to enable landlords to raise money on similar conditions and subject to similar restrictions, for the purpose of constructing or promoting railways which might benefit their estates. He was induced to bring the subject forward in consequence of its connection with a railway in which he was not greatly personally interested, because it hardly touched any of his property, but which he believed would, if made, be of great advantage to his neighbours. The promoters of the Bill for that railway, which was now before their Lordships' House, had addressed queries to the owners and occupiers both of lands which would be affected by this line and of lands which derived benefit from existing railways. In all cases the answers had been that railway communication added very largely to the value of land. It benefited the land both by bringing to it manure, lime, coals, and other heavy articles, and by taking the produce away to market. The amount of increased value which was in this way conferred upon the land varied greatly, according to local circumstances; but the questions to which he had referred had been addressed to a considerable number of practical farmers, who spoke from their own experience, and none of their answers put the advantage so gained by the land at less than half-a-crown an acre for arable land, and 6d. or 1s. for pastures. In some cases the increase was very much larger, —in one instance as much as 10s. an acre; but in that case the occupier of the farm was largely engaged in the cultivation of potatoes, which were forwarded by railway to Newcastle and London. What was proposed, therefore, was, that the owners of land should be enabled to take shares in railways which would benefit their estates to the extent of the increased value which it could be shown that their property would receive from the construction of the line. To explain how this would operate, he would put an imaginary case. Suppose it was ascertained that the value of property would be increased by a railway to the extent of £100 a year; in that case it was proposed that an owner of land should be enabled by granting a rent-charge on his property for twenty-five years, at the rate of £100 a year, to raise a sum which at such a rate it was ascertained would amount to £1,500. The manner in which the scheme would operate would be, that while he would, on the one hand, have a rent-charge of £100 a year upon his property, he would, on the other, be in the receipt of a similar amount in consequence of its increased value. So far he would be neither a gainer nor a loser; but then whatever dividend the railway might be able to afford on the shares for £1,500 which he would have taken, would be so much clear profit; and beyond that, at the end of the twenty-five years, the owner himself, or his successors, would have the advantage of possessing his railway stock free from all charge and incumbrance. It was further proposed that no such rent-charge as he had described should be settled on the land, following the analogy of the case of drainage, until the railway had been absolutely completed. The scheme, in his opinion, was, so far as it went, a reasonable one, and would be found to be of great advantage to landowners. The great motive in favour of its adoption was, that it was found that there was a certain degree of discredit attaching to railway property, very much owing, he thought, to the course which Parliament had pursued with respect to it, and the unsatisfactory nature of the tribunals to which railway regulations were submitted; the consequence of which was great difficulty in raising the necessary capital to construct a line which was not intended to pass through a great town or was not promoted by a great existing company. It often happened, however, that lines which were proposed to run through agricultural districts would, if carried out, be of the utmost utility; but the circumstances of their case were such, that unless such powers as he had indicated were granted, it was almost impossible to get owners of property to take shares in them to the extent which was desirable. Now, it appeared to him that where a railway was sought to be constructed for local objects, it might well be entitled to the support of Parliament, although it might not be promoted by a speculative attorney or engineer. Nor did he wish to disguise from their Lordships the fact, that the general inquiry which he advocated, with the view of deciding upon the value of a certain general principle, had reference to a Private Bill which lay upon the table. He, however, sought to press the matter upon the attention of the House mainly because he was of opinion that a Private Bill submitted to Parliament, which involved a general principle capable of general application, ought not to be left altogether to the discretion of a special Committee, to be sanctioned or disapproved according to the views of its Members. If it was desirable that landowners should have the powers which he had pointed out conferred upon them, that ought, he thought, to be done not by a particular measure, but by an Act of Parliament applicable to all cases. As the Motion which he was about to make had reference to a Private Bill for constructing a railway through Northumberland, which was now before the House, and of which he himself was one of the promoters, he should not propose that his own name should be included in the list of the Committee, if their Lordships should think fit to grant it. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether it is proper that the Power already given to Land Owners to charge their Estates with Terminable Annuities, in order to raise Money for the Improvement of their Land by draining and building, should be extended, so as to enable them to raise Money on similar Terms for the purpose of taking Shares in Railways calculated to increase the Value of their Property: And further to inquire under what Conditions and Limitations such Power ought to be granted, if given at all."

LORD REDESDALE said, he should be the last person to seek to prevent the House from instituting an inquiry with a view to obtaining knowledge on any subject of public or private legislation. The noble Earl, however, had argued that what he proposed was the same principle as that which authorized the borrowing of money upon land for drainage purposes, but in truth the principle was a very different one. Another circumstance was that this power, in reference to railways, had never been asked for down to the present Session, when such power was sought in one instance only. Every line, therefore, in the kingdom had been made without the existence of any such power. It seems to him certain that no man who held landed property in fee would be likely to be disposed to make a charge upon it in favour of railways; and if the owners in fee would not exercise the privilege, as he believed they would not, it seemed to him extremely imprudent to give power to the owners of settled estates to take up shares in railways. There was no kind of property upon which it was less desirable to give a power to make charges than settled estates, and especially since the imposition of the succession duty. In general, five years were allowed to railway companies to finish their works, and where the companies were not rich the period was often extended. The owners of settled estates during those five years would have to find the interest of the money without any chance of benefit; and if any one of them died in the first year, his successors would have that additional burden, besides having to meet the charge for succession duty. The case of railways was totally different from the case of drainage. Railways were very seldom made within the estimates; but the cost of drainage works could be accurately and easily ascertained. When the drainage was done, the return was immediate; and although tenants who had leases, knowing the exact advantage, would consent to pay an increased rent for drainage, he was confident they would not pay a single shilling more for the vague chance of benefiting by a railway being brought near their holdings. He thought that at all events the matter should be dealt with by a public Bill, and not by private legislation. If railways were promoted for mere speculative purposes, they ought to be rejected; but if they were sanctioned because of their public utility, the same privileges should be granted to all without any distinction. Some drainage companies had powers different from others, but he was not at all sure it would not be expedient to pass a public Act with regard to those works, placing every charge for drainage upon precisely the same footing. He should not oppose the appointment of a Committee; but in his opinion the proposal was mischievous and impracticable.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the speech of the noble Lord was not at all in favour of the principle contended for by the noble Earl who originated this discussion; but having heard diametrically opposite opinions expressed by the two noble Lords, he was induced to think it was a very proper subject for inquiry. He had not himself formed any opinion whether the proposition was desirable or not; but it seemed to him, that while it was most important to abstain from overburdening with charges the successors to settled estates, they ought, whenever it was possible, to do anything which would remove some of the disadvantages connected with settled property. It certainly was very desirable that that subject should be inquired into by a Select Committee of their Lordships. Whether the question was one for private legislation, or whether it ought to be dealt with in a general public Bill, was a point for the Select Committee; and if it admitted the principle contended for by the noble Earl, the mode of carrying it out might very properly be settled by the Committee. He must say, he thought it would be a great public disadvantage if the noble Earl (Earl Grey) abstained from serving on this Committee. The fact of his being interested in promoting a Railway Bill was an inadequate reason why the public should be deprived of his services.

EARL STANHOPE also hoped that the noble Earl would consent to serve on the Committee. His principal object in rising, however, was to suggest the expediency of inquiring into a subject akin to this but of much larger scope—the power of trustees in dealing with monies vested in them. He would not undertake to say that the law on the subject required amendment, but it certainly required consideration.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that an Act of Parliament had been passed last Session, which gave large powers to trustees in dealing with trust monies. It was an often-quoted saying, that high interest meant bad security. The rate of interest obtained by vesting in the funds was the standard of good security. Some additional interest might be gained by investing in mortgages, but, generally speaking, he should very much deprecate giving extended powers of investment to trustees charged with the duty of providing for persons who could exercise no judgment of their own. With regard to the inquiry desired by the noble Earl, there would be great difficulty in dealing with the speculative abstract question whether a railway, not actually passing through particular land, could be said to conduce to the value of that land. He would be sorry to see any such matter made the subject of inquiry before a Committee; and he could not even see his way clear to its being made the subject of judicial inquiry with any amount of security or satisfaction in the result. Still, he should be very glad if the proposed Committee were appointed. One evil often came before the courts which was of a very serious character. A landowner succeeded to an estate as tenant for life; he found the farm buildings in a state of great dilapidation, and yet he was unable to raise money to make the necessary repairs. He earnestly hoped that the result of the inquiry would be, not to allow the general principle of the law to be broken in upon by special powers granted to particular companies for the prosecution of a speculative scheme, but that it would gather together all the different powers which it was desirable landowners should possess, and embody them in some general public Act. At present the law was in a most lamentable state of confusion. Drainage Company A had one set of powers; Railway Company B had a different set—all granted by private legislation, and without the extent or application of those powers being brought in a proper manner under the consideration of Parliament.

RECEPTION OF THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA—POLICE ARRANGEMENTS.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: My Lords, I desire to call the attention of your Lordships and of Her Majesty's Government to a matter that deserves the earliest and most serious consideration. In the general rejoicing connected with the reception given to the Royal lady who landed on our shores on Saturday it is painful to think that any circumstance should have occurred to create just animadversion; but I cannot help thinking, from what I have read in the journals of this day, that such is the case; and from having held for six years a position of responsibility in the Home Office, I conceive myself not unwarranted in drawing the attention of your Lordships and of the Government to the facts. So far as the earlier part of the procession traversed ground with which the administration of the Metropolitan Police is concerned—that is, from the Bricklayers' Arms to London Bridge—all went smoothly, and, if I may use the expression, “merry as a marriage bell;” but on the arrival of the procession at London Bridge there ensued, as I read in all the public prints, a scene of confusion, and certainly a delay, which ought not to have taken place, and would not have taken place if proper precautions had been observed. I perceive that on the centre of London Bridge the Royal carriages were delayed for no shorter period than a full half-hour; that again a greater delay took place opposite the Mansion House; and that there was such a scene of confusion that the populace were permitted to break through all regulations, and even to approach so near the Royal party as to lay hands upon the carriages in which they were seated. Such is the statement given in the newspapers. I hold this to be an extremely indecorous proceeding, and I attribute it entirely to the want of a proper force there; and I am sorry to say that I must attribute that to a feeling of false pride and self-sufficiency on the part of the authorities of the City of London, who, having had offered to them the aid of the Metropolitan Police, declined it on the ground that they were able to perform this duty by means of their own force. That has been proved to be a very great mistake; and it is right that steps should be taken so that such a mistake shall not occur again. On the occasion of Saturday the whole people were striving who should do most honour to the Royal personages who were then passing through their streets. It was an occasion of the greatest joy, and every one vied with the other to show hospitality and honour to those distinguished persons; and I say it is the duty of the Government to see that the City is permanently provided with a police force adequate, upon occasions of joy as well as of disturbance, to maintain public order and decorum. I remember that some time ago a proposition was made for having but one police force for the whole metropolis; but circumstances arose which prevented so beneficial an arrangement being carried into effect. I trust that the circumstances that occurred on Saturday will so convince my right hon. Friend at the head of the Home Department of the necessity of having but one police force for this great metropolis, that he will lose no time in introducing a measure for that purpose. There can be no more opportune time for so doing, for the City Commissioner of Police has just died, and no new appointment has yet taken place. I ask no question of Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion, but I simply call their attention to the facts that occurred in the streets on Saturday in that part of the metropolis called the City of London; and I have no doubt, when they consider the whole matter, that they will have little hesitation as to what measure should be introduced.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that his noble Friend the President of the Council (Earl Granville) had left the House, being no doubt unaware, as he was, that his noble Friend was going to address their Lordships. He (the Duke of Newcastle) happened to be in this position, that he had not had time to read in the papers one word of the accounts of what took place on Saturday, and therefore he was quite unaware of the circumstances. He certainly had heard that there was some confusion near St. Paul's, but that was all that had reached his ears in reference to disturbance or interruption. He could not, therefore, be expected, in fairness to the parties concerned, now to answer the observations which had been made; but he had no doubt that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary would pay proper attention to a subject of so much importance. The circumstances of Saturday were so singular that they could not be expected to occur again for many years; but his noble Friend was aware that the question of the amalgamation of the two bodies of police was not now brought forward for the first time; and, speaking for himself, he must say he regretted that feeling of independence on the part of the City which had hitherto prevented it being carried into effect. He did not think that the City police could be so efficient to perform its duty as if it formed part of an amalgamated body; but that was a matter for the Home Secretary, who would certainly look into it.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he understood that the noble Earl who had introduced this subject did not intend in the smallest degree to attribute the disturbance to any fault upon the part of the people. Nothing could have been more kindly than their feeling on this occasion. The fact was, that there was a large space opposite the Mansion House which was entirely filled with people, who, being anxious to see, pressed towards the Royal carriages. Everybody knew that the pressure from a column of men set in motion was such that hardly any power could resist it, and it was sure to break down all ordinary resistance. He understood that even one of the cavalry escort was so pressed upon that his horse was lifted up. All this pressure arose from the loyal and affectionate feeling of the people, and from their strong desire to see the Princess, and he doubted whether any amount of police force could have kept back the masses at the Mansion House.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY observed, that barriers were usually put up to keep a crowd back, and also to protect the people themselves, when any great assembly was expected; but he believed that at the spot in question there were no barriers. If it had not been for the excellent feeling displayed by the people, some dreadful accident would almost certainly have happened.

LORD LLANOVER said, that during the time he was First Commissioner of Public Works it was his duty to recommend a measure for the better management of the metropolis, and to inquire into the state of the existing metropolitan institutions; and one of the matters brought most seriously before him was the inconvenience occasioned by the double jurisdiction of the police. Various Governments had had it in contemplation to adopt some plan for amalgamating the police, and for many reasons this would, in his opinion, be a most desirable object. The City of London was but a mere speck in the map of the metropolis, and contained less than 130,000 inhabitants out of a population, within the metropolitan limits, of nearly 3,000,000. The jurisdiction of the metropolitan police inclosed that of the City police, and it seemed an absurd anomaly to have these two separate authorities. If Sir Richard Mayne had had the whole management of the police on Saturday, he was quite sure that order would have been

as well kept within the City as it was from the Bricklayers' Arms to the foot of London Bridge, and from Temple Bar to Hyde Park Corner. Being at the window of Apsley House on Saturday, he saw at Hyde Park Corner a mass of people quite as thick, he was informed, as any collected in the open space opposite the Mansion House. So dense was the crowd that it seemed almost impossible to open a passage through it. By an order issued by Sir Richard Mayne, no carriages were allowed to enter there after three o'clock. At that time all carriages were stopped and turned back; and in about a quarter of an hour a space was cleared for the procession, and not a single person attempted to cross it. The City authorities were not used to deal with such emergencies, nor had they the same amount of force at their disposal; but on this occasion they refused the offer of a portion of the Household Brigade and of the metropolitan police, and said they would manage the City line of the procession with their own people, and in consequence of this determination to reject all extraneous aid, the greatest confusion had ensued, and most serious inconveniences had occurred. He thought this would be a good opportunity for the Government to consider whether an amalgamation of the police might not now be effected, so that one body might henceforth have jurisdiction over the whole metropolis.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

ENGLISH POLICE IN POLAND.
QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, after the state of siege had been proclaimed in Poland, the Russian Government applied to Her Majesty's Government for the services of two English Detectives for the instruction of the Russian police in Poland; and whether, in compliance with that application, Her Majesty's Government sent Superintendent Walker and Inspector Whicher, of the A division to Warsaw, during the months of August and September, 1862?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, in answer to the first Question of the hon. Gentleman I have to state that neither immediately after the state of siege had been proclaimed in Poland nor at any other time did the Russian Government apply to Her Majesty's Government for the services of English detectives for the instruction of the Russian Police in Poland. But that is not the answer which I wish to give to the hon. Gentleman, for it would not be a fair and complete one. I have to state, in answer to the second Question, that two officers, the Superintendent and Inspector named, did go to Warsaw in the month of August last under the circumstances and for the purpose which I will briefly state; and when I have made the statement, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied that they did not go for the purpose which is rather implied than expressed in the terms of his Question. I may be allowed first to state that I have found few things have attracted the attention of intelligent foreigners in this country more than the maintenance of public order, and the protection of life and property, by means of a police force exclusively civil, unarmed, and acting on all ordinary occasions without any assistance from a military force—each member of the police force acting under regulations authorized by law, and being amenable to the ordinary tribunals of the country for any excess of authority or any violation of the law which he may commit. The feeling of surprise which has been excited among foreigners by the observation of these facts has led from time to time to applications from the representatives of foreign Governments for full information as to the organization of the police, the principles upon which it is established, and the details of its management. That information has in all cases been freely given, and without reserve, as we have no secrets in our police system, the object of the applicants being, as was understood, the improvement of the police in foreign countries by their assimilation, as far as circumstances will admit, of their system to our own. In the month of July last I received a private letter from the Russian Ambassador, in which he informed me that the Grand Duke Constantine had, during more than one visit to England, been particularly struck with the admirable results of our police system, and with its character and management so far as he was able to form an opinion. He further stated that the Grand Duke, having been recently charged with the administration of the affairs of Poland, was desirous to effect a reform in that branch of the public service in Poland by placing it as nearly as possible on the system of the English police, with a view at the earliest period practicable of putting an end to martial law which was then in force in Poland. For that purpose the Ambassador therefore requested that, not a detective, but an intelligent officer of the metropolitan police might be put into personal communication with the local authorities at Warsaw, with a view of giving the fullest information as to the organization of the English police, in order that, if possible, the desire of the Grand Duke Constantine might be carried into effect. I thought that desire of the Grand Duke was honourable to him; and if it could have been accomplished, it would have conferred one of the greatest boons on the people of Poland. With that feeling, I informed the Chief Commissioner of Police of the contents of the letter I had received from the Russian Ambassador; and, with my sanction, he complied with the request by sending these officers to Warsaw for the single purpose of communicating to the local authorities there that information which had been repeatedly given to every Government that had applied for it. The Commissioner, acting in accordance with a general rule, thought it desirable that instead of one officer two should go. They went, taking with them the forms of proceeding and the regulations for the management of the police which exist here, which they communicated to the local authorities at Warsaw, with whom they were placed in communication. They gave such personal explanations on the subject as they were called upon to give. Having done that, their duty was performed, and they returned to England from Warsaw as soon as they were enabled, one of them having been seriously ill, to undertake the journey. I am only sorry to say that the object with which the information was sought and given was not attained, for the authorities of Warsaw came to the conclusion—unfortunately, I think—that however well adapted our police establishment might be to a country like England, the materials did not at present exist for applying it to Poland.

MR. AYRTON:—The right hon. Baronet has not stated whether this was done before or after the knowledge came to the Government of the breaking-out of the insurrection in Poland.

SIR GEORGE GREY:—It certainly was long before the recent events occurred. The letter was dated in July, and the officers went on the 6th of August.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will lay upon the table of the House a copy of the letter from the Russian Ambassador making the application? He would also ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the table two Despatches received from the Consul General at Warsaw describing the atrocities which have been committed by the Russians?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The letter from the Russian Ambassador was marked confidential, and, without his permission, I could not lay it on the table. I have no knowledge of the Despatches referred to.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to ask whether the instructions given to the police would be produced.

SIR GEORGE GREY: There were no written instructions given to the police. The object for which they were sent was clearly defined and understood, and I have no doubt they performed their duty strictly within their instructions.

THE VOLUNTEER ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill during the present Session for the Amendment or Repeal of the Volunteer Act, 44 George III., c. 54?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, he had mentioned that it was his intention to introduce, on as early a day as might be convenient, a Bill to amend and consolidate the laws upon this subject.

Sir George Grey

EXAMINATION OF ACTING TEACHERS. QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table a statement of the Examination to be passed by acting Teachers in order to obtain a certificate?

MR. LOWE said, in reply, that he might inform the right hon. Gentleman that the subjects of examination to which acting Teachers were subjected before they could obtain their certificates, embraced reading, writing, and arithmetic as far as Practice; the leading facts of geography, with a more detailed knowledge of the geography of the British Islands; the leading facts of British history, and, in the case of the Church of England schools, a knowledge of the Bible and Catechism. He had no objection to lay the Papers, relating to the examination, on the table.

LICENCES FOR THE SALE OF BEER. QUESTION.

MR. NORRIS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill during the present Session to alter and amend the Licensing Act, 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, or the Beer Act, 4 & 5 Will. IV., c. 85, so as to place Retailers of Beer under each of these Acts on an equal footing as to the cost of Licences?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he understood his hon. Friend to refer to the state of the Law under which beer was sold by persons who sold beer exclusively, and who obtained licences at two different prices. In the one case the licence had been obtained under the Beer Acts at one price; and in the other a licence had been obtained originally for the sale of spirits as well as beer, and the spirit licences being dropped, the beer licence was retained at another price. This state of things appeared to be anomalous, and the Government would be glad to avail themselves of an early opportunity of bringing in a Bill to amend the Law in that respect.

THE BUDGET.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to bring on the Budget before Easter; if not, whether it will be brought on upon an early day after the Easter recess?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have no intention to submit the Budget to the House before Easter, but it will be my desire to select the earliest day after Easter that may be convenient.

ARMY—STAFF APPOINTMENTS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is not an Order of the Horse Guards still in force according to which all Officers on the Staff are only allowed to hold their appointments for five years, and whether at this moment there are not three Officers holding appointments in contravention of that rule?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the general rule was as the hon. Baronet had stated, but in some exceptional cases it was not strictly enforced.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to ask, whether the rule applied to such appointments as that held by the Duke of Cambridge?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the appointment which the Duke of Cambridge held was not considered a staff appointment, to which the rule applied.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. ADDERLEY rose to move an Amendment—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for having issued a Commission of Inquiry into the operation of the Acts relating to Transportation and Penal Servitude, and into the manner in which sentences under the provisions of those Acts had been carried out, and praying that, pending that inquiry, the conditions on which any remission of punishment, or Licences to be at large, are given, may be strictly enforced according to the intention of those Acts."

He said, that before the House proceeded to the discussion of the Army Estimates there was a prior question to consider, and that was, the personal security of the people at their own doors. Of what avail a costly regular army, if the police could not secure the inhabitants of this metropolis from being throttled and robbed in the streets? The Home Secretary had just told the House that our police were the envy of the world; but only a few months ago—during the last autumn—it was not safe for any gentleman to walk through the streets of London after dusk. It had been said that the death of a railway director in a collision was the best means of procuring reform of railway regulations; and as the garroters last autumn fortunately selected a Member of that House as their first victim, attention had been strongly drawn to the acts of violence which were perpetrated in the streets. Upon this hint, Punch warned garroters to be more cautious in future, and especially to avoid a Secretary of State for the Home Department. He held in his hand a petition from the Bristol Association for the amendment of Convict Discipline. The petitioners stated that they had heard with satisfaction of the appointment of a Commission on the subject of the discharge of men on tickets of leave; but that probably, while the Commission was inquiring, more than 2,000 criminals would be discharged with tickets of leave during the present year. The outcry raised on this subject last autumn was not confined to the metropolis, but was universal throughout the country—it was universal, and so loud as to compel Ministers either to action, or to an active avoidance of action; and of these two alternatives they selected the last, and referred the matter to a Commission. There was a good deal for a Commission to inquire about; but, in the mean time, he asked the House to press the Government to do that which they ought to have done at once—namely, to put the existing law in force. The outbreak last autumn was not unprecedented, but appeared to be a matter of periodical recurrence in this country; not on the part of an influx of new criminals, but generally on the part of old criminals, who having tasted what was called punishment, had found it so wholly devoid of terrors that when the opportunity recurred they recommenced their course of crime with only greater audacity. No one could tell whether the new Commission would take a long or a short time to make its Report. If it should be a long time, was it to be allowed that in the mean time thousands of criminals should be discharged in this country upon tickets of leave, the conditions of which he could show were never carried out, and which had, in fact, become nothing but a sham and delusion? If, on the other hand, the Commission should only take a short time to report, the argument was a thousand times stronger, that before the Report might lead to an alteration of the law, at all events the existing law should be properly tried, and that a needless repetition of changes should be avoided. The cause of the outbreak of crime to which he had adverted was the laxity of penal administration, rendering criminals more audacious than ever; and considering the powers with which the Ministers were invested by the law, he might say that they knew themselves to be the primary cause of that outbreak, and that they needed to do little else but stand out of the way of the existing law and let it take effect. Transportation was for a hundred years perseveringly looked on by this country as the main expedient for secondary punishment next to death, the proxima morti pœna; but during that time repeated experiments were made and successive modifications effected, until at last the sentence of transportation became wholly unintelligible, not only to the population, but to the Judges, and in its original sense practically became impossible. In 1853 an Act was passed, substituting penal servitude for sentences of less than fourteen years transportation, and licences to be at large, which were commonly called tickets of leave, were first introduced into our system as a mode of gradual discharge from punishment under check and control. A Select Committee of that House, presided over by the late lamented Mr. Baines, passed sixteen Resolutions, and in 1857 the last Act on the subject was passed, suppressing altogether the sentence of transportation, and substituting entirely for it penal servitude, accepting the recommendations of the Committee, and the system of licences under conditions and guarantees. These two Acts of 1853 and 1857 applied equally to England and Ireland; but they had been differently carried out in the two kingdoms. He would not enter into any comparison of the two administrations. He wished simply to point out the undoubted fact that the practice in England was utterly at variance with the law. Every Member of the House would admit that it was a most serious thing that the language of the criminal law should be at variance with the practice. That state of things was quite sufficient to account for any increase of outrage and crime, and it was enough to make the people tremble for the security of their lives and property. The law said that a man guilty of a crime just short of the penalty of death should be subjected to penal servitude, and under that sentence might ultimately be removed out of the country; or, if not—and that was what occurred in the great number of cases—that he should after imprisonment, in the first place, for a rigid unremittable term, varying from two years and a half to nine years, afterwards be liable to a further remissible term, which was capable of being reduced from one-sixth to one-third by the good conduct of the criminal while in prison. The conditions upon which that remission was given rested with the Secretary of State; and it would be easy to show that neither the remission nor the conditions upon which the remissions had been granted had been carried out by the Home Secretary at all in accordance with the intention of the Act, but rather in direct contravention of it. In speaking of the Home Secretary he wished it to be understood that he was not making any personal attack, but was dealing with the system of the Department in this matter. The intention of the Act might be gathered from the Resolutions of the Committee which it embodied, and it was, that when a sentence was remitted, it did not then terminate, but was only suspended during the good behaviour of the released prisoner. That suspension of punishment was to be granted on a guarantee of past good conduct, and a certain test of labour, which the prisoner might perform in prison. It also could be cancelled by the same discretion which granted it. Nothing could be clearer than the meaning of the Act, which was based upon the 5th, 12th, and 16th Resolutions of the Select Committee in 1856, which stated distinctly that the remission should be a provisional abridgment of the second part of the term of imprisonment, the first part being rigid and incapable of abridgment; and that such abridgment should involve the sentence being still held over the head of the criminal. The practice, however, during the first few years after the Act of 1853 was passed, was to turn loose all sorts of prisoners, good, bad, and indifferent, at the end of the minimum period of incarceration, on the assumption that they had all behaved well and were all fit to receive the proposed conditional liberation to its utmost extent. He could not conceive a more direct and complete contravention of the law than such a practice as that; and he was sorry to find that even down to the present day it was, to a large degree, continued. The latest Returns showed that the proportion of convicts who were discharged at the end of the minimum term was so large and regular, as to preclude the notion that the test of industry and good conduct was really applied. He did not wonder under such circumstances at the general misunderstanding of what was implied by a "licence." The word was equivocal, like the old phrase "licensed to be drunk on the premises," and was capable of a very different interpretation from that intended. The reckless manner in which licences had been granted had rendered the precautions of the legislature a farce, and the sentences of Judges absolute lies. The conditions on which licences were to be held also, had been, and were still, not fulfilled. Endorsed on the ticket of leave was a condition which distinctly stated that if the holder were found consorting with bad company, or were suspected of pursuing criminal courses, he would be liable to be sent back to prison to finish the full term of his original sentence, without any fresh conviction. In point of fact, however, the practice was quite the reverse, for down to the present moment a ticket of leave was not cancelled until the holders had committed a new infraction of the law. The Returns from Wakefield and other places illustrated that feature of the system in a very striking manner. Sir Joshua Jebb, at the Social Science Congress of 1862, had himself stated that the Returns prepared by the direction of the Home Secretary showed that out of 300 ticket-of-leave holders known to the police, about a half were pursuing criminal courses. [Sir GEORGE GREY: That was a mistake.] Sir Joshua Jebb further stated, that upon the Return being made, the Home Secretary directed that the holders of licences should be informed, that if they continued to pursue a criminal course, their licences would be revoked; and that after the expiration of a month another Return was ordered to be made, but not one of the ticket-of-leave holders could be found. In England, it seemed that a fresh infraction of the law was always waited for, before the cancelling of a licence. Without going into a comparison of the Irish system with the English, he would only call attention to the fact, that, besides conditions being enforced, the conditions under which licences were held in the former case were much more stringent than in the latter; and yet, in adopting that stricter course, the Irish Government had only followed out the recommendations of the Committee of 1856. Every ticket-of-leave man in Ireland was placed under the surveillance of the police, to whom he had to report himself once a month, failing which a warrant issued for his re-capture. General Cartwright, a high authority on such a subject, had declared that there was no reason why the same system should not be introduced in England. Moreover, a licence could not be obtained in Ireland until a convict had gone through not only the stages of punishment enforced in England, but an intermediate stage besides to which there was no parallel in the sister country. But he did not intend to propose the addition of a single word to the endorsement on a ticket of leave. He knew, that if he were to propose anything new, the Government would at once suggest another inquiry. He simply wanted that the House should press the Government, pending the inquiry now in progress, to put the existing law in force. There could be no doubt, as he had shown, that the recent extraordinary outbreak of crime was due, not only to the confused state of the statute-book, but also to the lax state of penal administration and the lenity of prison discipline. A Committee of Inquiry had been appointed on that last subject in another place. It really seemed as if a Royal Commission and a Committee of Inquiry were two wet blankets held up by the Government in the face of every man bold enough to propose any practical amelioration either of the law or of the practice. He would even abstain from asking the Government to carry out the existing law if he saw any intention on their part to do so. The steps recently taken by the Home Office showed, on the contrary, an intention still further to depart from the law. A Home Office circular had been sent even after the Commission was appointed to all the Judges, informing them that in future there was to be no remission of punishment to men sentenced for the second time to penal servitude. That circular, at first sight, seemed to indicate a tendency towards a more stringent carrying out of the law; but, in truth, its real tendency was precisely the reverse, much as it had pleased a great many Chairmen of Quarter Sessions. It would have no effect whatever on the length of sentences; the only difference it could make would be that in the worst cases—cases of second convictions for serious crimes—the discharge, whenever the sentence ended, would be given without any of the checks and safeguards supplied by police supervision. The second step volunteered by the Home Secretary pending the inquiry by the Commission would prove equally ineffective. Finding the country to be very anxious that something in the nature of police supervision should be exercised over persons having licences, he had directed that prisoners should be discharged only from Milbank, and in the presence of officers of police. Such a kind of police parade, if it deserved the name of supervision at all, would have all the evils of espionage without a single practical advantage. The police could not retain a knowledge of all the prisoners whom they might see discharged from Milbank; but every discharged prisoner would fancy that the police were always dogging him, and the effect upon him could not fail to be unfortunate. Another circular had been issued from the Home Office, calling upon the mayors of boroughs and Chief Superintendents of Police, to make a return of all convicts discharged on tickets of leave residing within their respective districts. It was quite impossible that such a return could be made. Mayors and police Superintendents did not possess the requisite knowledge, nor could they obtain the desired information even from the prison authorities. It was much to be regretted, that in the Cabinet itself, no clear understanding seemed to exist as to what new regulations, if any, were being made. Not many days ago Lord Derby asked in another place, whether there were any new regulations issued. Earl Granville replied in the affirmative. On the same evening the Home Secretary stated in that House that there were no new regulations issued. The contradiction arose, he believed, from several operations in addition to those already mentioned having been suggested by the Home Secretary, but having been deferred. Those alterations extended to impoverishment of the dietary and other internal arrangements of prisons. He had shown that the law and the practice were at variance in England, and that the present state of things was well calculated to produce alarm; that a Commission might find much to inquire into, but that the Government were playing fresh tricks all the while they were inquiring, and he thought he was making a moderate request, when he asked the House to agree to address the Crown for a stoppage of further experiments, and an enforcement of the existing law at least till the Royal Commission reported.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for having issued a Commission of Inquiry into the operation of the Acts relating to Transportation and Penal Servitude, and into the manner in which sentences under the provisions of those Acts have been carried out; and praying that, pending that inquiry, the conditions on which any remission of punishment, or Licences to be at large, are given, may be strictly enforced according to the intentions of those Acts,"

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought it would be extremely inconvenient that the House should agree to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman proposed that they should tender their thanks to Her Majesty for appointing a Commission of Inquiry; and then to take one important branch of the subject referred to that Commission out of its hands, without waiting till it had had fair time to finish its labours. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of robberies with violence having been very frequent in the metropolis during the last six months, and had stated that the manner in which the law was administered against their perpetrators gave them such comparative impunity that no man's life or property would be safe. He would not now dispute with the right hon. Gentleman as to the cause of these crimes, though men quite as competent to judge did not agree with him in attributing them to the lax administration of the law. He would simply say, in justice to the police of the metropolis, that the measures they had taken, which it would not be very prudent to explain, aided by the efficient administration of the law by the Judges, had led to the apprehension and conviction of the offenders, and had put a stop to these outrages. The House would shortly be put in possession of the Report of the Royal Commission, which he believed would tend to correct many of the misconceptions of the right hon. Gentleman. As the Commissioners were still sitting, he would not attempt to follow the right hon. Gentleman through all the points he had raised. Had it not been so, he should have thought it his duty to explain much more fully than he now proposed, the way in which the law was administered. For his own conduct in administering the law he wished to shrink from no responsibility; but as the present system had been administered under five successive Secretaries of State, he thought the right hon. Gentleman might be more diffident in asking the House to endorse his opinions. The right hon. Gentleman was under a total misapprehension in regard to the Act of 1857. It was the Act of 1853 which substituted for shorter sentences than fourteen years sentences of penal servitude, leaving it in the option of the Judge to pass a sentence of transportation or of penal servitude; and that statute authorized the Crown, in respect to either of those sentences, for the first time to grant licences to be at large to persons convicted of offences so punishable, those licences to be revocable on such conditions as the Crown might prescribe. The Act of 1857 did not refer at all to those licences. What it provided, following out the recommendation of the Committee of 1856, was that shorter sentences than seven years, formerly the minimum term of transportation, might be passed, and that sentences of penal servitude might be passed of not less than three years; and the result had been that the great majority of sentences of penal servitude since 1857 had been for three, four, or five years. But he was at a loss to find in these statutes any enactments that convicts released either absolutely or on ticket of leave should be placed under police surveillance. The conditions on which the licences were to be revoked were left entirely to the discretion of the Ministers of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman was quite mistaken in supposing that it was the practice immediately after 1857 to give unconditional remissions of punishments, and that therefore the public had been injured. The endorsement on the licence stated that the holder, though not actually convicted of another crime, was liable to be sent back to prison for the whole of the unexpired portion of his sentence if he associated with thieves or led a disorderly life. The question of the enforcement of these conditions was one which was under the consideration of the Commission. The whole difficulty of the case lay in this:—That there were no means of instituting a judicial inquiry into the conduct of such a man, unless he were positively charged with a specific crime. The conviction for any offence, however small, of a man holding a ticket of leave was taken as indisputable proof that the condition on which he received his licence had been violated, and the licence was accordingly revoked. No doubt, there were some instances in which, notwithstanding conviction for some further offence, the licence had not been revoked; but those were chiefly cases in which the punishment for the second offence exceeded the unexpired portion of the previous sentence. Where, too, the new offence was not of a sufficiently grave character to indicate a return to the criminal class—as, for example, hawking without a licence, bastardy cases, and the like—the licence was not revoked; but in all other instances—even where the second charge was drunkenness and assault—it was taken away, and the holder sent back to prison. There had been many instances in which, without the actual commission of any new offence, but yet where there was enough evidence to show that the ticket-of-leave holder was associating with thieves or relapsing into criminal courses, the licence had been withdrawn. But the difficulty was, as he had said, in obtaining clear proof on that point without a judicial inquiry. He thought the House would not like to pledge itself to an opinion that licences should be revoked without proof of any kind, but on the mere suspicion of some individual policeman that the conditions of the licence had been broken. In the pamphlet referred to by the right hon. Gentleman it was stated that a large number of these licence-holders were at large in Sheffield. Being greatly surprised at the statement, in September last he wrote for information on that point, and received from the Sheffield police a very long list of names. He afterwards communicated with the Mayor, and he learnt that most of these names were names of persons who, having expiated their offences, were then at large, and belonging, no doubt, a considerable portion of them, to the criminal class. But under no construction of the law could these persons be placed under the surveillance of the police; they were as free as any other class of men in the kingdom until they again rendered themselves amenable to punishment. Seven of the entire list were, however, believed by the local police to be relapsing into criminal courses. On an investigation it was found that of these seven only one was the holder of a ticket of leave; but it took six weeks to satisfy the Mayor of Sheffield, who undertook the investigation, that the circumstances were such that the licence should be revoked. That would be the real difficulty of the case; and if the views of the right hon. Gentleman were allowed to prevail—if the holders of tickets of leave were to have them revoked without any judicial inquiry—it would be necessary to establish for them what, indeed, existed in penal colonies, a code applicable only to those persons, rendering them subject to a summary jurisdiction to which no other class was amenable.

Before sitting down he wished to notice two or three statements made by the right hon. Gentleman. One of them related to an error which appeared in a statement of figures appended to the letter of the West Riding magistrates in reply to Sir Joshua Jebb. Now, he had written to those magistrates on the subject, and it turned out that the numbers, instead of 200, should have been only 29, and they promised to correct the inaccuracy if the pamphlet reached a second edition. Then again, the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that there had been any interference in regard to holders of tickets of leave sentenced a second time. In point of fact, some time before the Commission was issued, in consequence of the number of robberies attended with violence supposed to be committed by licence-holders, although subsequent investigation proved that they had not been committed by them at all to the extent alleged, it was thought desirable, to meet these very cases, that instructions should be given that the published rules with regard to the remission of sentences should not be acted on in the case of any prisoner so circumstanced; on the ground, that if a second crime were committed, the person committing it proved by that fact that he belonged to that class of offenders to whom no indulgence should be shown. With respect to the circular to mayors and borough authorities, he had never heard of it till the extracts were read from it at the table. He supposed it must have been issued by the Commission—certainly he had never seen it. An erroneous impression was entertained in regard to the extent to which street robberies accompanied by violence had been committed by persons previously convicted. Of a list of those violent street robberies it turned out that only two were committed by men who were licence-holders, and four by parties who had been sentenced to transportation or penal servitude. With regard to penal servitude, the right hon. Gentleman complained that very different language was held by different Ministers on the subject of the dietary of prisoners. Now, the Commission had only reference to those prisoners who passed through convict prisons under the conduct of the Government; while the Committee of the House of Lords had reference to the management of borough and county gaols, which were regulated quite differently from convict prisons. The administration of punishment in county and borough gaols, which were chiefly under the justices, formed a very useful subject of inquiry; but the right hon. Gentleman proposed for inquiry what would undoubtedly come before the Commission; and if the Address were adopted, the subject would be withdrawn from their attention. With respect to letters of licence, it was a condition that a ticket of leave or licence should be available only within the limits of the United Kingdom; and therefore, knowing that the moment a convict left the country he was illegally at large, the Government had not encouraged emigration. But they had shut their eyes to it, knowing how desirable it was that discharged men should seek the means of obtaining an honest living; and they had paid the gratuities, which would otherwise have been paid to the discharged prisoners themselves, to the Prisoners' Aid Society, which had undertaken to promote emigration among this class. The system of directly encouraging emigration among this class was adopted in Ireland, and no doubt it had its advantages arising from the peculiar circumstances of that country; and a gentleman was salaried to visit and advise discharged prisoners. He wished to draw no invidious comparison between the two countries; but if the Address of the right hon. Gentleman were adopted, the effect would be that many would be found at large who had no legal right to emigrate. He hoped, when the Commission reported, the right hon. Gentleman would carefully read the evidence, and thereby correct his knowledge of facts. At present it would certainly be premature to adopt his Address.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he thought the House was deeply indebted to the right hon. Member who had moved the Address, for bringing forward the subject; and regretted that the Secretary of State had not given a more satisfactory answer. He confessed that he was unable to see where the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) had fallen into inaccuracy. The twelfth recommendation of the Commissioners' Report was conditional only. In the fifteenth and sixteenth recommendations they suggested that the convicts should be watched by the police. Now, the facts were, that great numbers of convicts were being discharged from the prisons, and tickets of leave were given to prisoners set at large, who might be watched by the police, without any Act of Parliament being passed for that purpose; and it was for that reason that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had brought this Motion before the House. He was under the impression that the system in Ireland, and in England, was equally under the control of the Home Office, and that the right hon. Baronet was at the head of either system. Yet in the two countries we had two systems in operation founded on two different principles. He could not understand the objections of the right hon. Gentleman to giving them that security for persons and property, when convicts were sent out on a ticket of leave, which was recommended by the Committee of that House, by a number of Magistrates, by General Cartwright, Inspector General of Constabulary, and by many of the Chief Constables of different Counties, and which really, as far as he could find out, had no opponents in this country except the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) and Sir Joshua Jebb. It all depended upon the fiat of the right hon. Gentleman, whether convicts dismissed to-morrow on tickets of leave should be placed under the surveillance of the police. The system of the right hon. Gentleman had proved an utter failure; whereas the surveillance that was required would not act in any kind of way to prevent a man from obtaining employment. He certainly could not understand why seven years should have been allowed to elapse with two different systems in operation, without a comparison being made to ascertain which excelled, so that we might have one uniform plan. If the right hon. Baronet had taken this course, there would have been no need of a Commission. What had the Commission to discover beyond what was found by the Committees in 1856? If those recommendations had been carried out, the whole system of secondary punishments would have been gone into; but the right hon. Baronet, in not having dealt with the whole convict body, had not got his case ready for a Commission to deal with. Looking at the results of the Committee of 1856, he could not understand what the present Commission were to find out additional, and he was disappointed that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) had not acceded to the Address of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There was £11,000,000 worth of property consumed annually by crime, either in its repression or in depredations; and of this sum £4,000,000 were spent in its repression. There were 21,000 policemen, or one to every six of the criminal class, which was not the proper proportion, or one that ought to exist in any well-ordered state. This was a subject which must interest every Member of the House, and he trusted, that notwithstanding the opposition which had been given, the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the question, and be prepared to examine and see whether he could not place the convicts, which are henceforward liberated, under some kind of surveillance that would enable the police to know what had become of him.

MR. HENLEY said, it was not his intention to follow the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. H. Seymour) in the wild and discursive field which he had travelled over. He thanked God, being a member of the Commission, that they had not to go into the whole subject of secondary punishments. It was a large field; and he was quite sure, that if they were to undertake that matter, it would be made a very short inquiry indeed. Nor would he go into the question—also not a small one—whether any and what means ought to be taken to obtain a more perfect surveillance of the police over the criminal population. That, also, was a rather large inquiry. Many people thought that the police had got power enough; and, at all events, it was a very large question. He would confine himself strictly to the Motion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley). He would abstain from going into the comparative merits of the Irish and English systems, which was a question his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) himself had not raised; indeed, so far as he could upon such a subject, he had carefully avoided it. He could only say this, that he knew of nothing that would lead him to the same conclusion as the hon. Member opposite had come to. When the facts of the Irish system were looked into, he doubted very much whether any one would be able to come to the conclusion which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Seymour) seemed to regard as so certain. Of this he was quite sure, that if all the recommendations of the Committee were to be carried out, there would be considerable difficulty in following the Irish system. He believed, that if a man received a licence of leave in Ireland, he could walk into England and Scotland without the least check; and therefore if they were to be hindered, and kept under strict surveillance, the result would be that some of the criminals who figured in the English prisons we might not have the privilege of seeing so frequently as we do now. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) had gone at considerable length into the recommendations of the Committee of 1856, and he stated that in 1857 there was a wholesale abuse of the system; and that for two or three years after the practice was even more lavishly resorted to. Well, what was the result? Why, from 1857 to 1860 there was the most remarkable diminution in crime ever known in this country; so that during the time that, according to him, the greatest abuse of this system was going on, the gaols were almost getting empty. Anybody who knew anything of the condition of our prisons in 1860 would know that we never had so little crime. Still, if there were any force in the reasoning of his right hon. Friend, there must have been a great benefit and advantage to us, so far as security of life and property was concerned, from this relaxation of a system whereby criminals were let out upon us. In 1860 a more stringent, and, according to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley), a sounder line was adopted; and from that time criminals began to increase, and gradually crept up; and though we had not yet got so bad as we were in 1857, yet he was afraid, that when the Returns for 1862 were laid before the House, it would be found that we were getting back to the state of things that existed at that time. He believed that this increase and decrease of crime did not rest upon the treatment of the criminal population. He believed that they were to be accounted for by deeper causes; and that, from time to time, we should have ebbs and flows in crime; and if we set to work to alter our laws upon every occasion—upon every ebb and flow of crime—we should be led into a greater mass of confusion than we were in at the present. His right hon. Friend alluded to the Return from the different police authorities of the country ordered by the House for that Commission. It was not ordered, so far as he knew, for any other purpose. Of course the information obtained that way was good, so far as it went; it was valuable as showing two things—how far the police were vigilant, and what number of criminals they knew of and what they were doing; and if the police, who were in the proportion of 1 to 1,000 of the population of the country, and of 1 to 500 in the metropolis, were worth their salt, they should be able to exercise considerable oversight over the criminal population. For himself, he could not see what good such a Resolution as this, if carried out, would do; and he was one of those who thought the right hon. the Secretary of State had not exercised an unsound discretion when he required something like proof that a man was going wrong after he was let out. He quite agreed with him, that the simple assertion that a person was doing wrong ought not to be received, except upon a full inquiry. He was one of those who thought that no man ought to be condemned unheard; and certainly to deprive a man of the remission of sentence of one year or six months was a thing that ought not to be done without his having the power of answering what was alleged against him. He would vote against this Motion if it went to a division; but he hoped his right hon. Friend would not divide the House upon it, but be content with the expression of opinion that had taken place.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) might congratulate himself upon some of the results he had attained by bringing the subject before the House; and he must say, that looking to the state of public opinion upon this subject, it would hardly have been satisfactory if this House had allowed the Session to pass without some discussion on so important a question. Some points elicited in the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State were not unsatisfactory, and they would tend to dissipate some erroneous impressions which existed in the minds of the people on this question. But with reference to what had just been stated as to the possible utility of such a Motion as this, there was one point of view in which they should look at it. A Commission is now sitting to inquire into the whole subject; that Commission would shortly make its Report, to which he should expect some weight would be attached, while upon its recommendations possibly some legislation might be founded. They had had in former years inquiries by Committees of this and the other House of Parliament, and upon the recommendations of those Committees Acts of Parliament had been passed and steps had been taken with the intention of carrying out the suggestions of those Committees. The question was whether the recommendations of those Committees had been actually carried into effect—because this fact had a certain bearing upon the Report which they expected from the Commission. The Act which was passed following the Report of the Committee some years ago was expected to prove satisfactory, because it was supposed to carry out the recommendations of that Committee. What they wanted to know was whether these recommendations had really been acted upon or not, because they wanted also to know whether the recommendations which they expected from the Commission would be carried out or avoided in practice by the Legislature; and whether, pending this inquiry, Government would give directions to carry out the Act as was intended by the Parliament which passed it? Attention had been called to one particular point—namely, the conditions endorsed on the ticket of leave. His right hon. Friend did not mean to say that the law was violated by the executive Government, because the Act gave the Secretary of State the power of issuing these tickets of leave under such conditions as he thought fit. It was, however, clearly the intention of the Committee of 1856, and of the Government which endorsed their recommendations, that when the conditions were so endorsed, the tickets of leave given should be a reality and not a sham—not that they should be tickets allowing a person to act unconditionally free, and that the person should be subject to severer punishment in case he committed a second offence—and it was undoubtedly the intention of that Committee that these tickets should be some kind of security for the good conduct of the prisoners allowed to go at large. The general impression of the public was that the ticket of leave was a sham, and the ticket-of-leave men themselves seemed to be of the same opinion. They thought all they had to do was to keep themselves out of the clutch of the law a second time. The right hon. Gentleman had told them there were great difficulties in revoking the ticket of leave, unless the law were a second time violated by the holder; and yet, he said, he had sometimes revoked it though no new crime had been committed. It was evident there was a great deal of confusion in connection with the whole subject. His right hon. Friend had done good service in bringing the question forward, and in doing so he had given expression to the feelings of the public. He hoped the Commission would recommend some intelligible course of action which the Legislature might adopt, and that the Government would give an assurance that whatever might be agreed upon would be carried into effect.

MR. HADFIELD said, he was of opinion that the Report of the Commission would show that the ticket-of-leave system had been completely successful. Nearly 6,000 persons had been discharged under it, and at least 90 per cent of them had not relapsed into crime. In Ireland, out of 724 tickets of leave, only 71 persons (51 men and 20 women, or less than 10 per cent) had again offended. Of these 51 men 21 did not offend until the full term of their imprisonment had expired, and of the 20 women three only had offended before that time. If the number of recommissions as shown by the Returns were reduced for offences of a trifling character—for felonies not accompanied with violence—it would be found very small indeed. But it was a subject of great regret that no provision should be made for persons who, having lost their character, were let loose upon society without a friend in the world. The majority of these persons were penniless, powerless, and friendless, and, in fact, the greatest objects of compassion a Christian mind could look for.

MR. NEWDEGATE trusted that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) would withdraw the Motion before the House. He was bound to ask his right hon. Friend to do this, because his right hon. Friend had made a proposal in the quarter sessions for Warwickshire, at which they were both present, similar to that before the House, and he (Mr. Newdegate) had presented a petition to the House signed by the magistrates there present, which was adopted in opposition to the proposal then made. The feeling amongst the magistrates was one of thankfulness to the Government for having issued the Commission, and their petition was that the existing law with respect to secondary punishments might be changed. That was the general feeling of the country and of the magistrates; it would therefore be impossible that their representatives could concur in condemning the Government for not carrying out satisfactorily a law which they believed to be imperfect. He believed that the opinion of the great majority of the people and of the intelligent classes was that the abandonment of transportation had been a very great misfortune to this country, and a misfortune to those unhappy persons who had fallen into crime. The fact that such persons were unable to find employment here was a proof of the high tone of the morality of the country. It had been admitted over and over again by Sir William Denison, by the Home Secretary, and by Earl Grey, that under the system of transportation and of assignment in the colonies, persons who had been convicted of crime were enabled to recover themselves and become honest members of society. Such a system, therefore, was merciful to the unhappy person who had fallen into crime; and he trusted that nothing that had passed in that debate would be held to prejudice the consideration of that question by the Commissioners. The people of this country were earnest in their desire that the Commissioners should investigate the subject, with a view of ascertaining whether some new sphere might not be discovered to which our criminals might be transported, where they could have a chance of recovering their position, for this they could not do in this country unless its tone of morality had been degraded. A comparison had been instituted between the success of the present system of secondary punishments in this country and in Ireland. The fact was, that England had not yet a system of police like that in Ireland, and he spoke confidently when he said that the people of this country did not wish or need to have a like system; if any system of secondary punishments were introduced here that would require such a change in the character of our police force, the people of this country would consider that system very dearly purchased.

Mr. BENTINCK concurred with his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) in proposing that immediate steps should be taken to make the law with reference to this question more stringent. Nothing had been said as to when it was likely that the Report of the Commission would appear; and it seemed to him that one material point had been altogether overlooked in this discussion—namely, whether, when they had the Report, it was likely that they would be able to act upon it. He thought that the speech and the Motion of his right hon. Friend were contradictory of each other, because in one he asked the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir G. Grey) to deal in a summary way with this question, and in the other he sanctioned delay. He objected to the Motion of his right hon. Friend because it countenanced delay. It appeared to him that the great error that had been committed in this matter was in the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir G. Grey) in referring this matter to a Commission. The right hon. Gentleman had not touched on that subject. He was at a loss to understand what ground the right hon. Gentleman, in the position he occupied, had for referring this subject to a Commission. He was at a loss to understand how any Commission, however ably it might be composed, could become possessed of better or more reliable information than that which was in the possession of the right hon. Gentleman. It was simply shifting responsibility. What was the use of an executive Government at all if they were not prepared to deal with questions like this? It seemed to him that this was one of those cases in which the right hon. Gentleman ought to have acted on his own responsibility. It had been said that there had not been lately such a marked increase in crime as there had been previous to 1857. That might be the case with regard to general crime; but there had been a large increase lately in a particular description of crime perpetrated by a particular class of men—men who had been liberated under the existing system; and it was for that very reason that it was incumbent on the right hon. Baronet himself to deal with the question. He (Mr. Bentinck) entirely concurred with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that they would never arrive at a good result until they again resorted to the system of transportation. Nothing else would save society from a repetition of those practices which had recently created such a strong feeling in the public mind.

MR. CAVE said, the real reason why the present system worked well in Ireland was because the convicts were obliged themselves to report to the police what their mode of living was. It was quite a mistake to suppose that these men could only be employed in a degraded state of society. The reason they were employed in Ireland was that in reality a ticket of leave there was a certificate of good character. A ticket of leave in this country, on the contrary, was a mere certificate that the person had been convicted of crime. The Act of 1853 gave the Home Secretary the widest power to endorse on tickets of leave whatever conditions were thought desirable; and if the conditions were less strict in this country than in Ireland, the Home Secretary had authority in his own hands to remove the discrepancy. The proper object of a ticket of leave was to prevent an offender, by means of the supervision to which he should be subjected, from committing a second offence; but, instead of that course being pursued in this country, the ticket-of-leave man was now told that after he committed a second offence his ticket of leave would be revoked. That was not the right course of proceeding, for it was calculated to set every man against the criminal who obtained a release, to make every one his enemy, and also to exasperate the criminal against society, because it was rendered impossible for him to obtain a livelihood in an honest manner. The Home Secretary had spoken as if his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) had started at a ghost which no one saw but himself. Why, during the whole winter the country had been sounding the alarm. If this question had been raised for discussion a few months ago, there would not have been such empty benches as were to be seen in the House on the present occasion. Every one then felt his life and property unsafe on account of the prevailing outrages. But the tide had now rather turned, in consequence of the extraordinary exertions of the police in driving these offenders into the provinces, and there was, unfortunately, at present a certain stagnation. This was a most unfortunate circumstance, when it was wished that the law should be enforced. Precisely the same thing occurred in 1856. A series of outrages between 1853 and 1856 roused the nation, and a call was raised for some change in the law, but the question was shelved by being referred to a Committee. There was, as the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire had said, an ebb and flow in crime, caused by various circumstances. It was during the flow that the laws were tested; and because the pressure of the flood of crime ceased for a time to bear against the gates, which had proved inadequate to restrain it when that pressure was at its height, it by no means followed that the law was in a satisfactory state. Returns, such as that which had been quoted, showing the proportion of reformed ticket-of-leave men, were perfectly illusory, for it was admitted that little was known of what became of the holders. He remembered what Serjeant Adams had once told him of the advice he gave to the holder of a ticket of leave—namely, to throw it over the first bridge, in order that he might not be known in that capacity. He was by no means one of those who advocated a return to the severity of penal discipline, but he was decidedly opposed to the continuance of a system which suggested to the struggling, honest man whether it might not be better after all to become a criminal.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had always considered it a gross inhumanity to release felons without affording them some means of obtaining a honest livelihood. Destitute of the means of self-support, they must either steal or starve. Transportation was unquestionably a means of ridding the country of this class of the population; and if colonies objected to receive transported criminals, there were plenty of waste lands in which communities might be founded, as that in New South Wales had originally been. That colony was founded by felons, and yet it had become a highly respectable community. In nine cases out of ten want of employment was at the root of the evil, and no legislative act had tended to diminish juvenile vagrancy like the establishment of the Shoe-black Brigades, the boys in which not alone earned sufficient for their own support, but were actually putting money into the savings banks.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, as allusion had been made to the working of the convict system in Ireland, he wished to remind the House that the position of the two countries was very different. There were two causes of its failure in England—the existence of large and crowded cities, and the existence of a professional criminal class, neither of which were to be found in Ireland. Whenever there appeared in Ireland men desirous of following crime as a profession, they generally came over to England, from a belief that there was a larger field open to them there for the exercise of their abilities. Under the ticket-of-leave system there should be established a proper surveillance, by which the conduct of the holders could be observed and reported upon. He, however, believed that our criminal system would never work properly without transportation. There were plenty of the possessions of the Crown that were suited for the purpose, and he deprecated that morbid sensibility which would hesitate to send criminals to places because they were too hot or too cold. He objected to the principle of considering the health of the criminal more than the health of the soldier or the sailor.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

ACCOUNTS OF ARMY EXPENDITURE.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY rose to call attention to a subject relating to the Army Estimates, which he could not introduce in Committee, because it did not relate to anything connected with the Estimates of the year. That subject referred to the payment of £19,385 for German Military Settlers in Vote No. 3, Army Estimates, 1860-1. In his opinion it was a blot upon our financial system that for two years past they had received no detailed account of the army expenditure, and yet they went on voting the Estimates without that information. At the present moment they had had no account of the details of the army expenditure of 1861-2, nor, of course, of the expenditure of 1862-3. Yet those two years' expenditure amounted to upwards of £30,000,000. It was singular that for so long a time they had been in the habit of voting the Estimates without the slightest evidence of the manner in which those enormous grants had been expended in the previous year. The last detailed account submitted was that of 1860-1, which was only delivered on the 30th of May, after the Army Estimates had all been voted, and was, consequently, of no avail for the discussion of the army expenditure of last year. He wished to call the attention of the House more particularly to a certain payment of £19,385 for German military settlers at the Cape. In the Estimates for 1860-1 it was true that the words "paid to German Military Settlers at the Cape" appeared; but they were printed in italics, which was the customary form when it was intended to intimate that there would be no call for that money in the current year. That being the case, it was a matter of much surprise to him, on examining the detailed account alluded to, of the expenditure of 1860-1, to find under Vote No. 3, called "For Miscellaneous Purposes," this item of £19,385. The Accountant General of the War Office, an able officer of considerable experience, seemed to say that this was an excess which, amongst others, was occasioned because Parliament had provided no pay for the German military settlers. Now, he (Sir Henry Willoughby) wished to ask, by what authority the Secretary for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer made this payment of £19,385? The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) some time since put a question on the subject to the Secretary of State, but received an answer which he (Sir Henry Willoughby) did not consider at all satisfactory. If the Government were to be held justified for the expenditure of the public money not actually voted by that House, then there was an end to any control exercised by that House. He thought it right to bring this question before the House, but he did not wish to make any Motion in the matter.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the Government had taken greater credit for reductions in the army and navy; but, looking closely into the Estimates, he did not believe there was any reduction in the force and expenditure of the army. The boasted reduction was in reference to the stores and manufacturing departments. He had hoped to find a great reduction in the number of our standing army, but it appeared that the army for the year was to consist of 436,000 men of various grades in the military service. The hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel North) seemed incredulous, but he would give the details. The number of men in the standing army was 147,000; from which he deducted 40,000 for the colonies, leaving 107,000 for home service. The pensioners amounted to 15,000, the marines on shore to 11,000, and the militia to 128,900, the Volunteers to 160,000, and the yeomanry cavalry to 14,000; making a total of nearly 436,000 men. The cost of this enormous force amounted to about £15,000,000. If to this number were added the Native army of India, it would be seen that they had the largest military force of any country in Europe. In 1852, when the Government of Lord Derby was in office, the number of men in the army of all grades was 205,000 and the expenditure £9,100,000; in 1853, when Lord Aberdeen was Prime Minister, the number of men was 200,000, and the expenditure £8,550,000. Was it not astounding that the expenditure should now be £6,000,000 more than it was in 1852, and £6,500,000 more than it was in 1853? Where was the necessity of this increase? No Government of France had ever been more friendly towards this country than the present one, and he had seen a Return which showed that the number of the French army was only 336,000 men of all ranks, while the total number of the English army was, as he had shown, 436,000. What did this mean? Then there was our colonial expenditure, amounting to £4,250,000. No doubt, Gibraltar and Malta required a large military force to be kept up; but our other colonies ought to pay for any military aid they might require, and in this way we might reduce our expenditure £3,000,000 sterling.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that after the House had gone into Committee, he would show the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Williams), that he had taken an inaccurate view of the number of our army and of the expenditure on its account. With regard to the question of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Willoughby), it was quite true that there was no item of £19,000 for the Military Settlers in the Estimates of 1860; but, under the provisions of the Appropriation Act, the Treasury sanctioned an application of the War Office with regard to the pay of the German settlers, as set out in a letter appended to the Estimates, and he believed the transaction was perfectly legal. The War Office sanctioned the transfer of money from one Vote to another, with the sanction of the Treasury at the time, and of the Parliament subsequently.

MR. WALPOLE said, the complaint was, that there being no Vote taken for the German settlers that year, there was no power so to appropriate the money. The explanation was that under the Appropriation Act there was power of transfer. But that power was confined to Votes in Committee of Supply, not to expenditure where no Vote had been taken; and there was an abuse of authority both in the War Office and in the Treasury.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Appropriation Act knew nothing of items; it dealt with general heads, and he contended that the payment for the German Military Settlers came under the general head of "Pay and Provisions for Troops."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH called attention to the form in which the Estimates were drawn up. In some respects an improvement had been made, but in others the reverse was the case. It was impossible to analyse the Estimates critically and compare them with former ones, without an immense amount of labour. He also complained that an item was omitted from the present Estimates which had always been given in previous years—the Number of Men. The House should not be asked to vote money without first knowing the number of men who were to receive it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that the first item to be submitted in Committee would be the Number of Men.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the £19,000 for the German Military Settlers never appeared in the Votes at all; and if items were to be paid out of the public money besides those contained in the Estimates, of what use was it for the House to go through them at all? He thought the Treasury had been betrayed into an excess of authority; and hoped that the item would be submitted for the consideration of the House.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: It has been printed and laid on the table.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Supply considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, in reference to what has fallen from the hon. and gallant Officer opposite (Sir F. Smith), I have to state that the Estimates for this year have undergone a certain change of form in order that they may be laid before the House in a more convenient shape. The first Vote, which used to consist of Men only, has been omitted, in imitation of the mode in which the Naval Estimates are submitted to the House. The statement of the Number of Men is included within the Estimates, and I shall follow the usual practice of moving that number in the first Vote; so that if any Gentleman wishes to propose a simple reduction of the number, it will be competent to him to do so. In bringing the Army Estimates under the notice of this House last Session, I stated that the sum included in them had undergone a considerable increase since the period of the Crimean war, and I attempted to explain the causes of that increase. I trust that the expenditure on the army may have reached its culminating point about two years ago. Last year the Estimate which I presented to the House was less than that of the previous year; and the Estimate which I propose this year is as nearly as possible £1,000,000 within the Estimate of last year. In order, however, to arrive at the true amount of the Army Estimate it is necessary to bear in mind certain other virtual and practical deductions which ought to be made from it. The sum which was voted last year, including the Militia, which is included in this Estimate, was £16,060,350; the amount which I propose to take for the present year is £15,060,147, showing, as I have said, a decrease of somewhat more than a million sterling. It is to be borne in mind that there are certain important sets-off to be made against that sum. According to the best estimate which we can frame, there will be sums to be paid into the Exchequer this year as receipts, virtually in aid of the Army Estimate, amounting to not less than £1,364,000. This will be a real payment into the Exchequer, and must be considered as a deduction to that amount from the Army Estimate. A large portion of that sum is in respect of charges which this House will be asked to vote towards the expenses of the Indian army incurred in this country, and which will be repaid by the Indian Treasury. These sums were formerly, to a great extent, made matter of account between the India Office and the War Office, and were never submitted to Parliament. Last year that practice underwent a change, and certain charges in respect to the Indian army appeared for the first time in the Estimates. If, therefore, a comparison is made between the Estimate of this year and that for any year previous to the last, it is necessary to deduct the sum of £660,000, which is estimated in the accounts for this year, but which was not included in the Estimates for the years previous to the last.

Sir, when we speak of the Army Estimates we generally are thinking primarily of the regular army; and I think that my hon. Friend (Mr. Williams), who compared our force with the military force of France, mainly had in view the regular army of that country. But a very considerable sum is introduced into these Estimates for forces auxiliary to the regular army. There is for the Disembodied Militia, £751,000; Yeomanry, £94,000; Volunteers, which is larger than in any previous year, £321,000; Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve, £55,000; and for half-pay of the Disembodied Militia, £32,000; making a total amount of £1,255,000. That sum, which is included in the total amount of the Army Estimates, is for forces auxiliary to the regular army, and not in any respect for the regular army itself. The Army Estimate also includes what was formerly the Ordnance Estimate. The Ordnance Department, I need not say, makes ordnance and other weapons for the navy as well as for the army, and there will be included in the Army Estimate for this year a sum of £680,000, which is for the sea service. But then the Navy Estimate also includes a sum for military transport amounting to £381,000; and therefore the sum really charged in the Army Estimates in aid of those of the navy is the difference between those two amounts. There is another circumstance to be adverted to in regard to the Estimates for the present year—which is, that there is a considerable extraordinary expense for the army on certain foreign stations; and that therefore as far as the sums charged for China, New Zealand, and British North America are concerned, this cannot be considered a year of ordinary peace expenditure. In the year 1858 the military charge for British North America was £285,000; the Estimate for the present is £887,000. For New Zealand, in 1858, the charge was £86,000; for this year the Estimate is £347,000. During the four years from 1853 to 1857 inclusive, the military expenses of the China station were £84,000 per annum; this year they amount to £334,000. Therefore a comparison of the Estimates, taking these three items together, shows a difference between £456,000 and £1,569,000, the difference being the amount of extraordinary charges to which we are put this year on account of these three foreign stations.

Sir George Lewis

The principal reduction in the present Estimate is under the head of "Stores" and "Works." The plan upon which the Estimate has been framed has been to make no material or serious reduction in the strength of our army, for reasons which I will shortly state to the Committee, and which appear to me to be cogent and quite decisive; but for various reasons, one of which is the great exertions that have of late years been made in the manufacturing departments, it has been found possible to propose a considerable reduction in the Votes for Works and Stores. Another reason why it has been thought to be undesirable to take as large a Vote as usual under these two heads is that at present the question of ordnance is to a great extent in suspense. There have been former trials of the comparative merits of different guns which either are in use or are proposed for introduction into the service. A Committee of scientific officers and civil engineers has lately been appointed to inquire into the relative merits of the Armstrong and Whitworth guns, and it has not been thought advisable to incur any great expense for the manufacture of iron ordnance while the trials are still pending. And I may add that the activity and energy of the manufacturing department during the last few years has placed the Government in possession of a large supply of guns, in consequence of which there is no necessity for any rapid increase of their number. I have taken scarcely any Vote for guns for the army during the present year. What I have taken is almost exclusively to meet the demand for the navy. I believe I may state that the whole amount asked for for guns for the army in the present year falls short of £5,000; in fact it is not intended to proceed with the manufacture of guns except for merely temporary supply. It is in that part of the Estimate, as the Committee will see, that the great reduction in the present year is effected. I do not concur with my hon. Friend in thinking that any inconvenience will be caused to the public service by reducing our stores to the extent of £1,000,000 during the present year, nor do I believe that our resources will be in any way crippled. I have no doubt that I have asked for a sum sufficient to supply all the additions that will be wanted during the present year, and that this sum can without difficulty be spared from the public service.

I now come to the question of the strength of the army. The Committee will observe that in Vote No. 1, the first in which money is involved, there is an apparent increase under the head of Staff and Regimental Pay and Allowances of £255,000. If, however, hon. Members will refer to a paper which I have caused to be circulated since the Estimates were printed, they will perceive that £209,000 of that excess over last year, is attributable to the augmentation of the number of of the depôts in this country of regiments serving in India, the whole amount of the excess being covered by a capitation grant payable from the Indian Government to Her Majesty's Exchequer. The excess is, in fact, apparent and not real, and will be reimbursed to the Exchequer by repayments from the Indian Treasury. But the Vote which I am now about to ask you to agree to is one for 148,242 men as compared with 152,403 last year—thus showing a diminution of 4,161 in the strength of the army. There has, I may add, been no reduction made in the number of battalions, which remains precisely the same as last year. We propose, however, that there should be a reduction of 100 rank and file in all the battalions serving at home and in the Colonies, except at Ceylon, where there is only one battalion, for the increase of the strength of which a demand was lately made; in China, where there is a great draught on the troops; and in New Zealand, which is in a state of war; no diminution being proposed to be effected also in the first five battalions for foreign service. The reduction will operate on sixty-nine battalions; and that is the manner in which the strength of the army will be reduced to the extent which I have stated. Now, I am desirous of laying before the Committee the precise grounds on which Government have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to reduce the number of the battalions below that at which it at present stands, or to diminish the number of men in them beyond the amount which I have mentioned. If the reasons on the point which I have to submit to them should appear to hon. Members to be satisfactory, they will at once perceive that the grounds on which we determined to propose these Estimates have no reference to the subject which has just been adverted to—the fear of a French invasion or of invasion from any other country in Europe—but that the number of men is made to depend on the peculiar distribution of our army. If we look to France, and to other continental States, we find that their armies are, for the most part, confined within the limits of their respective countries. The French, it is true, have a certain amount of force in Algeria and a garrison at Rome, while they have fitted out also an expedition to Mexico; but the great bulk of the French troops is contained within the limits of France. To Prussia, Austria, and other continental nations, the same observation applies. Their armies, to a certain extent, resemble our militia, if we were to suppose it to be called out throughout the year. The English army is, however, placed in totally different circumstances. In the current year, 1862-3, the infantry force of our army is distributed as follows:—The number of battalions of infantry on the establishment at home is 40; in the colonies, 45; in India, 56:—that is to say, 40 at home and 101 abroad; so that nearly two-thirds of our army is at any one moment on foreign service. I pass now to the year beginning the 1st of April next, to which these Estimates apply, when, in consequence of the return of one of the Indian regiments, our battalions in this country will amount to 41, the number in India and the colonies being 100. The perfection of our system of relief, according to the view taken by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and others competent to pronounce an opinion, should be made to consist in our being able to allow a regiment to pass five years in England for every ten it might have spent on foreign service. The Committee will therefore see that if we have only 41 battalions at home and 100 abroad the required proportion cannot be maintained; a battalion will not be able to spend five out of every fifteen years in England, where the bulk of the troops might be recruited, and they might be more restored to the character of English troops, forming part of an English army. Now, if this circumstance be borne in mind, and if it be recollected that by reducing the battalions by 100 men we come to the lowest possible point at which the efficiency of our military force can be maintained; if, moreover, we look to the number of battalions on foreign and colonial service—which I assume cannot be diminished, because, unless our system of Imperial management be altogether altered, we cannot reduce the number of our troops in India and the colonies—starting them from that number as a fixed datum, it is,

Sir George Lewis

I think, quite clear that we cannot reduce the number of battalions in the United Kingdom below 41, or reduce the strength of the battalions more than is now proposed. Neither can we diminish the number of battalions in India, because they have already been reduced to a point as low as possible by the Indian Government; while, if the demand made upon us by the colonies be taken into account, the Committee must, I think, concur with me in the conclusion that it would be impossible for the Government—entirely placing out of view all question of the defence of our own coasts, which is, of course, a material question on this occasion—to propose a less number of battalions or of men than we propose in the present Estimates. Indeed, I feel the most entire confidence that the more the Committee investigate the subject the more completely will they admit the necessity which exists for the amount of military force which I ask them to sanction.

There are some figures to which I would wish to call attention as throwing some light on this question of the distribution of the army—namely, the proportions as to population and area which exist between the foreign possessions of the British Crown and the United Kingdom. The area of the United Kingdom in statute square miles is, I find, 112,000, while that of the British possessions abroad is 7,383,000; the population of the United Kingdom at the last Census is 28,947,000, while that of the British possessions abroad is 183,191,000. Under these circumstances the Committee will deem it no matter of wonder that so vast an empire—an empire vaster than was, I believe, ever governed effectively under a single sceptre—should require the large military force which I have described. They will, therefore, have no difficulty in agreeing to the Vote which I am about to place in the hands of the Chairman.

But there is another Vote on which there is an increase. I allude to Vote 10—that for the Volunteers—on which this year there is an increase of £198,000. The House will observe, that although there is this increase proposed for the Volunteers there is yet a considerable diminution in the total amount of the Estimate. The Committee may, perhaps, remember that a Royal Commission was issued last year to inquire into the petitions put forward from various parts of the country for some subsidy to Volunteer corps, in order to prevent that which many persons feared as probable—the dissolution of a large number of those corps if they should not receive some public assistance. The Commission made a careful inquiry, and ended by suggesting that a certain sum should be allowed for each regiment, to be calculated according to the number of its effective members, and appropriated to the objects specified in their Report. I will not trouble the Committee by describing what these objects are, but they are all the principal purposes to which the expenditure of Volunteer corps is applied. After taking that Report into their consideration, the Government concluded that on the whole it would be desirable to give effect to its recommendations. Accordingly, I have inserted in these Estimates a sum which will be sufficient to carry these recommendations into effect; and I shall be prepared, when the Vote comes on, to state to the Committee the precise conditions on which we propose that the grant should be given, and in what manner it can be safely expended. I cannot but think that the Government are taking a course in accordance with the general feeling of the country in proposing this additional sum for the Volunteers. The total number of the enrolled members of this force on the 1st of August last was 157,818, and the number of effectives was 131,420.

There is an increase this year of £35,000 to the Militia Vote, which is principally owing to an additional charge for clothing.

I have now gone through all the Votes upon which an augmented charge is proposed. Upon the rest there is either no material variation or else some diminution.

Sir, having submitted these explanations to the Committee, I will not detain them now by further details. I shall be prepared to give more detailed information as the several Votes are proceeded with. Before I sit down I would only make this remark, that the whole of our military system seems to me to have the same character as is most prominent in the Volunteer force—namely, it is designed for defence. I cannot at all agree with those who think that our army, large as it is, acts as any provocative to aggression, or that any Government likely to accede to power in this country will pursue an aggressive policy. Our military system appears to me to be exclusively framed for purposes of defence. It may be that precaution can be carried too far. It may be that vain alarms may be occasionally entertained, and that different Governments may from time to time incur unnecessary expense for maintaining that system. But, taking our military expenditure from beginning to end—whether we look to our fortifications, whether we look to our Volunteers and Militia or to our regular army—the whole is intended for our defence against apprehended danger from foreign countries, and not to be the means of aggression upon others. Sir, I will now place in your hands the first Vote, that providing for the number of men.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

GENERAL PEEL: I am extremely happy that the right hon. Gentleman has supplied what must have appeared to everybody a most extraordinary omission in the Estimates as laid on the table—namely, the omission of the Vote for the number of men, which always stands first: so that it would appear as though Parliament was not to be called upon by any specific Vote to sanction the number of men to be raised, although it will be recollected that the Mutiny Bill is founded upon the number of men, which is inserted in the Preamble of the Bill. I do not mean to say that there was the slightest attempt at concealment as to the number of men provided for in the Estimates; an abstract of the numbers is shown at page 4, and the most ample details of the regimental establishments are given, with one important exception, to which I shall refer presently. Perhaps this omission of the number of men may have struck me more than others, because it obliges me to reverse the operation of that very simple rule which I laid down for the benefit of hon. Members who have not been in the habit of framing Estimates—namely, that by adding a couple of 00 to the number of the men, you get at the amount of your army expenditure. So also, by deducting two figures from the expenditure, you will get at the number of the men. The result of the latter process in the present case will give you 150,600 as the number of the men. When I look at the total force stated in the Estimates, I find the number given is 148,242. But that is not correct. At page 12 is an item of repayments to the Indian Government for the pay and clothing of two regiments of infantry employed in China. These regiments are not included in the total force stated at page 4 to be paid for out of grants made by Parliament. If you reckon the strength of these two regiments at the same standard as the European regiments in China, and add them to the force voted by Parliament, you will find the number of men 150,600, which, taken at an average of £100 per head, to cover all your military expenditure, is about the most correct estimate of the cost of the army that can possibly be framed. I am happy to see that these Estimates include the expense of the disembodied Militia, which was not included last year. The very improved manner in which the Estimates are this year laid before us will enable me to show how little power the House really have when they have once voted the number of men. Under the present arrangement the Estimates are divided into six parts. The first includes all those Votes which depend entirely on the number of men, and may be said to constitute the actual price per man for the regular army. If you take that Vote and divide it among the number of men, you will find the absolute cost per head is £57. The next part is for the auxiliary force. Over that you have no control whatever, with the exception of the addition proposed, as I think judiciously, to be made to the Volunteers. The number of the Militia is fixed by Parliament. You anticipate that only three-fifths of them will be present, and you have provided for them on the minimum scale of twenty-one days' pay instead of a month's. If to these two parts you add the charge for the non-effectives, over which you have no control whatever, these three parts together amount to 79 per cent of the whole Estimates, or, as nearly as possible, four-fifths of the entire expenditure is comprised in these Votes. All that the House have left on which to make such reductions as they may deem right is the remaining one-fifth. As regards this, the right hon. Gentleman has shown that of the manufacturing departments and the War Office stores a great portion is for the navy, and over it he has no control. Depend upon it, until you have a more complete control, you will never come within the estimate of £100 per man to cover your whole army expenditure. If the state of Europe were different, and you could reduce your force to 100,000, making a similar reduction in the three Votes to which I have referred, that would not alter the proportionate cost, but rather increase it, because the non-effective establishment would press upon you in a heavier ratio. Instead of 14 per cent of the whole, it would become 28 per cent. As long as you have between 120,000 and 150,000 men the average charge of £100 per head will cover all your military expenditure. I have said that there is one exception to the force included in the Appendix in the regimental establishment, but that is a most important one. It relates to the native troops employed in China. The Recapitulation at the bottom of page 4 is not correct, because that is not the total force. There are in addition to that the Native troops employed in China. I admit that it is a very great improvement that they should be mentioned at all, because year after year I have moved that some notice should be taken in the Estimates of the troops employed in China. Nothing can be more irregular than the practice with regard to those troops; since they went out in 1858, when I was in office, they have not been provided for by Parliament. I defy any one to show any account by which either the numbers or a detailed account of the expense can be ascertained, and, what is still more extraordinary, the manner in which they have been paid. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: By the Indian Council.] We were told before that they were paid out of the military chest in China. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: Last year.] Last year we are told they were paid out of the military chest in China. The accounts were sent to China to be checked, and there they remain I suppose, for they have never come back again. I think it is quite worthy the attention of the members of the Committee on Military Accounts to see what number has been employed. Although the number has varied from 3,000 to 12,000, no account has been laid before Parliament. Year after year I have moved, that if these men are employed, they should be included in the Estimates. I was always told that they would be removed before the commencement of the next financial year; but they are there now, and not only are they still there, but the regiments have been relieved by others, and thus they have become a new and permanent part of the British army. I say, that if any Government can employ the Native army of India, which consists of 150,000 men, without any vote and without any account, except a gross sum, there is an end to any control whatever over military expenditure by Parliament. These troops, too, are the most expensive which can by possibility be employed, because not only do they receive Indian pay and allowances, but their employment renders it necessary to give Indian pay and allowances to all the troops employed in the same service. This accounts for the discrepancy between the payments to officers of the army and the payments to officers in the navy. When the contrast was made the other night, I was quite astonished at the amazing advantages enjoyed by the service to which I belong. But if you refer to page 115, you will see that the Major General commanding in China receives just four times the amount of a Major General employed elsewhere, because he is receiving Indian pay and allowances; and that his aide-de-camp, who may be an ensign or lieutenant, is actually receiving more pay than a Major General commanding elsewhere. A Major General in command in China receives £2,535, and his aide-de-camp £697; while a Major General in command at Ceylon only receives £691, and his aide-de-camp £173. This is the effect of employing these Native troops in China. I do not mean to say that troops serving in China are not entitled to some extra allowance; but when the Native troops went there, I was the person who granted Indian pay and allowances, as I felt it was perfectly impossible to pay the European troops less than the troops were receiving with whom they served. What I want to do is to prevent any one having the power to employ a force without its being voted by Parliament, and without its being provided for by the Estimates. It is my intention to move that the number of men proposed by the right hon. Gentleman shall be increased by these regiments now serving in China; and should the Committee disagree with me in that proposal, I shall move to diminish the Vote by the extent of their pay. Another important question connected with the employment of these troops is whether any Mutiny Act applies to them. Certainly the same Mutiny Act as that under which the troops employed with them are serving does not apply to them. When in India they would be under the Indian Mutiny Act; but that is a local Act, and I do not know that it extends to China. It was stated that the reduction of the establishment here was sufficient to meet the increase of pay in China. That of itself is a grave irregularity; but I incline to think it is a delusion. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) moved for an account of the expenses of the troops in China; and when it was laid on the table, it appeared that no account had been received of the India force. I do not understand how the right hon. Gentleman can have paid an account which he has not received; but if he has paid money into the military chest, it may account for the fact to which the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) called attention, that with less men more money was required. Last year the pay for officers on furlough only amounted, or was estimated to amount, to £45,000. This year, it amounts to £130,000. If, then, the expenditure was under-estimated last year, it is impossible money enough could have been saved out of the less number of men at home to pay for the troops in China. I should like to know what the capitation Vote does actually cover—because it is perfectly impossible to ascertain that accurately from these Estimates. They give merely the expense of the pay for the Horse Artillery and Artillery in the Indian depôts; but for the Line and Cavalry in the same depôts, besides the pay, there appear extra charges for beer money and additional pay. The capitation Vote ought to cover all the expenditure which has been thrown upon the Estimates by the change of system. With reference to the reduction of men proposed in the depôts, I deny that 100 men are enough in a depôt. How is the reduction of 100 men per regiment to be carried into effect—by reducing the men or by stopping the recruiting? [Sir George Lewis: By stopping the recruiting.] Then I beg to tell the right hon. Baronet, that this reduction coming into operation with respect to ten years' service men, unless you induce them to re-enlist you may at any moment find your regiments become mere skeletons. Rather than stop recruiting it would be better to discharge those men who were not likely to renew their engagements. I conclude by moving that the Vote for the Number of Men be increased from 148,242 by the addition of the strength of the regiments serving in China, namely by 2,152.

THE CHAIRMAN: As I understand, the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman is founded on the fact alleged that a sum of money is asked for wages and provisions greater than is necessary for the amount of men proposed in the Vote. If that be so, the proper course is to move a decrease of the money Vote. With regard to the employment of two Indian regiments, it is not my province to interfere; but a Motion to increase the number of men proposed by a Minister of the Crown would be a departure from the elementary rules of a Committee of Supply, which it would be inconsistent with my duty to permit.

GENERAL PEEL: I certainly understood that if I could make out that these men were provided for in the Votes, there could be no objection in point of form to a Motion which would have the effect of causing them to appear upon the Estimates.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the right hon. Gentlemen had proposed merely the rectification of an error, there might have been no objection; but a Motion to increase the number of men proposed by the Minister could not possibly appear in the Journals of the House without a manifest departure from the ordinary rules of a Committee of Supply.

GENERAL PEEL submitted that what he proposed was in effect the rectification of an error; but he would, of course, bow to the decision of the Chairman.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I will explain why I produced the Estimates in their present form. My attention had been directed to the particular point raised by the right hon. Gentleman, and I considered whether I should propose the number given in the present Estimate, or increase it by the two Indian regiments referred to, and also the force maintained at Labuan. I came to the conclusion that the proper course was that which I have adopted. In the first place, there is a difficulty, which, perhaps, the Committee will consider decisive—that we have no materials at the War Office from which we can ascertain the precise number of these Indian regiments. [Sir FREDERIC SMITH: It appears in your own paper.] Well, I am told we have no exact account of the strength of those regiments. At all events, I have followed the practice pursued for many years with respect to the force at Labuan. They are not upon the establishment. The sum asked for the force at Labuan is £4,500; and I propose that with respect to this, as well as with regard to the Indian regiments, the expense should be voted by the House. In former times the money was found by the Indian Treasury, and a settlement took place periodically with the War Office; but in the present year they are brought in upon the Estimates.

CAPTAIN JERVIS thought, unless they knew what the force of men was to be, they could not fix the precise sum to be voted.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Estimate was founded on the information furnished by the East India Government; but the exact strength of the regiments could not be stated.

CAPTAIN JERVIS thought it would be a great advantage if the House could possibly know what was the arrangement proposed by the Indian Government with reference to the capitation money.

COLONEL SYKES considered the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (General Peel) a very proper one. The real question was, whether they were to pay for 148,000 or 150,000 men. A clause in the India Act of 1858, introduced by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, prohibited the employment out of India of troops paid by the Government of India, without the consent of Parliament, but part of the Indian troops were nevertheless employed in China, and their pay had been charged to the British Exchequer, and these numbers ought to be added to the numbers in the Army Estimates. To cover the expense of the recruiting dépôts in England and other contingent charges, £10 per man for the European force employed in India was fixed; and as there were this year 72,000 men, the sum of £720,000 was paid for them from the taxes of India; but £3 per man was also charged in addition, for pensions and invaliding, so that £960,000 was paid by India to England in the present year for the European force maintained there. This capitation charge was nothing but a premium for keeping up the European troops in India at the highest possible amount, for the greater the number of European troops there were, the greater would be the receipt here. But what was the meaning of this? The maintenance of the present large European force in India was a great drain upon the youthful blood and sinew of this country, for 7,000 to 8,000 of the flower of its youth had to be sent out annually to keep the troops up at their proper quota. That policy betrayed an unworthy distrust of the Native army of India. It was unjust to India to assume that all her soldiers would be unfaithful to us. Two of our Indian armies, the Madras and Bombay, had proved faithful; and by a Return lately made to the House of Commons it appeared that in Bengal even sixty-two native regiments remained true to their allegiance during the mutiny. The Committee had been told that we could not diminish the number of our troops in China, amounting, according to the last Return, to 5,837. But if we had not committed a breach of faith, and mixed ourselves up with the internecine war, 1,000 or 2,000 men would have been a sufficient force there for our purposes. The charge under that head ought to be considerably reduced, but the forms of the House would not permit him to move an Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER congratulated the Committee that the Estimates were now presented in a more intelligible shape than formerly, and also on the absence of any reference, in the right hon. Baronet's speech in introducing the Army Estimates, to an apprehended invasion. What, then, was the reason why the right hon. Gentleman demanded so large a force? The right hon. Gentleman said that the army at home must be at least a third of its total strength, because the military authorities declared that five years at home for every ten years abroad was the smallest time that could be allowed a corps consistently with a due consideration for its health and discipline. He was not disposed to dispute that statement; but then it was quite a mistake to suppose that the Indian army cost this country nothing; for though it was quite true that the Indian Government paid for the troops actually employed in that country and in the depôts, any increase in the army in India rendered it necessary for the army at home to be proportionately increased. Supposing the augmentation of the European troops in India since the mutiny to have been 30,000 men—[Sir GEORGE LEWIS: It has been raised from 22,000 to 56,000]—but supposing them to have been increased by only 30,000, that would involve, according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, the necessity of the army at home being increased by at least 10,000, which, at the ordinary rate of £100 per man, would represent a sum of a million sterling cast annually upon the finances of this country. Some persons might, perhaps, think that should also be thrown upon the Indian Treasury; but he confessed that he (Mr. W. E. Forster) should not like to see the people of India called upon to sustain any greater burdens than those which they already bore. But the fact ought to make the House seriously consider whether or not the Indian army might not itself be reduced. Things were not quite in so deplorable a condition as they were just after the mutiny, for we had then an enormous Native army, and a large European force kept up apparently for the purpose of watching it. The Government deserved great credit for having reduced the Native army; but he thought that now the Committee ought to look more narrowly at the expenditure on the European army. He thought it suggested the question whether further reduction might not be made in the number of troops required both in India and in the colonies.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that India paid the whole of the expenses of the troops in India, and also of the depôts in England; and therefore, although he admitted that, to a certain extent, there was a drain on the resources of England to keep up the strength of the British army in India; yet, on the whole, he did not think this country suffered by keeping up that army in India. He thought that the argument of one hon. Member that the £10 grant was quite sufficient, and of another that the charge was an undue imposition on the finances of India, proved that the estimate had been founded upon a just basis. It should be remembered that two Committees had considered the charge of £10 per head for the men in the depôts, and they were of opinion that it was a fair charge.

MR. W. WILLIAMS rose to propose that the Vote be reduced by 10,000 men. If his Amendment were adopted, the standing army would still be larger by 35,000 men than it was in the time of Lord Aberdeen's Government; in addition to which the Militia would be 70,000 stronger, and there were now 160,000 Volunteers. So that in reality, even if his Amendment were carried, there would be 265,000 more men for the defence of the country this year than in the year 1852. He mentioned that year because it was the year previous to our preparation for the Crimean war. He desired in particular to call attention to the charges for the Ceylon Regiment, the Cape Mounted Rifles, and the Canadian Rifle Regiment. The Canadians were proposing to raise more militia, but not sufficient to protect the colony in case of invasion. The Government of this country ought to make an arrangement with the Government of Canada either to take care of themselves, or to maintain a force sufficient for their own protection. For these reasons he moved for a reduction of 10,000 men.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 138,242 (including 9,349, all ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, but exclusive of the numbers actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions), be maintained during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864."

COLONEL NORTH said, if the entire force was composed of one particular class, he could understand the proposed reduction; but if the hon. Gentleman really meant to divide the Committee, he ought to point out in what branch of the army—cavalry, artillery, engineers, or infantry—he meant the reduction to take place. What proportion of each force would the hon. Gentleman propose to reduce? The cavalry, for instance, were 11,800. Would the hon. Gentleman strike the 10,000 from that number? Or from which force would he take them?

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had heard many questions put when it was proposed to reduce the army, but never such a puzzling one as the gallant Colonel's. He would leave the matter entirely to the Government, and after the great ability displayed by the gallant Colonel he would recommend them to consult him.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that if the Committee agreed to the hon. Member's Amendment, and it were left to him to give practical effect to it, he should feel no little embarrassment. He had already explained how impossible it was to reduce the battalions of infantry, on account of the system of reliefs. The hon. Gentleman could hardly mean to reduce more than half the artillery force, which consisted of 19,000 men; nor could the cavalry force well be spared. The Engineers and the other branches of the service of course would have little chance of escaping extinction; and he hoped therefore that the hon. Member would give some further details as to the manner in which he meant his Amendment to be carried out.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he should be glad to see that the Government paid more attention to the recommendations of the Committee which sat last year. He should be glad to see the charge for the Canadian Rifles reduced; and if the West India regiments disappeared from the Army List altogether, he should be well pleased. He believed them to be in a very inefficient state, and were altogether an anomalous force. With regard to the forces in the East Indies, he could only hope that the amalgamation of the Queen's and the Indian armies, which he had opposed at the time to the utmost of his power, would turn out more successfully than appeared likely at present.

MR. BUXTON thought it most necessary that the House should express itself in favour of a reduction of military expenditure. He, too, was surprised to find that the Report of the Committee on Colonial Military Expenditure had been entirely ignored by the Government. He thought nothing had ever been more clearly demonstrated than the inexpediency of maintaining garrisons in distant parts of the world which would be entirely inefficient in case of war. It was also shown that it would tend to draw out the self-reliance and resources of the Colonies if they were called upon to supply the forces requisite for the maintenance of order, and that the expenditure might be reduced by more than £2,000,000 if a different system were adopted with regard to the Colonies. He was glad it had been shown that English taxpayers had an interest in the reduction of the forces in India. Before the mutiny we only had 40,000 men in India, whereas we now had 72,000. The Native army, which was formerly 300,000, was now reduced to 100,000; there was no foreign enemy to contend with in that country, and the only purpose for which English troops were required was to keep the Native army in check. 72,000 were far more than were required for that purpose. The loss of life amongst the English troops was frightful; and though not so great as it had been, there must always be a painful sacrifice of life and health connected with the maintenance of a large army in India.

SIR MORTON PETO said, it must be allowed that the Army Estimates were extremely difficult to deal with in detail. What he believed his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Williams) meant to effect by this proposition was to declare that the sum of £15,000,000 was in excess of what the Government ought to spend upon the army for the present year. He did not see anything in the state of Europe to call for such an outlay, and it seemed the less necessary when it was considered that we had about 160,000 Volunteers, beside the Militia, and other forces. With the view of expressing this feeling, he should divide with his hon. Friend if the question were carried to a division; but he would rather recommend him to move a reduction in the amount of the Estimates than in the number of men.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, the Government had already been congratulated on having proposed a considerable reduction in the Army Estimates. What hon. Members below the gangway now seemed to regret was that they had not reduced the efficiency as well as the expenditure. A proposal more illogical and inconsistent than a wholesale reduction by rule of thumb of 10,000 it was impossible to conceive. From the extensive depôts kept in the country there must always be a great many soldiers retained in Great Britain not available for immediate service, but yet on the muster-rolls of the army, and absorbing a considerable portion of the expense. Even although—as was proposed by some hon. Members—the force in India and the Colonies were reduced, it would not be practicable, consistently with efficiency, to reduce their home force below its present point. As he saw the learned Judge Advocate (Mr. Headlam) in his place, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inform the House with respect to the Question that had been asked by the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) as to the operation in the Mutiny Act, and whether the troops in China came under its provisions. In regard to the reduction in local stores, he stated that it had been the object of successive Governments to have a large amount of stores on hand—equal, he believed, to five years' consumption—in order that in the event of the country being unexpectedly engaged in war they might have a supply on hand to meet that emergency. He would regret if, in order to make a reduction in the Estimates, the Government had departed from that course. He regretted that it was not intended to give the Militia that minimum of training which the Royal Commission declared should be the very least they should receive; and could not imagine a more unfortunate kind of economy than a reduction in the period of their training.

MR. DODSON said, the Secretary for War argued that the number of men could not be reduced because there must be troops enough at home, periodically to relieve those abroad. The gallant General (General Peel) maintained, that if the number of men were once voted, all the money asked must necessarily follow. If so, there was no use in having the Army Estimates submitted to the House at all. He saw no difficulty in diminishing the number of men; for if a certain proportion was required to be maintained between the establishments at home and the establishments in India and in the colonies, it was surely easy to make such arrangements as would preserve that proportion; but the Government ought to be prepared to make reductions both at home and abroad, if the House of Commons thought that reductions were expedient.

MR. HEADLAM said, that with respect to the Native Indian troops employed in China they were not under the European or the Indian Mutiny Act, but under Articles of War entirely distinct. He was not aware that there were any of the regiments formerly composing the European force of the Indian army in China. He thought, however, that it would be very desirable now that the amalgamation of the Queen's army and the Indian army was complete that the whole should be governed under one Mutiny Act; and steps would be taken for that purpose.

GENERAL PEEL asked what Articles of War those were to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded?

MR. HEADLAM replied that he had no knowledge of them.

MR. CHILDERS said, the real question to be decided was, whether the charge for the troops engaged abroad in colonial service could not be reduced. If any reduction was to be made, it must be in the West India garrisons, in those of Ceylon and the Mauritius, and in New Zealand and the Cape, where the relations of the colonists to the natives had occasioned the maintenance of military establishments out of all proportion to the European population. The expenditure for the East and West India colonies (including Ceylon and Mauritius) was estimated at £502,000; and that for the Cape at £575,000. Some explanation was required as to why nothing had been done towards making these colonies contribute more largely to their expenditure, as recommended by the Committee on Colonial Military Expenditure. The revenue of Ceylon was £767,000 a year, its expenditure was only £700,000.

He was aware that Ceylon contributed to the extra allowances and also to the commissariat charges, but he thought the colony should pay as fixed contribution more than £24,000. The Mauritius cost us £150,000; its revenue was between £500,000 and £600,000; and he doubted whether it contributed more than 1-16th of that revenue. He thought at least a further amount of £100,000 ought to be advanced by these two colonies. Further, with regard to New Zealand and South Africa, he thought the Committee should receive some assurance that their cost should receive the attention of Government, otherwise the House should interfere. New Zealand ought not to continue to figure on the Estimates for an average charge of £360,000 a year. He trusted to hear that some means would be taken to satisfy the Committee on these points before the debate closed.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he regretted that the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) had not given notice of his Amendment. Such a course would have been but an act of courtesy that was due to the immediate parties concerned. He (Mr. Seymour), however, had no doubt but that 10,000 men might be struck off with safety if proper means were taken to effect that object. He also thought a considerable reduction might be made in our colonial military expenditure. Considering, too, that the Yeomanry force cost only £94,000 for 19,000 men, he thought that some reduction might be made in the Voluntary force, and that the Yeomanry force should be made more efficient. The War Department was proverbial for being in a state of disorganization, where, as it was commonly said, six men were employed to do the work of one. Now, why had not the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War employed his mind to improve that Department? He found that the administration of the army cost no less a sum than nearly £400,000. He thought that a due retrenchment might be made in that respect. If they had a better administration, they could then hope to see large reductions both at home and in our colonies. There were other colonies that cost money besides those mentioned by the hon. Member for Pontefract. There was China, where, notwithstanding the presence of our large fleet, we had an army of 6,000 men, which he did not consider at all necessary amongst so peaceable a population. This force cost £560,000.

No doubt, whilst the present administration of the army lasted, some of those charges were inevitable; but why should not the system of administration be changed? Whilst he thought that great reductions might be reasonably made, in addition to the million already reduced, nevertheless, he could not vote for the Amendment of the hon Member for Lambeth.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 77: Majority 58.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,709,733, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the General Staff, and Regimental Pay, Allowances, and Charges of Her Majesty's Land Forces at Home and Abroad, exclusive of India, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864 inclusive."

GENERAL PEEL moved that this sum be reduced by £38,000, "repayment to the Indian Government for pay and clothing of two regiments of Native infantry employed in China." Those two regiments were not included in the number of men just voted, and it was necessary to cut off this Vote in order that 148,242 men might be the total force to be provided for out of the army grants. The two regiments in question were not under the Mntiny Act, but were under some Articles of War, but what those Articles were did not appear. The course which he was about to take was the only way by which he could bring those Native regiments under the notice of the House. If, as had been stated, these men were paid for last year out of the establishment then voted, how was it that they were not so included this year? He had great objection to the Government employing Native troops out of India, and he should therefore move to reduce the Vote by the sum which he had named.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,671,733, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the General Staff, and Regimental Pay, Allowances, and Charges of Her Majesty's Land Forces at Home and Abroad, exclusive of India, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864 inclusive."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS found himself very much perplexed as to the mode in which he ought to deal with those Indian troops employed in China. He was told, when they were not introduced in the Estimates, that they ought to have been introduced, and that he was following an irregular course in making a transfer from one Vote to another, when providing for those regiments out of the monies voted for other services. In order to obviate that objection, he had introduced into them the Estimates this year, and had followed the precise practice which had been adopted with regard to the force maintained at Labuan. If, therefore, the sum of £38,000 for those two regiments in China ought to be omitted, so also ought £4,500 for the troops at Labuan. If it was admitted that it was desirable that the regiments should be employed in China, he did not see what other course he had to take. The reason why Native troops were employed in China was because they were less costly than European troops, and Sepoys, from their physical constitution, were better able to bear the Chinese climate. The same remark applied to the small force in Labuan. The Sepoy troops in India were subject to Articles of War passed in a perfectly regular and legitimate manner by the Indian Government, and having the authority of law in India. These Articles of War contained certain special provisions applicable to the Native troops. If he added the numbers of these regiments to the number to be voted in the first Vote, that would not subject them to the English Mutiny Act, and it would be a proceeding inconvenient in practice and never hitherto followed. Should the Committee strike out the item, the only thing to be done would be to recall these two regiments from China, and send out two battalions from this country—supposing that the force in China could not be reduced. He trusted that the Government would be able to effect a reduction of that force, but their effort had been to reduce, not the native Indian troops, but the English troops stationed there.

GENERAL PEEL said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated his wish to be the direct contrary of what he (General Peel) desired. His object was to prevent any Government from employing a Native Indian army in China at the charge of this country, without the House knowing and having control over the expenditure. He wanted the right hon. Gentleman to add these two regiments to the number to be voted, and then the House would know what the actual force was; for it was quite evident that the number 148,242 set down in the Estimates was not the total force.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was of opinion that the Committee ought not to grant money for men that they had not voted.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the course taken by the Government was unconstitutional, and he should support the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS could not admit that there was the smallest force in what the hon. Member called the constitutional objection to passing the item. If he had attempted to procure payment for these two regiments without a Vote of Parliament, something might have been said as to the unconstitutionality of that course, though he believed there were precedents for it. He had, however, taken no such course, but had put the expense in the Estimates. If the Committee chose to refuse it, it was competent for them to do so, and it was impossible for the Committee to have more ample power than they possessed over this expenditure. He could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should wish to substitute European troops for Native Indian. So far from there being the smallest desire on the part of the Government to keep up an unnecessary number of men on the coast of China, they were using every effort to diminish the force on that station; but if the present force should be necessary, and if, nevertheless, the Committee omitted this item, the Native Indian troops must then be replaced by European troops. There was something capricious in the objection to the item, for the gallant General took no notice of the item of £4,500 for the force at Labuan, which was precisely in the same position, and which was proposed in a former year by the gallant General himself. It certainly would not conduce to the public service or promote economy to negative this sum of £38,000.

MR. WHITE had much pleasure in supporting the reduction of the Vote. It very often happened that Indian troops were sent to China, and a large amount of expense incurred without notice being drawn to the circumstance; whereas attention would be at once excited if it were proposed to send English instead of Indian regiments.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY considered that the arguments of the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Lewis) were mutually destructive of each other. He had first urged the inconvenience that would result from any interference on the part of the Committee with his proposition; but he then stated that he had taken the constitutional course of including the item in the Estimates in order that the Committee might have an opportunity of objecting to it;—and that was the course they were then adopting.

MR. DODSON said, that the Amendment was one more of form than of substance. The regiments in question could not be included in the 148,000 men voted, because the exact number of men composing them was not known.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it would be impossible to include the troops referred to in the 148,000 men voted by Parliament. The Indian troops were subject to Articles of War containing stringent provisions peculiarly applicable to themselves, and had never been brought under the clauses of the English Mutiny Act.

MR. KINNAIRD said, the question put by the gallant General with regard to the health of the troops had not been answered. He believed the plan suggested would be of great benefit in a sanitary point of view.

GENERAL PEEL said, when he held the office of Secretary for War, troops had been sent from India to China without communicating with him in any way. They were not included in the numbers voted during the present Session.

MR. T. G. BARING observed, that the high authority of Sir John Lawrence was in favour of the course proposed by the Government. It would be exceedingly detrimental to the discipline of a Sikh regiment to withdraw them from subjection to the terms of the special Act of the Legislative Council, passed in 1860.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 64: Majority 6.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR MORTON PETO then moved the reduction of the Vote by £255,156, being the difference between the estimate on Vote No. 1 this year and last year. He saw no ground that could be shown for the larger sum now asked for. It was stated that the Estimates had been reduced by over one million sterling; but he maintained that practically they were not reduced at all. £1,133,800 less was taken for Stores; but inasmuch as the total reduction upon the Estimates was only £1,000,000, it followed that there could be no diminution upon any of the other items. In the year 1853 the total amount of the Army Estimates was £8,550,000. This year the amount was £15,060,000—the difference between the present Estimates and those of 1853 being £6,510,000. Was the country at peace or at war? If at peace, on what grounds were they asked for a quarter of a million more on this Vote now than they voted last year? The total military force at present for home service was 436,000 men—an amount which was not at all justified by the present condition of Europe. As regarded our own country various Members of the Government had, again and again, expressed the opinion that there was nothing in the attitude of the North, notwithstanding all the distress which prevailed, to cause apprehension.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,454,733, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the General Staff, and Regimental Pay, Allowances, and Charges of Her Majesty's Land Forces at Home and Abroad, exclusive of India, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864 inclusive."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Motion of his hon. Friend was founded on the erroneous assumption that there was an increase in the Vote of this year over that in the last. The truth was that the increase was not real, but only nominal. It was simply a question of account, and arose from the additional outlay caused by the increase of depôts of regiments in India, which would be defrayed out of the capitulation grant of the Indian Government, and therefore would be cancelled by payments from India. In fact the expenditure thus created was greater than £255,000, and it was only by a saving in other items that the apparent increase in the present Vote was reduced to that figure.

Original question again proposed.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM inquired how it was that the item for Instruction in Engineering had increased from £3,630 to £3,920, although the number of persons for whose remuneration it was to be voted was one less than last year.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was unable at that moment to explain this minute point, but he would do so on the report.

GENERAL LINDSAY suggested that the difference was owing to a misprint.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he found that this Vote included a large expenditure for the army in the Colonies, and before it was passed he thought the Government ought to give a reason why they had not acted upon the recommendation of the Committee of last year, which, if followed out, would have led to a material reduction. The state of the country was not such as to warrant them in spending a single farthing that could be saved.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the number of battalions to be employed in the different colonies was a matter of general policy, which was determined upon by the Government at large; and when it was decided, it was the duty of the Secretary for the War Department to prepare his Estimates accordingly. Therefore, it was not a question to be debated on a special Vote of the Army Estimates—it was a question of general Imperial policy. He had before him a statement of the number of battalions stationed in the colonies and of the number of men forming those battalions; and if the Committee wished it, he would state precisely the number in each colony. The subject had been very carefully considered during the recess with the assistance of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and this was the number of battalions which it appeared to be necessary to maintain in each colony. The Mediterranean stations came first. They must be considered in the light of advanced guards of England. They occupied the line of the Mediterranean and covered our communications with India. Their climate was healthy, provisions were cheaper than in England, and these battalions cost less to the Exchequer than if they were in the United Kingdom. In Gibraltar there were five battalions, in Malta six, and in the Ionian Islands four. On the west coast of Africa there were 987 men; St. Helena 718; Cape of Good Hope, four battalions, consisting of 4,687 men; the Mauritius, two battalions, 2,260 men; Hongkong, including the detachments at Shanghai and other parts of the coast, three battalions, 3,308 men. In the Island of Ceylon there was one battalion, which with the Ceylon Rangers, a local corps, made a force of 2,219 men, which, considering the extent of the island, did not seem excessive. In Australia there was one battalion of 1,048 men. That, certainly, was not an extravagant force for Australia. In New Zealand, where hostilities were going on and where we were maintaining a war establishment, there were five battalions, consisting of 5,594 men. A constant correspondence had been kept up with the Governor of New Zealand with a view to the diminution, if possible, of that number, but it had not been possible for the Government to diminish the force. In Canada there were eight battalions of the line and two of the Guards, making in all 11,825 men. The Committee remembered the circumstances which gave rise to the sending out of large reinforcements to Canada, and the disturbed condition of the United States had rendered it impossible to reduce the force in that colony. In Nova Scotia there were three battalions, 3,655 men. That garrison had been kept up for the same reason as that of Canada. In Bermuda, which was an important port off the coast of America and a great naval station, there was one battalion, 1,168 men. At Jamaica there was a regiment of the line and also some West Indian regiments, making altogether 2,019 men. At Honduras there was a detachment of 302, at the Bahamas 308, and in the other West India Islands 2,316 men. At the Falkland Islands there were 37 and in British Columbia 135 men. Altogether, forty-five battalions, and 59,314 men. These numbers had been carefully examined from time to time, but Her Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that under the present circumstances this was the lowest force which we could maintain in the colonies, and the estimate which he had submitted to the House had been framed on that footing.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked whether, if the Protectorate of the Ionian Islands was abandoned, there would be a diminution of four battalions.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that if the Protectorate of the Ionian Islands were relinquished, the four battalions kept there would be withdrawn. Whether it was possible to reduce the strength of the army by these four battalions would have to be considered when the time arrived. As to a question put with reference to the expenditure in the Engineering Department, the principal increase was in the salary of the Director, which was made in consequence of his promotion in rank. The number of men was twenty-eight, and not twenty-six, as it was misprinted.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR suggested, that the further discussion of the Estimates should be postponed until the Committee was furnished with the figures which the Secretary for War had laid before them, in a shape which would enable them to test more accurately their bearing and value.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there was included in the Estimates such a statement as the hon. Gentleman seemed to desire.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR: The number of men for each colony is not given in detail.

MR. CHILDERS drew attention to the Votes of men for the Cape of Good Hope, the West India Islands, Ceylon, and the Mauritius, contending that 4,700 men was an excessive number to keep up in the West Indies, while the charge for troops for Ceylon and the Cape of Good Hope was open to a similar objection.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS maintained, that when the importance of the Colonies in question was taken into account, the charge for troops was sufficiently moderate. A reduction of our present force at the Cape of Good Hope might expose us to the risk of another of those Kaffir wars of the cost of which the House had had painful experience.

MR. CHILDERS said, the balance of revenue over expenditure at the Mauritius averaging nearly £50,000, that Colony might fairly be asked for a larger contribution towards its military establishment than £10,000.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, while maintaining that the Mauritius was valuable to us on Imperial grounds, yet hoped that the prosperity of the colony would soon warrant the demand of a larger contribution from it.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY animadverted upon the creation of new Field Marshals, involving additional cost to the country, and insisted that it ought to undergo discussion. He would move to report progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that of the four Field Marshals promoted on the attainment of the Prince of Wales's majority only one—namely, his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief—was now in active employment, and on his appointment it was understood that he was not to claim the increased pay attached to that rank.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 80: Majority 55.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. WHITE hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to report progress, otherwise he should move that the Chairman leave the chair. He (Mr. White) was a Member of a Railway Committee which had been sitting all day. He had afterwards gone away for a short time to take a little fresh air, and he had happened to be absent while the right hon. Gentleman made his explanation. He would, however, carefully read his speech to-morrow. He begged to move that the Chairman leave the chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

LORD LOVAINE thought it rather hard that the business of the nation should be stopped because the hon. Member was absent. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman would, on reconsideration, waive his personal feelings, and consent to the continuance of the debate.

Motion negatived.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS stated, that as it was the usual custom not to prolong the Committee of Supply after midnight, he should not persevere.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported on Wednesday; Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

Ways and Means,—considered in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved,

That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the sum of £10,000,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported on Wednesday; Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

AFFIRMATIONS BILL—[BILL 11.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY rose to move the second reading of this Bill. Its object was twofold; first, to extend to the Scotch Criminal Law the principle of the Common Law Procedure Act (1854), as to Affirmations in civil cases, and of Mr. Locke's Act of 1861, which added criminal cases, but failed to embrace Scotland, which only had the benefit of the principle in civil cases under an Act of 1855. That principle was, that persons, having religious opinions, may affirm in lieu of taking oaths. The second object of his Bill was to enable any persons in England, Scotland, Ireland, or any of Her Majesty's possessions to make affirmations in all cases where there is inability to take an oath from defect or want of religious knowledge or belief. A judicial oath had been defined legally (Starkie, vol. i. p. 22), to be "a solemn invocation of the vengeance of the Deity upon the witness, if he do not declare the whole truth, as far as he knows it." It was not his intention to enter into the question of the policy of requiring oaths, though it might be said that many high authorities were of opinion that it was not the oath which educated truth, but the fear of cross-examination; and that while many conscientious persons objected to take an oath, construing literally the Scripture maxim, "Swear not at all," and justice was thereby deprived of their testimony; on the other hand, false-swearing by persons with no conscience, was a crime of daily occurrence. The legislation of England on this subject had always been elastic. As opinions had rendered change necessary, so the good sense of Parliament had supplied the want which had arisen. Thus, special law existed for Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists. Again, for Jews. And thus a new case being apparent, demanded a corresponding adjustment of the law. He wished to express that he did not introduce this Bill as a Bill for the benefit of sceptics, though he might remind the House of Sir W. Ashurst's dictum cited by Bentham—that no man was so low as to be beneath the protection of the law. But he contended that the State had a complete right to the testimony of every citizen. It was a fallacy, therefore, to argue as if the giving of testimony was merely a privilege. On the contrary, it had been contended, by a writer subscribing himself "A privileged Sceptic," that Christianity in England gave sceptics important privileges, of which many Christians would be glad to avail themselves. The sceptic, being incompetent by law, was exempted from the necessity of giving evidence; in cases where it might be injurious to himself or his friends; he was thus also exempted from serving on juries, from attendance at inquests, from being a militiaman or a special constable, and from giving bail. So well did scoundrels appreciate the advantages the state of the law gave them, that "the oath trick," as it was called, was often resorted to in courts of law. He would put a case of a dignitary falsely accused of some dire offence, the accuser being a felon from Millbank, a notorious atheist, who, being examined on the voir dire, declared his belief in an avenging Deity, and a future state of punishment. The accused might be able to adduce in exculpation, say three witnesses of high moral character, whose word would be taken on any Bourse in Europe; but if they were unable to state that they held the belief in future punishment, the accused would not have the advantage of their testimony, and might be convicted. He was prepared to cite several recent cases in which, for want of such a measure as the present, great injustice had been done. He might mention that in 1861, eighty-three petitions had been presented on this subject. He only asked that equal justice might be meted to all Her Majesty's subjects. By the Act 6 & 7 Vict., c. 22, "various tribes of barbarous and uncivilized people, destitute of the knowledge of God, and of any religious belief, in certain of Her Majesty's Colonies," were exempted from the necessity of taking an oath. And the law of India declared that—

"Any person who, by reason of immature age, or want of religious belief, or who, by reason of defect of religious belief, ought not, in the opinion of such court or person, to be admitted to give evidence on oath or solemn affirmation, shall be admitted to give evidence on a simple affirmation, declaring that he will speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

A European, destitute of religion might thus be a witness in India; but if the case were referred to a court here, his evidence would, he apprehended, be no longer admissible, thus making credibility an affair of climate! But, indeed, the law as it stood, was one gigantic anomaly. A witness was credible when he stated grounds of incredibility, and incredible as soon as he had proved his credibility by the highest possible self-sacrifice. The law suborned witnesses, and extended to them a mendacity licence. It said to the infidel, you shall gain your cause if you will state that you are a Christian; and to the Christian, you shall not be ruined if you will declare yourself an infidel. In both cases, the lie seemed to be the law's especial delight. And yet what, he asked, was the quality which, if it were the rule in all cases, and in all relations of life, would supersede the necessity of law altogether? He apprehended that this grand desideratum was Truth. We prayed that our magistrates might have grace "to execute justice and to maintain truth," and our law compelled them to execute injustice and to maintain lies. He desired to circumscribe the area of permissive mendacity; and to inculcate the duty of telling truth. Archbishop Whately had said, that "it is not enough to believe what we maintain; we must maintain what we believe, and because we believe it." After all, all he was contending for was to put the honest sceptic at least on as fair ground as the felon, whose evidence was taken quantum valeat. His opinions might or might not affect his credibility as a witness, but they ought not to render him incompetent. He was tempted to quote the words of Bentham on this system, who asserted that—

"If the discovery of truth were the end of the rules of evidence, and sagacity consisted in the adaptation of means to ends, the sagacity displayed by the sages of the law in defining these rules was as much below the level of that displayed by an illiterate peasant, or mechanic, in the bosom of his family, as, in the line of physical science, the sagacity shown by the peasant was to that evinced by Newton."

He was happy to say that his views on this question derived support also from the writings of various living authorities. He would read a passage from the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

"It does constitute a civil inequality when certain persons are singled out to make a declaration limiting, or tending to limit, the discharge of their obligation as Members of Parliament, or as holders of any other office of trust. But let me look at this declaration as a security. If it be a security, it is one which each person may interpret for himself; and I must confess it appears to be such, that while it may possibly fetter the hands of a very scrupulous man, those persons who assume to themselves an ordinary freedom will find very little difficulty in exercising under the pressure of it nearly all the liberty which they would exercise even if there were no such restraint. Now, it is not good policy to depend upon declarations the whole force of which depends upon private interpretation."

Again—

"There is no use in imposing in any shape civil disabilities on account of religious opinions." [3 Hansard, clxix. 1048.]

He would also read a valuable extract from an excellent work by Sir George Lewis, on The Influence of Authority in matters of Opinion, highly confirmatory of the line of argument he had taken—

"The attempt to propagate religious truth, and to crush religious error, by the criminal law and by penal inflictions, though it has, to a certain extent, met with a very decided success, is subject to strong counteracting forces. A man who attests the sincerity of his religious faith by the sacrifice of his life, or of his native country, his worldly possessions, and his means of gaining a subsistence, is respected for his fortitude, disinterestedness, and honesty, even by those who do not share his opinions. He is not regarded as a common malefactor, whose overt acts have been dangerous and pernicious to the security and peace of society, and have drawn down upon him the deserved punishment of the law. There is a sympathy with his sufferings, and a consciousness that the State, instead of gaining his conviction by the legitimate weapons of persuasion and reason, has, being the stronger, used its strength for causing its own opinion to prevail. A man who, like Galileo, makes a feigned and insincere submission to the opinion of the supreme power, and reads his recantation under duress, is scarcely considered a free agent, and his conversion confers but little credit upon the coercing party. Hence the use of force to diffuse religious opinions, by admitting the failure of reason in the individual case, has seemed to raise a presumption that reason was on the weaker side. True opinions in religion can, in the long run, only be propagated by reason, and that voluntary deference to authority which implies reason; but false opinions in religion can be as well propagated by force as true ones. The sword, the stake, and the gibbet are as good arguments in behalf of Mahometanism as of Christianity. In this way, the use of the civil power to repress religious error has been accounted almost as an admission that the other side were in the right; martyrdom has been regarded as a sign of truth as well as of sincerity; and the infant Church has been said to have been watered by the blood of its martyrs." [Sir GEORGE LEWIS on The Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, p. 204.]

Lastly he should read the House a passage for which he should offer no apology, as it was from that great thinker and leader of opinion Mr. J. Stuart Mill—

"It will be said, that we do not now put to death the introducers of new opinions; we are not like our fathers who slew the prophets; we even build sepulchres to them. It is true, we no longer put heretics to death; and the amount of penal infliction which modern feeling would probably tolerate, even against the most obnoxious opinions, is not sufficient to extirpate them. But let us not flatter ourselves that we are yet free from the stain even of legal persecution. Penalties for opinion, or at least, for its expression, still exist by law; and their enforcement is not, even in these times, so unexampled as to make it at all incredible that they may some day be revived in full force. In the year 1857, at the Summer Assizes of the county of Cornwall, an unfortunate man, said to be of unexceptionable conduct in all relations of life, was sentenced to twenty-one months imprisonment, for uttering, and writing on a gate, some offensive words concerning Christianity. Within a month of the same time, at the Old Bailey, two persons, on two separate occasions, were rejected as jurymen, and one of them grossly insulted by the judge and by one of the counsel, because they honestly declared that they had no theological belief; and a third, a foreigner, for the same reason, was denied justice against a thief. This refusal of redress took place in virtue of the legal doctrine, that no person can be allowed to give evidence in a court of justice, who does not profess belief in a God, (any god is sufficient), and in a future state; which is equivalent to declaring such persons to be outlaws, excluded from the protection of the tribunals; who may not only be robbed or assaulted with impunity, if no one but themselves, or persons of similar opinions be present, but any one else may be robbed or assaulted with impunity, if the proof of the fact depends on their evidence. The assumption on which this is grounded, is that the oath is worthless of a person who does not believe in a future state; a proposition which betokens much ignorance of history in those who assent to it (since it is historically true that a large proportion of infidels in all ages have been persons of distinguished integrity and honour); and would be maintained by no one who had the smallest conception how many of the persons in greatest repute with the world, both for virtues and for attainments, are well known, at least to their intimates, to be unbelievers. The rule, besides, is suicidal, and cuts away its own foundation. Under pretence that atheists must be liars, it admits the testimony of all atheists who are willing to lie, and rejects only those who brave the obloquy of publicly confessing a detested creed rather than affirm a falsehood. A rule thus self-convicted of absurdity, so far as regards its professed purpose, can be kept in force only as a badge of hatred, a relic of persecution; a persecution, too, having the peculiarity that the qualification for undergoing it is the being clearly proved not to deserve it. The rule, and the theory it implies, are hardly less insulting to believers than to infidels. For if he who does not believe in a future state necessarily lies, it follows that they who do believe are only prevented from lying, if prevented they are, by the fear of hell. We will not do the authors and abettors of the rule the injury of supposing that the conception which they have formed of Christian virtue is drawn from their own consciousness." [J. S. MILL, On Liberty, p. 54.]

He would occupy the attention of the House no further. He had stated cases exhibiting and illustrating an undoubted evil; he had those precedents in actual operation in the case of the law of India, as settled by eminent jurists, according to which law Europeans, being infidels, are received as credible witnesses. He had pointed out the inconveniences which might, and probably would result, if some measure like this were not adopted; and knowing the readiness of Parliament to adapt its laws to the exigencies which arise from time to time, he left the fate of the Bill with full confidence in the hands of the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should take upon himself to do that which the hon. and learned Member for Woxford had given notice of doing, namely, to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He was not prepared to contend that the law upon this matter ought to be different in different parts of the Queen's dominions; and if the object of the Bill had been to assimilate it, he should not have risen to oppose the measure. But he could not shut his eyes to the fact that the pith and substance of the Bill were to be found in the second clause, and he was unwilling to do away with the security which was at present provided, by oath or solemn declaration, for arriving at the truth. The history of the law upon the subject of oaths and their administration would show that the second clause would go much beyond the relaxation and modification of the law which had been sanctioned by precedent. Connected with all the changes which had been made there was one important condition, which was entirely dissociated from the principle involved in the second clause, and that was the condition of religious belief in a Supreme Being, and in a future state of rewards and punishments. Perhaps he might be allowed to state shortly the history of the changes in the law. At common law no evidence was admissible which was not given under the sanction of an oath, though with regard to the form in which the sanction was given the law was justly tolerant, requiring only that the oath should be administered in the form in which it would be binding on the conscience of the person who took it. For instance, while a Christian took the oath on the New Testament, the Jew was permitted to take it on the Old, the Mahomedan on the Koran, the Hindoo by touching the foot of a Brahmin, and the Chinaman by breaking a saucer. It was not till the reign of William III. that the affirmation of the Quaker, even in civil cases, was made equivalent to the oath taken by other persons, and it was not until the 3 & 4 Will. IV. that the affirmation of Quakers and Moravians was made admissible in all cases. By the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 77, persons who had been Quakers or Moravians, but had ceased to be so, and yet still retained their religious scruples with regard to the taking of oaths, were allowed to make an affirmation just as if they still remained in the sect. By the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, which was still further extended in 1861, it was made lawful for the judge, upon being satisfied of the sincerity of an objection to an oath, to allow the witness objecting to make an affirmation instead, provided he first solemnly declared that the taking of an oath was, according to his religious belief, unlawful. Such was the state of the law at the present moment; and in all the changes that had been made religious belief was retained as an essential condition. Hitherto, therefore, though the form might have been changed, the substance was retained; but if the House were to adopt the second clause, they would introduce an entirely new principle. By the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, and the Act which followed it in 1861, the affirmation was substituted for the oath only in legal proceedings, civil and criminal, but the first clause of the present Bill would extend the privilege to any case in which persons might be called upon to take an oath. It was intended, therefore, to take effect in the case of jurymen, who at present would not be allowed to use the form embodied in the first clause. He had not heard of any general complaint from jurymen upon the subject, but at all events the matter as concerned jurymen was a small one. But the Bill would go much further. A gentleman called upon to take the oaths at the table of the House, those required to be sworn by Customs or Revenue regulations, or upon appraising property, would be all included in the scope of the Bill. A source of great inconvenience would be thus introduced. Was it right, because by the Common Law Procedure Act the Judges of the land, who were men of great experience and sagacity, should be satisfied of the sincerity of the objection before allowing an affirmation to be substituted for an oath, that any person whatever having to administer an oath should be made judge in this matter? He now came to the second clause, and, inasmuch as it was a clear departure from the principle of the old law, got rid of the sanction of religious belief, and of the moral sense connected therewith, and was calculated to create much inconvenience and evil, he felt it to be his duty to object to the proposal. The second clause declared that any person who, by reason of immature age or want of or defect of religious belief, ought not, in the opinion of the Judge, to be admitted to give evidence on oath or solemn affirmation, should be admitted to give evidence on a simple affirmation. At present, when a child was offered as a witness, if the Court was satisfied that, by reason of immature age or from the want of proper parental control or instruction, the child had no sense of a future state of reward and punishment, the trial might be postponed and the child was commonly committed to the care of the prison chaplain until the next sessions, with the view that in the mean time it might be brought into a fit condition to give evidence. The second clause of the Bill did not in any way provide for that case; and yet, if the child was in the state he had described, it was not to be supposed by any reasonable man that the child could be in a condition, upon a simple affirmation, to speak the truth and nothing but the truth. If a child was intelligent enough to understand the effect of the affirmation, it would be no great stretch of imagination to suppose that in this country the child had been taught the rudiments of the Christian religion, and it was not among children that those rudiments had the least force. He therefore thought the portion of the clause providing for immature age uncalled for; but he looked upon that as the minor, and subordinate portion, the most essential part being the proposed enactment in cases of the want or defect of religious belief. He might observe that, apart from other objections, the machinery of the clause was defective; for one Judge in one court might be of opinion that a man ought not to be permitted to take an oath, while another Judge in another court might take a different view of the condition of the same man's mind. But the main point was, that they were called on to accept evidence in the absence of that assurance or guarantee of religious belief which had hitherto been looked on as indispensable in courts of justice; and the object of which was to secure, as far as practicable, that the persons making statements in those courts by which the rights and liberties of their fellow-subjects were adjudged should be true witnesses. That result was by the existing practice attained, though there might be a few instances to the contrary; and the proposed change would be productive of inconveniences far greater than any which the Bill would prevent. There was a class, and he feared a numerous class, of persons who had such a defective moral sense that they were not persuaded of the necessity of telling the truth simply as the truth, and who would not hesitate to state upon a simple and bare affirmation that which was untrue, if they fancied it their interest to do so, but who so far had a conscience that when an oath was administered they felt an obligation not to depart from the truth. This was a circumstance which those regarding the administration of justice practically, and not indulging in mere theories, should not overlook. It was often discovered that a witness attempted to evade the form of kissing the book, showing thereby that, though defective in moral sense, he felt the obligation of an oath; and reliance might be placed on the sworn testimony of such a person. It appeared to him that the measure would be productive of no benefit in the administration of justice, while many practical inconveniences were likely to arise in the working of the second clause of the Bill. He should, therefore, conclude by moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. ROEBUCK said, it was a lamentable thing, that when any reform in the law was proposed, the reform was generally opposed by practising lawyers. The measure for admitting parties to a suit to be witnesses was opposed by almost every practising lawyer, but he thanked God that the vaticinations of those learned men were not listened to, and the consequence was that parties to a suit were now examined, and great benefit was the result. That opposition to legal reform was, after all, not extraordinary; for law, in the eye of the practising lawyer, was not a science, but a craft to be studied as a means of procuring wealth and honours, but not for the purpose of improving the means of governing mankind. The practising lawyer's mind was like molten iron put into a mould, where it hardened and remained hard for ever. English law contemplated two classes of objections—one to the competence of a witness, and the other to his credibility; and he supposed the hon. Baronet meant that the evidence of that class of persons who were now included among incompetent witnesses should be received subject to observation. In reply to the argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General, that the main object was to obtain the truth, he must observe that the object was not to obtain the truth from every witness, but to give to the trying judges all the means and appliances—including the testimony of persons with no religious belief—to enable them to come to a correct decision. The course of proceeding pursued at present sometimes excluded good evidence and took the bad. A witness got into the witness-box, and, being examined on what was called the voire dire, was asked whether he believed in a God and in a future state of reward and punishment, and, on replying in the negative, he must go down. Now, that man had told the truth. Another witness of precisely the same opinions declared, on being similarly questioned, that he was a believer, and the consequence was that the truth-telling witness was shut out and the false one accepted. That was an argument he had never heard answered. He knew that in the world's opinion the state of mind called unbelief was a crime, or stain at least; but the world did not generally seem to recollect that belief and unbelief were not acts of volition.

Consequently, there might be learned, good, and honourable men with minds in that unhappy condition that they did not believe the national religion. The hon. and learned Attorney General spoke about persons of immature age. What was the practice when a little girl of seven or eight years of age came forward as a witness? The Judge, putting on a grave air, asked her whether she knew the consequences of not telling the truth, and on replying that she would then go to a bad place, she was admitted to give evidence. Now, first of all, it was known that children had no idea of death; and, in the next place, the notion of a little girl of seven or eight years of age having in her mind anything like a conception of a future state of reward and punishment was so ridiculous that no man could possibly believe it. His hon. and learned Friend said, in such cases the child was instructed by the chaplain. What was the child taught? She was taught words. They could not give a child of that age an idea of a state of future rewards and punishments. On that point various opinions had been held in all ages among different communities. He believed that it was generally known that in the Pentateuch there was no statement with respect to a future state of reward and punishment, and the oath taken by the Jews had nothing to do with the vengeance of God after death, they believing that a special vengeance would fall on the perjurer during life. Intelligent Christians did not believe in special interpositions of Providence, but were of opinion that the world was governed by general laws which might probably bring upon them evil consequences in this life on account of taking a false oath, and they also believed that a false oath would be followed by punishment hereafter. He had lately been reading a curious book in reference to the doings of Dr. Pusey. It stated that the doctor was lecturing a class of young ladies, and pointed out to his trembling listeners the dreadful consequences of withholding any part of the truth, or of telling a lie at confession, and illustrated the subject in this way. He said that he met one day in the streets of Oxford a man who said, "I have been burning in hell for one hour because I told you a lie in the confessional." The man suddenly disappeared, but Dr. Pusey called at his house, and found he had been dead an hour. That was an illustration of the idea entertained of the consequences of taking a false oath, and the hon. Baronet who proposed the present Bill did not desire to make any change in such a case, but only wanted to bring before the tribunals everything in the way of evidence, and not to shut out evidence by a general rule of law. What was the consequence to society of the existing rule? Why, if a man not believing in a future state of reward and punishment saw another receiving every possible injury, he was, though a truthful and honourable person perhaps, excluded from giving evidence; and, again, by declaring himself to be an unbeliever a man might relieve himself from the obligation and burden of being a jurymen.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he thought that the question ought to rest on the simple and honest feelings of the people of the country. He conceived that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had stated grounds for supporting the Bill which must have given pain to many persons in that House, and which were opposed to the conscientious opinions of the majority of persons out of the House. The hon. and learned Member said that by the existing law false evidence was admitted, and true evidence rejected; but it should be borne in mind that it was impossible by any precaution entirely to guard against the admission of false evidence, and that all they could do was to take the highest standard of credibility. That was what the law did, and if in some instances it failed, it had at least taken every precaution which it was in its power to adopt. There was but one standard which possessed anything approaching to a true test, and that was belief in those doctrines which regulated in the highest sense honour and truth. The hon. and learned Member had stated that children could not form ideas as to a future state of rewards and punishments. In that opinion he could not agree. The doctrines inculcating an adherence to truthfulness were of the simplest and most elementary character, such as children could understand, while they were suited also to the comprehension of the wisest persons. The hon. and learned Member spoke of adherence to the national religion being required as a test of credibility, but belief in a future state was not confined to Churchmen; it was shared in by Dissenters and Jews. He had to apologize to the House for dealing with theological topics, but they had been introduced on the other side. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of the wrong to individuals and the wrong to society which was done by the present system; but the outrage which would be committed on the feelings of the great mass of the people by such a change as was proposed would be a greater mischief than any that would be redressed. If an individual unhappily occupied a peculiar position in regard to religious belief, he must bear the consequences. He hoped the House would pause before they swept from the statute book that valuable landmark of the national religion.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he should support the second reading of the Bill. He would not dwell on the first clause, after the admission of the hon. and learned Attorney General that there were some defects in the law which that clause would remedy, an admission which he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) should have thought a sufficient reason for reading the Bill a second time. But there was no doubt that the main question to be considered was that raised by the second clause, and was whether the present state of the law promoted the ascertainment of truth in courts of justice. If it did not—and he was of that opinion—he believed there was not anything in the conscience of the English people that would require the maintenance of a law which placed a barrier in the way of arriving at the truth. Before considering the main question, however, he would say, that whilst concurring in most of the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, he could not agree in his observation respecting the Pentateuch. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) did not think that a fitting opportunity for biblical disputation or for the citation of texts, but would content himself with remarking that the best critics were of opinion that the Pentateuch, as well as other parts of the Old Testament, did contain references to a future state. With respect to the means to be adopted for ascertaining truth in legal investigations, it was in the present day admitted as a general rule, that the most effectual way of accomplishing that object was to let in any evidence that might be offered, whether somewhat more or somewhat less trustworthy, and to leave to the judge or jury who might have to decide the question of fact, the task of weighing its different degrees of credibility. In order, therefore, to justify that exception from the general rule which was now under consideration, it must be shown that the evidence which it shut out was not only

somewhat less trustworthy than that which it admitted, but that the evidence excluded was so utterly undeserving of credence as not to be fit to be weighed or compared with that which was let in. And again, in order to show this, it must be shown, first, that infidels or persons of defective religious belief were necessarily disposed to give false testimony; and secondly, that all such persons were at present excluded from being witnesses. Now, he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) denied both of these propositions. It would not be contended that persons who did not believe in a future state must therefore think robbery or murder allowable. And if this were not asserted, could anything but mere prejudice lead to the assertion that they thought it perfectly permissible to bear false witness against their neighbours? The truth was, that although those who were strongly attached to revealed religion might rationally maintain, that had there been no revelation, the leading principles of morality would not be as clearly recognised as they are; yet now, at all events, these principles had come to form so completely a part of public opinion, had been so thoroughly incorporated with the human mind, that they were admitted by all, whether believing or not believing in the source from which they might originally have proceeded. There was therefore no solid ground for the opinion that because a man was an infidel, or of defective religious belief, he would be inclined to give false evidence. But secondly, even if such could be shown to be the case, all such persons were not now excluded. The best portion of them were shut out the worst were admitted. If an infidel, not being interrogated on the voire dire, took without objection the oath which for him was a mere idle ceremony; or if, being so interrogated, he professed religious opinions which he did not entertain; he was received as a witness. If he was too conscientious to take either of these courses, he was excluded. It seemed to him (Sir Francis Goldsmid) that such a law could not tend to the satisfactory investigation of truth, and that the proposed change in it was desirable and indeed necessary. He might add that one of the most learned Judges on the bench and also a man of known piety—Vice Chancellor Page Wood—had advocated a measure similar to that before them.

MR. HENLEY said, he could not support the second reading of the Bill. If he had had any doubt as to the course he should adopt, the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield would have decided him. The hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of a practising lawyer like molten iron cast into a mould and taking a set and stereotyped form, and the description was the more vivid because the hon. Gentleman had himself undergone the process. The hon. and learned Member had certainly not forgotten one rule of his profession, which was, in a bad case to abuse the witnesses, for he had plainly hinted that the hon. and learned Attorney General was incompetent to give an opinion on the subject. The argument as to a man being received as a witness who said he believed in a future state, but in reality did not, only went to show that under any circumstances it was impossible to avoid having false witnesses at some time. If the Bill was allowed to pass, the time of courts would be wasted by the introduction of long theological arguments as to how far the peculiarity of a man's religious belief affected his credibility. He believed that the inconvenience of such a practice would be much greater than any inconvenience that could arise under the existing law, which practically worked very well. He looked upon religious convictions, and a belief in a future state of rewards and punishments, to be the great and true standard that should be used, and he should therefore vote against the Bill.

MR. LOCKE said, that there was no fear of prolix theological discussions in courts of law, because juries would readily make up their minds as to the credibility of witnesses with peculiar religious views. Indeed, the point had frequently been raised within his own experience. On his circuit a learned friend, now no more, who had been raised to the bench, invariably urged on the jury that they should make religious belief the test of credibility, and with that view contrasted the affirming Quaker with the swearing Church of England man. Hon. Gentlemen who opposed the Bill looked upon the question in an entirely wrong point of view. They seemed to think that it was a great benefit or a pleasure to a man to be summoned as a witness. As a general rule the duty of appearing as a witness was regarded as a very disagreeable one, and but for the subpoena, and the consequence that would follow non-attendance, many persons whose evidence was necessary to the right decision of a case would not appear. It was a benefit to a man to be a witness in his own case, and that privilege was only recently conferred on suitors. The question was one of utility—one of common sense—as to what the suitors of the country had a right to expect at the hands of the House. It was a question whether or not a man should be entitled to have all the evidence which he could obtain heard before the court. A man could not pick his witnesses to any particular transaction; he could not select them according to their religious belief, but must take them because of their knowledge of the matter in dispute. The same objections which were now urged against this Bill, were urged against the Bill which he had brought in, in 1861, to enable witnesses to make an affirmation in criminal cases, where, from alleged conscientious motives, they refused or were unwilling to be sworn, and thereby extending the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, which only applied to civil actions, to criminal proceedings also. That Bill, however, passed, and had been found to work most beneficially. An hon. and learned Member for an Irish Constituency had given that Bill his most decided opposition, and had used many of the arguments against it which had been heard that day. That hon. Member forgot, while using those arguments, that the law which he (Mr. Locke) was then endeavouring to pass for England was already the law in Ireland and had worked well. He was not aware that his learned Friend the Attorney General, among the different Acts which he had cited, had made any mention of the Act passed by Lord Denman for admitting the evidence of convicted felons. By that Act persons, who by the law of England were held to be infamous and therefore incapable of giving evidence, were admitted as witnesses; and he would appeal to hon. Members who were in the habit of taking part in the proceedings of criminal courts, whether they had not often seen convicted felons come straight from the gaol clad in the prison dress and enter the witness-box and give their testimony. This Bill of Lord Denman was passed on the ground of the necessity of admitting the testimony of those who had a knowledge of facts connected with the case, and this Bill was founded on the same principle, and surely it was absurd to contend that while they might receive the testimony of a man steeped in crime they might not do so in the case of the man whose character was unimpeached, merely because he had the truth and honesty to declare his want of religious belief. The Bill before them, proposed that every man should be allowed to be called as a witness subject to the penalty he would undergo if he committed perjury. The opposition to it was grounded on sentimental objections as to religious belief, in the face of the fact that even though life and death depended on the testimony of a person who had the honesty to admit he did not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments, his evidence as the law now stood was excluded. A plaintiff or defendant, prosecutor or prisoner, had a right to demand that every witness who possessed a knowledge of the facts of a case should be examined, and it was for the judge and jury to scrutinize and weigh his evidence. Before hon. Members could say that the evidence of a person who stated that he did not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments should be excluded, they ought to establish this proposition, that the evidence of those who professed a religious belief was always true, while the evidence of those who did not possess such belief was invariably false.

MR. INGHAM said, he considered that no witness should be excluded from giving evidence who was capable of speaking to facts material to the investigation of a case. There was full opportunity in each instance to test the credibility and trustworthiness of each particular witness. He should therefore support the Bill.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he for one did not regard speculative or abstract religious opinions as the true measure of a man's veracity, though it might of his intelligence. What was required was that a man should be restrained by moral convictions, which appeared to him to be altogether independent of speculative ideas on sacred matters. He believed that the proposed change in the law was much required, and he therefore hoped that the Bill would be read a second time.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS observed that the second clause of the Bill, which permitted children and persons of defective religious belief to be examined, was the same as the law now in operation in India, so that the principle had already been recognised. The Attorney General had carefully omitted to notice the fact, that the words proposed were identical with those of the law in India. As the law now stood the Attorney General might be in the enjoyment of a vast estate in India, obtained by the evidence of a man of no religious belief, under the law we had sanctioned in India. Yet that man, whose evidence had so gained to the Attorney General great possessions, by whose truth these were rightfully adjudged, would be, if in this country, unable to save his learned Friend from the consequences of a malicious criminal charge, if he were the only witness the Attorney General could bring to assist in proving his innocence; and thus, on account of the defective religious belief of a witness whose evidence had gained an estate or saved a life in one part of the Queen's dominions, in another, truth and justice might be defeated by a malicious conspiracy. The only safety in the administration of justice was to admit all witnesses and take their evidence quantum valeat. He would mention a case which would show the necessity there existed for a change in the law. In November last a case was tried, and one of the defendant's witnesses—a member of the Affirmation Society—on coming into the box declined to take an oath, but expressed his readiness to speak the truth if he were allowed to do so. The Judge inquired under what obligation he would speak the truth, and the reply was the obligation of honour. The Judge said that that was not sufficient, and the witness added, that he believed if a man did not tell the truth, he violated his conscience. He was then asked whether he believed in a future state of rewards and punishments, and upon his replying in the negative, adding that he believed the punishment would be in this life, his evidence was rejected. Surely, the defendant in that case had a right to complain that the state of the law as it now existed worked an injustice to him in that instance. The evidence of a witness named Clark, who believed in God, was rejected because he did not believe in a future state of punishment; while the testimony of another who was sworn against his conscience was received. He put it to the House whether such a state of things ought to be suffered to continue, and called upon them to affirm the second reading of the Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 96; Noes 142: Majority 46.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Bill put off for six months.

SECURITY FROM VIOLENCE BILL.

[BILL 35.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ADDERLEY, in rising to move the second reading, said, the Bill was short and simple, its object being the introduction of whipping as part of the punishment of garotters. The preamble was a transcript of the definition of a garotter drawn up by the late Lord Campbell for the Consolidation Act of 1861, and the rest of the Bill was taken from the Act which provided a similar kind of punishment for attacks upon the Queen. He hoped that the House would not, on that occasion, enter into the details of the measure. By the details he meant whether the punishment of whipping should be administered for the second offence, or only once, or whether the whipping should be public or private. He trusted they would confine themselves to the principle of the Bill, which was whether the punishment of whipping should be applicable to garotters. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) had, on a former occasion, stated several objections to the Bill. The first was that by the Consolidation Act of 1861 the whipping of adults was left on the statute book in only one instance—offences against the person of the Queen—and that, consequently, the House was now asked to retrace its steps. His answer was, that if his proposition would add to the exception referred to another case strictly homogeneous, he was not proposing to go backward, but, on the contrary, to follow suit. It might be said that the man who for the sake of notoriety made an attack upon the Queen, and the man who to get a purse struck another upon the back of the head from a dark lurking place, did not belong to the same category. He would leave all metaphysical distinctions of that nature to be settled by the Home Secretary. What he maintained was that the garotter and the man who used violence against the Queen belonged to the same category in this sense—that the motives which actuated them were so low, and their sense of distinguishing between right and wrong was so degraded, that they could only be deterred by forcible appeals to their fear of physical pain. His aim in the Bill was the stoppage of a particular crime; and if he could only show that the punishment which he proposed, and which would only be applicable to criminals of that description, would put an end to that crime, it was not retracing their steps, but progressing towards the main object in view of all punishment. Since the subject was last before the House he had received numerous letters—more, indeed, than he had been able to acknowledge—from magistrates, governors of prisons, and philosophical writers, all concurring in opinion that in many cases there was no punishment so effectual and so much to the point as corporal chastisement. The next objection was, that juries might hesitate to convict garotters if they thought it possible that the judge would prescribe whipping as part of the sentence. He thought that argument was suggested rather by a recollection of the old system of excessive and brutal flogging than by anything contained in the Bill. But the Home Secretary had entirely mistaken the feeling of the public. The opinion was almost universal that punishments had become too weak and uncertain to stop crime, and there was a general impression abroad that a greater variety of punishments must be devised to meet new and increasing forms of outrage. Indeed, the feeling of the country seemed to be, that the penalty of death ought to be inflicted upon a second conviction for garotting; and there could be no doubt, that as the law presumed that a man contemplated the probable effects of his act, a garotter might fairly be considered a murderer. The only reason for not putting him to death was that it was expedient to leave him some motive for restraining his violence to save his own and his victim's life. The next objection was the strangest of all—that some garotters might not have health or constitution, or be of a fitting age, to bear corporal punishment.

SIR GEORGE GREY explained, that what he had stated on the introduction of the Bill was, that the right hon. Gentleman had not said whether the power of directing flogging should be discretionary with or imperative on the Judges; that if imperative, it could not be inflicted in all cases; and if discretionary, it would not be inflicted at all.

MR. ADDERLEY said, whether the sentence were discretionary or imperative he could not understand how a man, who was capable of springing like a tiger from his lair upon an innocent pedestrian in the street, throttling him and rifling his pockets, should all of a sudden fall into so delicate a state of health as should prevent him from being able to bear a flogging. There might be examples of such violent invalids, such ferocious valedudinarians, but they were phenomena for which no Act was bound to provide. Another objection was, that there might be other crimes which ought to be treated in the same way as garotting. He had no doubt that there were other cases which should be subjected to the same treatment, and he trusted the Home Secretary would find them out, and legislate for them himself next Session; but meanwhile, having got one clear case before them, there was no reason in the world why they should not deal with it at once. The last objection was, that flogging, though effectual in the army and navy and in prisons as a means of enforcing order and subordination, would not be proper in cases which had to go before a jury. He contended, on the contrary, that the process of a trial under the eye of a jury would afford a check against abuse in the use of whipping which did not exist either in prisons or in barracks, where corporal punishment might be carried too far. He would next meet the objections of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. He knew that the hon. and learned Gentleman's objections arose from most benevolent feelings; that he thought all corporal punishments brutal and degrading; and the hon. and learned Gentleman had said he had himself undergone the infliction in his younger days, and did not believe he had derived any good from it. But if the hon. and learned Gentleman had suffered as the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Pilkington) had, he would see the distinction between the application of whipping to a schoolboy and to a hardened criminal. If ever he could himself become an accomplished garotter, he would confidently propose a whipping as a suitable correction of the totally different motives which must then actuate him from any which had actuated him hitherto. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

LORD LOVAINE seconded the Motion.

Mr HADFIELD said, he rose to move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He was wholly opposed to the punishment of whipping, believing that it never proved effectual yet in preventing crime, and that by degrading the offender in his own eyes it was calculated to render him reckless for the future and utterly unable to regain his position in society. The Acts passed two years ago for consolidating the criminal laws of England and Ireland had undergone most careful deliberation in both Houses of Parliament, and they had abolished whipping of persons exceeding sixteen years of age; and as to those offenders under that age, they stated that the Judge should prescribe the nature of the instrument of punishment and the number of lashes in every case. Penal servitude for life, hard labour, and solitary confinement—the punishment allowed by law to be visited on the class of crimes mentioned in this Bill—was amply sufficient to prevent, without having recourse to the cruel, barbarous, and antiquated expedient proposed by this measure. By a Return of Criminal Statistics, which had been moved for, it appeared that ninety per cent of offenders had not been convicted of new crime. It appeared that Staffordshire, which the right hon. Gentleman represented, stood, as regarded the goals of the country, the highest in the amount of flogging inflicted. The noble Lord the Member for Tamworth (Viscount Raynham) proposed a measure for flogging husbands for the purpose of promoting domestic felicity, and to compel them to discharge their conjugal duties. In Staffordshire, with a population of 747,000, there had been in three years 78 cases of flogging; in Lancashire, with three times its population, only 190 cases; in Middlesex, with a population of 2,206,000, only 52 cases; and in Yorkshire, with a population of 2,043,000, only 15 cases. Moreover, the cases of flogging had been during the same period greater in Staffordshire than in Ireland, with a population of 6,000,000. In the prison for the Hundreds of Salford there were constant cases of flogging; but in the prison at Wakefield, for the West Riding of Yorkshire, with a large manufacturing population, no such punishments were ever inflicted. While in Staffordshire the punishment of flogging was inflicted to a great extent, and in Lancashire nearly to the same extent, in Yorkshire, with a population of two millions, it was found politic to abstain from the infliction of that punishment. From these facts he came to the inevitable conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was utterly mistaken in supposing that the punishment of whipping was a prevention of crime. The want of employment was the parent of crime ; and, consequently, the best mode of putting a stop to crime was to find useful and profitable employment for the criminal. He also objected to its being left at the discretion of individual judges when and how the punishment should be inflicted. There would be no certainty or uniformity under such a provision, but passion, or prejudice, or ignorance, would prevail in different districts. An Act of Parliament had been passed because a boy from some childish motive, which nobody could understand, had infested Her Majesty's palace. A better course would have been to have given him a good horse-whipping, but not to whip him with the cat-of-nine-tails. He deprecated all such hasty and ill-considered legislation as that proposed by the Bill, at all events until the Commission at present engaged in an inquiry as to the causes of crime and its remedies had made its report. His own opinion was that when that Commission had given its fullest attention to that subject, and had fully investigated it, the result would follow—they would arrive to the conviction that the ticket-of-leave system, which had been so much condemned by certain hon. Members, was a most useful and beneficial system in the restoration of unhappy offenders to a respectable position as honest members of society.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "new," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. HIBBERT said, there was no gaol in the country where discipline was better maintained than in the gaol of Salford, or where more work was got out of the prisoners ; and there flogging was used as a punishment. As a proof of what he had stated he might mention that on three occasions, when sitting at quarter sessions, he had been asked to sentence prisoners to four years' penal servitude rather than to two years' imprisonment in the Salford gaol. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) forgot that criminals must be deterred from committing crime as well as reformed afterwards. Believing that flogging would have a deterring effect in the cases contemplated by the Bill, he would cordially support the measure. He would, however, suggest that in Committee this punishment should be confined to the earlier part of a prisoner's sentence.

COLONEL NORTH said, he could not understand why they should be so mealy-mouthed about flogging a set of ruffians. The hon. Member for Sheffield himself admitted that it would be a good remedy against some offences ; and yet he thought penal servitude enough for crimes of that particular description. Why, was he aware of a case that was tried only on the previous Thursday at the Hampshire assizes ? The prisoner, Lewis Francis, was indicted for maliciously wounding George Dean, a warder at Portsea, on the 19th of December, with intent to murder. He was found guilty and sentenced to penal servitude for twenty years. Now, what was the former history of that man as given in the newspapers ? Why, that in 1854, having been previously convicted of numerous crimes, for which he had undergone various terms of imprisonment, he was sentenced to be kept in penal servitude for four years. He was sent to Dartmoor, and in 1857 made a murderous attack, which he nearly completed, on a warder. For that he was convicted at the Exeter Lent Assizes in 1857, and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. He was then sent to Bermuda, where he made another murderous attack on a warder, for which he was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude, and was then sent from that colony to Portsmouth. There he repeated the very same offense, for the fourth time, and was on the previous Thursday sentenced for it to twenty years' penal servitude, the four sentences upon him making altogether forty-six years. What was the use of passing these sentences upon such a blackguard as that ? They had much better put up the triangles and flog him on the spot and all his fellow-prisoners who aided or abetted him in his murderous assaults. If the Governor of Portsmouth Gaol had the power of doing that, but would not use it, he was a wretched old woman for his lenity. Let any one go to Chatham, and see how the convicts were fed. These rascals had their roast meat, puddings, ale, and porter—things which no honest labourer on hon. Gentlemen's estates could get. The work they did was eight and a half hours per day, and they had half a day a week to attend the schools. Why could not they do as honest labourers in many villages did—namely, have their schooling in the evening ? He cordially supported the measure, believing that the whole country was justly indignant at the manner in which these ruffians were treated.

MR. CLAY said, that the Bill was advocated, if he understood rightly, upon the theory that it was necessitated by an exceptional state of crime. But before he voted for the second reading he should be glad to be satisfied that any such exceptional state of crime really existed, otherwise they would be liable to the imputation of legislating under an unreasonable state of panic. He really believed that the idea of an extraordinary prevalence of the crime of garotting was wholly and entirely untrue. He had had the pleasure the other day of dining with three police magistrates—and he was surprised to hear from them all, as the result of their experience, that there was no increase whatever in the crime called garotting. Indeed, one of them said that no case of garotting, pure and simple, had ever come before him. He inquired as to the truth of the very alarming and circumstantial details which had frightened everybody, including himself. The atrocious assault committed on a respected Member of that House which first excited alarm might have occurred at any other time of which he recollected. In another case it turned out that a young gentleman, who fell down and cut himself at night after dining, had thought that an attack by a garotter would be a respectable way of accounting for the accidental injuries he had received. Again the story of the heroic young lady resisting the garotter who tried to cut off her hair was entirely untrue. He had talked also with policemen on the subject, and had been informed that these street ruffians went about in list shoes, and could rob their victims even when a number of people were near, in two seconds. He had likewise been warned to look behind him as he passed a street lamp, to see whether there was not another shadow besides his own. He (Mr. Clay) thought there was an immense amount of exaggerated fear abroad with respect to this crime. But however that might be, he, for one, would never consent to the flogging of a man like a dog. It had a demoralizing and brutalizing effect not only upon the victims, but upon a great many others who were hovering on the brink of crime.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he wished to say a few words before the House went to a division. However popular in certain quarters any proposal might be at that moment having for its object to increase the severity of our criminal code, he felt it his duty to support the Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. He did not, however, agree in all the reasons which had been given for that Amendment. He did not think that the House was precluded from entertaining the question by a Commission having been appointed to inquire into the question of penal servitude. It was quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, that the other evening, on the introduction of the Bill, he had said that two years ago the criminal law of the country was revised and consolidated, the Bills for that purpose having undergone the mature consideration of a Committee composed of almost all the legal Gentlemen in the House, and of several hon. Members of great experience in the administration of the Law. He stated that the House ought to examine well the grounds on which they were asked within two years to alter a material portion of that law after it had been deliberately sanctioned on the unanimous recommendation of that Committee, and he said, not that they ought not to retrace their steps if wrong, but that they ought to be well satisfied that they were wrong before they reversed the decision to which they then came. The right hon. Gentleman said they were wrong, because there had been during the last six months of 1862 an unusual number of robberies with violence in the streets of London. His hon. Friend who had just sat down had adverted to some of these cases, and he entirely agreed with him, after having investigated them, that there had been great exaggeration in many of the cases alleged to have occurred. He could not go so far as his hon. Friend and say that there was during last year no unusual amount of a particular class of crime. There was far above the usual number of robberies with violence in the streets of London; but were those crimes so frequent still? And if not, from what cause? He believed there was a fashion in crime, and the publicity which was given to an attack on a Member of that House had actually prompted the commission of similar outrages—just as two or three persons throwing themselves from the Monument or the Duke of York's Column rendered it necessary that precautions should be taken against similar acts of suicide. What was done in consequence of those crimes? The police were increased, a certain number were employed in the streets in plain clothes; and many of that class of criminals were apprehended and brought to justice. They were tried at the Central Criminal Court, in the November sessions, many of them were convicted, and the consequence was, he believed, the number of robberies with violence did not at that time exceed the usual amount. Those who had been convicted were suffering the punishment they justly deserved, and where was the necessity for Parliament to alter the law? The vigilance of the police, and the due administration of the law, had proved sufficient to put down the crime. His hon. Friend had said, the proposed measure was panic legislation, but it was panic legislation after the panic had subsided. He believed, judging by past experience, if they left the power of inflicting corporal punishment to the discretion of the Judge, the discretion would be generally used in favour of the alternative punishment. The object of the measure proposed by the late Sir R. Peel with reference to outrages on the Sovereign was to counteract the influence of a morbid state of mind which associated an act of treason with a feeling of vanity or ambition; and, with reference to injury to works of art, whipping was no longer a punishment at the discretion of the Judge. The alleged success of these Acts was a misapprehension. In the only two cases of convictions under the former of them, the sentence had not been whipping, but seven years' transportation. The right hon. Gentleman proposed a great alteration in the existing law. Not only did he extend the power of inflicting corporal punishment to adults; but whereas it could only be inflicted once and in private, the number of lashes and instrument being specified, the right hon. Gentleman proposed, that whipping might be public as well as private, that it might be repeated three times, and he took away all discretion as to the number of lashes and the instrument with which they were to be inflicted. Did he really mean that a man might be sentenced to penal servitude for life, and be three times publicly flogged during that sentence? and yet this was what the Bill would sanction. If they were to alter the criminal law, which had been settled only two years previously, he did not see why they should say, with regard to one particular offence only, that the punishment of whipping should form a part of the sentence. Why, for instance, should they not include in the class of felonies to be so visited the crime of rape, or any other crime of violence? There ought to be something like principle in the alterations they made in the law. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel North) had referred to the case of an incorrigible ruffian who had been tried four times for murderous assaults on warders of the prison; but, under the Bill, if he did not rob as well as savagely assault those warders, he would escape the punishment of flogging. He had no doubt such a man came back from Bermuda with his back scored by punishment; but did it cure him? [Colonel NORTH: I will try and ascertain the fact.] He thought a punishment which was appropriate for insubordination in prison, where the infliction must be prompt and on the spot, might be altogether unsuitable where an offence was committed and the accused had to take his trial weeks or a month afterwards. The Bill bore marks of hasty and careless preparation, and he hoped the House would negative the second reading.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished, as his name was on the back of the Bill, to say a few words in explanation. The right hon. Gentleman had no doubt detected some blots in the measure; but there would be no difficulty in curing them in Committee. A private Member bringing forward a Bill of the kind ought to be held excused if he did not produce a perfect measure. If the Government had shown any disposition to take up the subject, he was quite sure his right hon. Friend would have been glad to leave the matter in their hands to introduce a perfect measure; but they had not only not produced any Bill, but they opposed the measure before the House on the ground that a Commission of Inquiry had been appointed, which, by the admission of the right hon. Baronet, did not touch the question. His right hon. Friend thought it desirable to take the opinion of the House on the subject; he asked them to affirm the principle, and any Amendment would gladly be assented to if it were shown to be a proper one. The right hon. Baronet had never touched the argument on which the Bill rested—which was, that it was necessary to have these punishments not only reformatory, but deterrent. It had become clear to every one that the scale of punishments in the country was insufficient to deter offenders. He quite agreed that there were ebbs and flows, and might be a fashion in crime; but the question was, how to stop it? In cases of assault on the Sovereign they altered the punishment, and it had been found sufficient to check the offence. What was asked was that the same step should be taken with the particular class of offences under consideration. It had been said they were legislating on panic, and that many of the garotting cases had been exaggerated. But what of those which had been tried by Judges and juries? In the November sessions at the Central Criminal Court twenty-seven persons had been indicted and twenty-four convicted for robbery attended by violence in the streets of London. These men, who showed the greatest hardihood in the dock, did not care a bit for penal servitude. It might be they did not care for flogging; then he did not see what harm it could do to them. The crimes of violence against which the Bill provided were committed with the greatest deliberation, and frequently with the most brutal ferocity; would flogging deter from them, or would it not? In his opinion they owed it to the protection of Her Majesty's subjects to try what the effect of that punishment would be. The feeling of the country, and he believed of a large portion of the House, was in favour of the Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 68: Majority 63.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow.

THAMES EMBANKMENT (NORTH SIDE) BILL.—[BILL 23.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COWPER moved the second reading of the London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Bill.

MR. W. WILLIAMS intimated that he should oppose it in a subsequent stage, if a Bill were not introduced to embank the south side of the Thames.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that that opportunity would not be lost of placing the finances of the metropolis on a more satisfactory basis. If the accounts were brought into a consolidated shape, he believed loans might be effected on the credit of the metropolis on much more economical terms.

MR. DOULTON observed, that he had formerly stated that there was a great discrepancy between the estimates of the engineers and the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. The estimate of the right hon. Gentleman's engineer was £460,000; that of the engineer to the Metropolitan Board, £690,000; showing a difference of £230,000. Since he made that statement the former estimate had been advanced to £500,000, and the latter reduced to £620,000, leaving a difference of £120,000. He wished also to state that he should oppose that part of the Bill which proposed to hand over to the City of London the fourpenny coal duties.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask when the evidence which was taken before the Royal Commission on the new street would be in the hands of Members?

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask whether the Bill was to be referred to a Committee of five or of fifteen Members?

MR. COWPER said, that he proposed that the Bill, being a hybrid, should be referred to a Committee of fifteen Members, one half to be named by the Committee of Selection, the other to be selected on account of their special local knowledge; and he thought that after it had passed such Committee it should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. The evidence taken before the Royal Commission, if not then already in the hands of Members, would be delivered immediately. The difference of estimates to which the hon. Member for Lambeth had referred arose from a difference of opinion, not as to the value of property to be taken or the cost of works, but as to the line of the street itself. No engineer belonging to the office of Works was employed on those works; the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works had the direction of the Bill.

MR. TITE said, that the alteration in the two estimates of the Metropolitan Board of Works was caused by giving up a portion of the scheme involving an improvement in Thames Street.

Bill read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee.

MUTINY BILL.

Bill for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better payment of the Army and their Quarters, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, and The JUDEN ADVOCATE.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 12, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Malt Duty (No. 38).Select Committee—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) Bill, and Poor Relief (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, Earl of Belmore added in place of Lord Chelmsford.

MALT DUTY BILL.

Brought from the Commons, and read 1st (The Lord President). (No. 38.)GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY (NEW METROPOLITAN STATION AND BRANCHES) BILL.

SECOND READING. DEBATE RESUMED.

Adjourned Debate, on Motion, That the Bill be now read 2^d, resumed (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY—having presented several Petitions against the Bill from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of London, the London Institution, from Clergy and Parishioners of Bishopsgate and adjoining parishes, from the occupiers of houses in Finsbury Circus or residing in the neighbourhood, and from the Committee of Management, Medical Officers, and Subscribers of the Royal London Ophthalmic Hospital, in immediate proximity to which Institution the railway proposed to pass—said, the Petitioners stated that the hospital was the largest hospital for the treatment of diseases of the eye in this country; that it attended to 15,000 cases annually; that the railway was proposed to pass in its immediate contiguity, and that this would injuriously interfere with the successful treatment of patients, especially in the operation for cataract, which required a peculiar steadiness of hand; moreover, the Bill involved the destruction of Finsbury Circus and neighbourhood, and would deprive the patients of an admirable place for exercise during their period of convalescence, in a healthy area, covered with vegetation. This petition alone would justify their Lordships in rejecting the Bill. In the absence of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) who was detained by illness, he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) should think it to be his duty—unless the Government were prepared to say that they were in possession of additional evidence, or to promise to take the whole subject of metropolitan railways into their consideration—to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The arrangement of these lines ought not to be left to the desultory efforts of various companies, but must be made the subject of some comprehensive and comprehensible system. Since the subject was last under discussion by their Lordships he had spent several hours in the district which this line was to traverse, in order that he might make himself acquainted with its circumstances and with the effect which the construction of this railway would have upon it. Finsbury Circus itself was a large healthy garden surrounded by good and comfortable houses; but the neighbourhood was of a totally different character. It was encircled by courts, alleys, and culs de sac; the courts were nests of fever, in which fever was bred by want of air, and the inhabitants of which had no chance of obtaining fresh air except out of the Circus. It was true that the garden was not open to the public; but merely as a depository of fresh air, as a breathing place, and as a means of resisting contamination, it was of great value to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. The legislation of both Houses had for many years been directed to the provision of open spaces for the recreation of the public. Deputations were constantly waiting on the Home Secretary, urging requests for public recreation grounds; and Finsbury itself had been calling out for a public park. Should they then permit an open space already in existence to be built up and covered by a railway station? If the Company wanted this line, let them erect their station upon some piece of ground which was now occupied by filthy courts. The occupants of the houses which were to be destroyed had received no notice that there was any intention to apply to Parliament for this Bill; and although they were generally only weekly tenants, they always expected that they would not be turned out of their houses, except for misconduct or non-payment of rent. In this matter their Lordships must remember that they were dealing, not merely with the convenience, but with the very lives of these people. The large proportion of them were tailors and shoemakers, who must live in the immediate neighbourhood of the persons who employed them. Many of them had to visit the premises of their employers six or seven times a day. If they had to leave the neighbourhood in which they now lived, they would have to find fresh employment, and would no doubt have to endure many sufferings and privations before they could form new connections. The various Bills which were upon their Lordships' table proposed to take no less than 1,000 houses occupied by the labouring classes; and if those measures were sanctioned, no less than 12,500 persons would within a very small space be turned out of their homes. To agree to such a Bill as this would show the greatest inconsistency on the part of their Lordships. They had passed a measure for the protection of public gardens; and they were now asked to sanction the destruction of one of the few public gardens which existed within the City of London. He held in his hand a paper which showed that this railway had paid a dividend of only $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for the last half-year, the last million of money raised by the company having been raised at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; while for money to be raised to carry out the objects in question 5 per cent was to be paid. The proprietors, he had, moreover, been informed, had held a meeting, at which the decision was arrived at that they would have nothing to do with the proposed extension. That decision, it appeared, was reversed by a subsequent meeting; but he had heard that another meeting of shareholders had since been held, at which it was determined to adhere to the first resolution. When such was the position of affairs, when the structural difficulties in the way of the scheme, the doubt as to whether it would be a public benefit, and the uncertainty whether it would be completed at all, were taken into account, he had no difficulty in asking their Lordships whether they ought not to refuse to the Bill under consideration their immediate sanction. Parliament was not, he contended, in a condition to pass it this year, whatever might be the case at some future period. Its operation would be to affect important interests, to inflict a great amount of suffering on a large mass of people, without affording any compensation for all the misery thus created. He did not, in making these observations, wish to be supposed to stand in the way of metropolitan improvements. His sole desire was to prevent a great deal of inconvenience and hardship being brought upon a large number of the population, and with that view he felt justified in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

LORD EBURY said, he rose to draw attention to the fact that there was another company—the Metropolitan, Hampstead, and Tottenham scheme—which proposed to occupy the whole north side of Euston Square with a station, and against the inconvenience to which they would thus be subjected he had been requested on the part of the inhabitants to protest. The railway to which he referred was not, like the Great Eastern, promoted by a large company, but was a speculation rather of a certain number of engineers and contractors. Having a station in the square, it was proposed that it should pass under a considerable extent of ground occupied by the houses of the poor—thus inflicting upon the inhabitants of the district all those evils which had been so graphically depicted by the noble Earl who had just spoken. Under those circumstances, he thought it would be well if the Government would consent to the postponement of the Bill for the construction of that railway, as well as of the other Bills by means of which it was proposed to effect similar objects, for a year. Now, that the metropolis seemed literally about to be taken by storm, the subject was one which demanded their serious attention. If it were necessary that we should have these railways through London, they should take care that it should be done with a minimum of evil.

THE EARL OF STRADBROKE was understood to argue that the property taken by these lines was, for the most part, of a very wretched description, and the construction of the railways had the advantage of opening the neighbourhood and introducing into it fresh air.

EARL GRANVILLE said, when the matter was last before the House, a desire was expressed that the Board of Trade should draw up a Report on the subject for the information of their Lordships. That Report was not yet complete, but would be so in about a week; and he thought it would, therefore, be desirable to postpone the Bill for a week, and not for six months. In making this suggestion he did not do so as a promoter or an opponent of the measure; but it was evident, from what they had already heard, that there were two sides to the question, and he hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would wait till they got the Report he had referred to before deciding on this and other similar Bills.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that if it were an ordinary case, it might be right to delay coming to a decision until the Report of the Board of Trade had been presented; but he had heard nothing to counterbalance the arguments of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), and he did not think they ought to accept the proposal of the Lord President. They were now entering upon a new stage of railway legislation, and they ought not to fall into the same errors which signalized the commencement of that legislation fifteen or sixteen years ago. He did not see why there should not be one consistent scheme of railway communication for the metropolis. They had arrived at a uniformity of system with regard to gas and water, and laying out streets, and he saw no reason why the same principle should not be made applicable to railways. It was impossible to succeed in effecting that object through the means of Select Committees, and almost, if not quite, as impossible to create another tribunal for the purpose. But it was perfectly possible for her Majesty's Government to deal with the question, and he earnestly entreated them to take it into their own hands, to treat of it as a whole, and, having adjourned every one of these schemes for this Session, to meet Parliament next year with some uniform and consistent scheme of legislation on the subject. For his own part, he was prepared to vote against every one of these metropolitan Bills, without regard to their special merits, for the purpose of inducing the Government to do what he conceived to be their duty.

LORD TAUNTON rose to deprecate any decision on this or any other Railway Bill until they had the means in their hands for forming a just opinion upon it. He hoped the expected Report of the Board of Trade would furnish that information. It was not necessary that they should be entirely guided by the Board of Trade; but, at all events, he thought it would be premature to decide on rejecting the Bill at the present moment.

LORD REDESDALE was perfectly prepared to vote against the second reading of the Bill, and on this principle—that railway companies were not justified, merely to save expense, in proposing to occupy the few open spaces of ground which existed in the metropolis. Hitherto all railway companies had chosen bad neighbourhoods to run their lines through, where it was rather an advantage than otherwise to pull down a few houses to let in air and light; but now, for the first time, because it was more economical to fix their stations in open spaces, they came forward with propositions to take possession of spaces like Finsbury Circus. If Parliament, by a formal decision, were to apprise these companies that they would not be permitted to occupy these vacant spaces, so important to the health of the metropolis, they would very soon find other places. Any interference with the parks and gardens of private persons had always been considered legitimate ground of private opposition to a Bill; and any interference with open spaces of this kind was a fair ground of opposition on the part of the public. It was impossible that the question could be fairly tried by a Report of the Board of Trade. It ought to be referred to some tribunal competent in an engineering sense, and in every other sense, to try the question free from any bias for this or that line. They ought to consider, not which might be the best of certain competing schemes, but they ought to take the question into their consideration as a whole, to have before them what had already been done, and then to decide what would be the best mode of linking the existing lines together. If they merely had to deal with the railways which might be before the House, their Report might stand in the way of some scheme much more desirable than any which had yet been proposed.

EARL GREY said, he was disposed to agree that the Board of Trade would not be able to afford sufficient information in their Report; but their Lordships having called for a Report from that Board, he thought it would be unfair to reject the Bill until that Report had been received. Having this opinion, he hoped that the noble Earl would consent to postpone this debate for a fortnight. Having said this, he must add that he entirely agreed with the Chairman of Committees in thinking that no Report by the Board of Trade, in reference to a particular project, would enable their Lordships to legislate in a satisfactory manner on a subject so extremely difficult as that of providing railway communication for the metropolis. He was of opinion that railway communication through the metropolis, if judiciously made, would be extremely useful in relieving the traffic of the crowded streets; but he was persuaded that Parliament should not sanction any one individual plan dealing with a portion of the great subject without having an opportunity of considering what its bearing would be upon the whole scheme when it should have been fully considered. He thought that there should be a Commission appointed, which should be armed with the necessary powers of summoning witnesses; and that that Commission should avoid the mistake into which the Board of Trade formerly fell, of examining interested persons separately and in private. It was this false step which had deprived the Reports of the Board of Trade of all authority with Parliament.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that his impression of what took place about a fortnight ago, when his noble Friend who was now unfortunately absent from illness (the Earl of Derby) agreed to adjourn his Motion for the rejection of this Bill, was that the Government would either produce additional evidence in favour of the Bill, or would undertake to lay down a general scheme for metropolitan railway communication. It was one of those alternatives which they were bound to adhere to that evening, and they had conformed to neither. But at the same time, as the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had promised, or nearly promised, that within a short time a Report by the Board of Trade should be produced, which would embrace all the metropolitan railways at present laid down upon the map, he himself thought that it would be something like a breach of faith, upon the part of those on that side of the House who opposed the Bill, if they did not consent to the proposition of the Government, and again adjourn this debate until the Government, if they could do so in a reasonable time, should present the Report. He thought that that was the understanding of the noble Earl who was absent, who he believed would, if he had been present, have consented to an adjournment of the debate. He entirely concurred in thinking that it was utterly hopeless to expect any information in the Report useful for immediate progress; for if it were confined to the schemes which were now intended, he should consider it as entirely valueless in reference to the general subject. Nothing would be efficient for protecting the public interest and saving the metropolis from disfigurement, inconvenience, and partial destruction, except a well-considered scheme embracing the whole question; and he agreed in recommending a Commission for this purpose. The House had had ample warning in what took place in reference to our general railway system. Their Lordships would recollect what Lord Dalhousie recommended, and that his recommendation was unfortunately abandoned. This was the first country in which railways were laid down. We possessed the best engineers, and we were capable of raising the largest sums of money; and yet there was no country in which the railways were so ill-arranged, so ill-connected, so dear, and so enormously inconvenient to passengers; and with this fact before them it behoved them to be careful that they did not again produce the same network of confusion and the same squandering and waste of capital. If they once made a mistake in this direction, there was no remedying it. Surely a year was not much in the life of an empire; and he could not help hoping that their Lordships would reject all these individual schemes, be they bad or good, until there was laid down, with all the authority of Government, a general scheme which should be satisfactory.

EARL GRANVILLE believed that he was acting in accordance with the general feeling of the House in moving the adjournment of the debate until that day fortnight; not for the purpose of fettering their Lordships, but to prevent them from coming to a rash decision before they had received the information for which they had asked. The Government desired that their Lordships should have the Report of the Board of Trade before them before they came to a decision; but the noble Earl was mistaken in saying that he had undertaken to furnish additional evidence in favour of this particular scheme. He knew nothing of this particular railway scheme, and had simply interfered to prevent the rejection of the Bill upon hearing one side only. What he agreed to do was to make inquiries and obtain information as to metropolitan lines in general. He must observe, that he could not imagine what kind of scheme the promoters would have to present to Parliament if they took all the advice that had been tendered to them in the course of this debate. Some noble Lords opposed the taking of open spaces for railway purposes, while others grounded their opposition on the proposal to take houses. He was of opinion that the Report of the Board of Trade would be valuable, and that their Lordships ought to wait for it; and he believed that a well-considered Report of a Committee of their Lordships, drawn up after all the available information on the subject had been laid before them, would have great influence on both Houses of Parliament. Certainly it would have very considerable weight on their Lordships' House. Under these circumstances, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate till this day fortnight.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY wished to explain. He never said that the Government had undertaken to give them evidence to make out the case for a private Bill; what he intended to convey was, that Lord Derby stated, that if he received no evidence, and if the Government laid down no plan, he should feel himself justified in opposing the second reading of this Bill. The Government had not done this, but had promised a Report, and he thought that the House should wait until they had seen that Report.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he could not conceive that any Report, however powerful, however ingenious, and however eloquent, could reconcile him to the seizure by railway companies of spots now reserved for the purposes of health. He would not press his Amendment now; but he should reserve to himself the right to move the rejection of the Bill when it again came under discussion. He would oppose every Bill that proposed to take open spaces of the character to which he had just referred, or which, without due notice—for that was the point—proposed a devastation of the dwellings of the working classes.

Debate further adjourned to Thursday, the 26th instant.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

RECEPTION OF THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.—QUESTION.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the manner in which the streets were kept in the City on Saturday last; and, if so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any alteration in the Police Force, so as to place the whole Force of the Metropolis under the management of Sir Richard Mayne?

SIR GEORGE GREY:—I am sorry that my hon. and gallant Friend had not given notice of the Question he has asked. My attention has only been called by the public statements I have seen in the newspapers with regard to the crowded state of the streets when the Princess Alexandra passed through the City, and the absence of any efficient regulations for keeping the streets clear on that occasion. Those statements I have heard confirmed by gentlemen who were present, but the subject has not received any consideration from Her Majesty's Government as yet.

EMIGRATION OF PAUPERS. QUESTION.

MR. STANLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, and the House, were aware that large sums of money and a free passage had been offered by Queensland and the Australian Colonies generally with a view to promote the emigration of the Cotton Operatives. He was told application had been made for a portion of the Mansion House Fund for the purpose of assisting such emigration, but for certain reasons the request was refused. He therefore wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, If Boards of Guardians or Parish Vestries have not the power to raise money for the purposes of assisting the Emigration of Paupers and their Families to British Colonies; and, if so, under what restrictions and regulations?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS, in reply, said, he knew nothing of the statement made by his hon. Friend with regard to the application of the funds under the control of the Lord Mayor. With regard to his question as to the powers possessed by parishes and guardians for aiding the emigration of the poor, he could inform him that this power was possessed by both those authorities. They derived their power, however, from different Acts of Parliament. The parishes, by means of their vestry, were entitled under the 4 & 5 Will. IV., commonly called the New Poor Law, to raise money for emigration either by special rate or by loan, but they were limited as to the amount raised, and also as to the time of repayment. They could only raise one half the average amount expended yearly on an average of three years, and were obliged to repay the money in five years, and they could only apply the money under the authority of the Poor Law Commission. With respect to the Guardians of Unions, they had power to defray the cost of the emigration of those paupers who were termed irremovable, and were only limited as to the amount. What they raised might be charged on the common fund, but they could not pay more than £10 for each person without the sanction of the particular Guardian belonging to the parish where the pauper is settled. In no case could they proceed to the application of the money without the control of the Poor Law Board, and without being subject to the orders and regulations which had been issued by the Commissioners. Those orders and rules might be found in the Annual Report which was made to the House by the Poor Law Board. They had been carefully drawn with a view to the safety and protection from wrong of the pauper.

INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the details for the amalgamation of the Medical Service of the late East India Company with that of the Royal Army is likely to be promulgated?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that the amalgamation in question was a very complicated and difficult matter, and must be attended with considerable expense. He was sorry to say there had been very considerable, though he believed unavoidable, delay in carrying out this matter. A plan for the amalgamation was sent out to India some time ago for the consideration of the Government of India. That Government, having given the plan its consideration, suggested one totally different for the consideration of the Home Government. That plan had been submitted to the military and medical authorities of India and England, and on the whole they preferred it to the one originally sent out. It had been sent for the approval of the War Office, and he hoped no very long time would elapse before it was carried out.

MAIL CONTRACT FOR THE CAPE.

QUESTION.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay upon the table of the House a list of the names of the parties who tendered for the Mail Contract for the Cape of Good Hope, with the amount of such Tender, and the name of the successful party; and whether the contract will be deposited upon the table of the House for one month previous to its confirmation, as suggested by the Committee on Mail Contracts?

MR. PEEL said, there was no objection to produce the tenders, but he could not do so at present. The contract had been accepted, subject to the approval of the House, but had not been finally concluded. It should be laid upon the table during the time required to insure confirmation.

POLL TAX AT SMYRNA.

QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government have received any memorials or remonstrances from British Subjects residing at Smyrna of the attempted imposition, by the British Consul, of a poll tax of five shillings per head upon every adult Englishwoman and Englishman residing at Smyrna; and if he will lay before the House a copy of the Report of Sir Edmund Hornby on the complaints made against Mr. Consul Blunt at Smyrna?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had received a memorial or remonstrance from British residents at Smyrna, on the subject of what they were pleased to call the attempted imposition of a poll tax. The memorial and the answer of Her Majesty's Government would both be laid upon the table; but he begged to say, that this so-called poll tax was simply a registration fee levied upon British subjects on registering themselves, by virtue of an Order in Council, not alone in Smyrna, but throughout the East. A similar fee was levied by the representatives of all other Powers in the East. It was levied by the British authorities to meet the large expense of courts, juries, and various other institutions and establishments connected with consular affairs, and was imposed on persons who did not pay English taxes and would not pay Turkish taxes. With regard to the correspondence relating to Mr. Blunt, it referred to a matter now past; four years had elapsed since the events to which it related took place, and no good would arise from laying the papers connected with the case on the table.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to know, whether the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown had been obtained as to the legality of levying taxes by Orders in Council?

MR. LAYARD said, the Orders in Council were drawn up by the law advisers of the Crown, and the fee was equally leviable under the old constitution of the Levant Company and several Orders in Council.

THE NABOBS OF THE CARNATIC.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, when he signed his Despatch of the 8th day of April, 1862, in which he stated that after a searching revision of all the Papers he was convinced there were no grounds to justify him in disturbing the decision of the East India Company, that the Treaty signed in 1801 with the Nabob of the Carnatic was a personal one, he was aware that when the Nabob died, in 1819, his son, who succeeded to him, was informed by the Governor General, Lord Hastings, that there was no necessity to renew the Treaty, for that he considered the son ipso facto a party to the Treaty signed by his father; whether he was aware that Sir Thomas Munro, the Governor of Madras, did, about the same time, record his opinion in a Minute that the Treaty of 1801 remained in force, and that the East India Company, without a breach of faith, could not alter any of the Articles; whether, previous to coming to a decision, he had consulted or obtained the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown; and, whether he has any objection that the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the subject should be laid before Parliament?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was perfectly aware of the answer which Lord Hastings gave, and he himself had referred to his views upon the subject on the occasion of the Motion which has been lately made by the hon. Gentleman. As to the Minute of Sir Thomas Munro, it was not made in 1819, but six years afterwards, in 1825, nor did it go at all to the length stated by his hon. Friend. With regard to the other questions, he had not taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the subject; nor, if he had, was it usual to lay their opinions upon the table of the House.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) ACT.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has received any Report of the judgment pronounced by the Right Hon. Justice FitzGerald, at the Assizes for the county Clare, on the construction of the 10th clause of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Act of last year, and if he will lay a Copy of the Report upon the table of the House?

SIR ROBERT PEEL stated, in reply, that the Government had received no Report on the judgment pronounced by Mr. Justice FitzGerald at the Clare Assizes, upon the construction of the 10th clause of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Act.

FAIRS AND MARKETS IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends, during the present Session, to introduce a measure for the better Regulation of Fairs and Markets in Ireland?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he last year introduced a Bill for the Regulation of Fairs and Markets in Ireland, which received very considerable support; but, owing to the pressure of other business, the whole Bill did not pass. A very important portion of it, however—namely, what related to the reformation of weights and measures—had passed, and was in force in Ireland since the commencement of the present year. The Government had no intention to introduce any Bill on the subject until the working of that measure had been seen.

ENGLISH POLICE IN POLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House the note of the Russian Ambassador communicating the desire of the Grand Duke Constantine, Lieutenant Governor of Poland, that some of the Metropolitan Police Force should be sent to Poland; whether, at the date of that application by the Russian Ambassador, Her Majesty's Government were aware that a state of siege was in force in Poland; whether Her Majesty's Government had received any information (prior to the date of the Russian application) that political disturbances and arrests of political prisoners had taken place in Warsaw; whether the Metropolitan Police Officers despatched by the Government to Poland received any instructions or made any reports; and whether such instructions and reports will be laid upon the table of the House?

SIR GEORGE GREY:—I was asked on Monday last whether I would produce the letter dated 31st July last, addressed to me by the Russian Ambassador in this country. I stated that that letter was marked "confidential," and that I did not feel myself justified in producing it without the concurrence of the Ambassador. The attention of the Russian Ambassador having been attracted to the question of the hon Member, in this House, he has informed me that he has not the slightest objection to the production of the letter, and the letter has this day been laid on the table of the House. With regard to the second Question, I have to state that at the date I received that letter Her Majesty's Government were aware of the state of siege which existed in Poland, but they were not aware, nor am I aware now, that shortly before the receipt of that application the execution of political prisoners had taken place in Warsaw. The letter itself stated the object of the application to be that the English police might, by the information they could give, assist the Grand Duke Constantine to put an end, at the earliest possible period, to martial law, and to restore the country to its ordinary civil administration. The state of siege in Poland was proclaimed in October, 1861, and, so far as Her Majesty's Government are informed, it still continues, subject, however, to some modifications. A Despatch was received from Acting Consul White in December last, stating in detail what those modifications are; and as that Despatch has also been laid on the table, it will inform the House better than I can tell it the nature of those modifications. With regard to the third Question, whether Her Majesty's Government had received any information, prior to the date of the application, that political disturbances and arrests of political prisoners had taken place in Warsaw, I may state that the Government had not received, and they have not now received, any information that political disturbances had then recently taken place. I find, however, that of which I was not aware when I received Baron Brunow's letter, and of which I scarcely could be aware, as the date was so recent—namely, that a Despatch was received at the Foreign Office from Colonel Stoddart, on the 28th July last, written at Warsaw, on the general affairs of Poland, in which he referred to certain arrests which had been made at Warsaw and the adjoining districts. An extract from that Despatch, containing all the information given on that subject, is among the papers laid on the table of the House. With regard to the last Question, I stated the other evening that the two police officers did not receive any written instructions from the Chief Commissioner. The instructions were given to them verbally by Sir Richard Mayne, but I have called upon him to state in writing to me the substance of those instructions, and his letter containing those instructions is also laid on the table of the House. He also informs me that one written report, and one only, was received from the two officers; and though that document belongs to a class usually considered strictly confidential, and not communicated to Parliament for obvious reasons, yet as the circumstances in this case are unusual, and as I am anxious there should be no mystery about the matter, but that every suspicion should be removed from the mind of the hon. Gentleman as to the object of sending those officers to Warsaw, that report is included in the papers laid on the table of the House.

SENTENCES ON CONVICTS.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the sentence passed at Winchester Assizes, on the 5th instant, on Lewis Francis, in which an expectation was held out to the prisoner of a possible remission of a portion of the said sentence, was in accordance with the instructions conveyed in the Home Office Circular of the 27th of January last?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had no information with respect to this case, except that the convict had been found guilty and sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude. The Judge had made no communication to him on this subject, which he could have done if he had intended the sentence should be commuted or abridged. The observations alluded to, however, if made, were not inconsistent with the Circular of the 27th of January. That Circular did not say that in no case any sentence of penal servitude should be remitted, but that in future the right of convicts under a sentence of penal servitude to claim a certain abridgment of their sentence on the conditions specified in a notice would no longer belong to prisoners under second sentences of penal servitude. Nevertheless, upon the recommendation of a Judge, or under special circumstances, a sentence of penal servitude might at any time be brought under the consideration of the Home Office.

OSTEND AND CALAIS MAILS CONTRACT.

QUESTION.

MR. BERKELEY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the Contract for carrying the Ostend and Calais Mails, tendered for on the 2nd of February, 1863, has been awarded to any of the parties tendering; and, whether J. G. Churchward is to remain with the old Contract?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in reply, that no final award had been made of the Contract for carrying the Ostend and Calais Mails, tendered for on the 2nd of February, but the Treasury and the Post Office were in communication on the subject, and probably in the course of a few days he would be able to announce that a decision had been arrived at. The old Contract, according to the view of the Government, remained, of course, in force till June, and the necessity for a new arrangement did not arise till that period.

CONDITION OF SOUTHERN ITALY.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any Despatches or Communications relative to the present condition of Southern Italy; and, whether there is any objection to lay them upon the table of the House?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, that Despatches were, of course, received regularly from the Consul General at Naples by the Government, but they had no intention of laying any of them upon the table of the House.

SOUTH ENTRANCE TO PARK LANE.

QUESTION.

MR. GODDARD said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been directed to the very crowded state of a portion of Park Lane, adjoining Piccadilly, and the great delay and consequent inconvenience sustained by the public thereby; and whether it is his intention to propose any measure with a view of obviating the same?

MR. COWPER, in reply, said, that the narrowness of the entrance at the southern end of Park Lane undoubtedly led to great obstruction and inconvenience. At one point the thoroughfare was only wide enough to allow two carriages abreast; but while he fully admitted the inconvenience which arose to the public, he could not admit that the Department over which he presided was in the slightest degree responsible for it. Park Lane was not the property of the Crown, and was not in any respect under his jurisdiction. There was, however, an authority which could deal with the subject—the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square. By the Act of last year parishes and district boards had the power of expending the rates in widening streets, such as Park Lane, with the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works; and they had also the power of raising money for that purpose on the security of the rates. The parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, was a very wealthy one. Its affairs were managed by men of business and experience, and he hoped their attention would be drawn to the very great obstruction and inconvenience to which the hon. Member referred.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—WOODEN FRAMES FOR IRON SHIPS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to move that it was not expedient at the present time to commence the building of wooden ships which were to be covered with iron-plates. It would be recollected that the question was raised a few nights since when the Navy Estimates were under consideration in Committee, and a very general opinion was expressed that while it was expedient to convert wooden ships already on our hands into iron ones by plating, it was not desirable to build wooden vessels expressly for that purpose. The noble Lord at the head of the Government promised on that occasion that the five wooden ships which it was proposed to construct would not be proceeded with until the House had had an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the respective merits of iron and wood as materials for the building of ships for Her Majesty's navy. He (Mr. Lindsay) now came forward for the purpose of affording an opportunity for the expression of that opinion by the House. In introducing the question he would confine himself to two points:—First, were those five new ships proposed to be built to be constructed of wood or iron?—secondly, were they to be built in Her Majesty's dockyards or under contract by private builders? Now, it was for the House to decide whether iron or wood was the best material for the construction of ships-of-war. It was well-known that iron was ten times stronger than wood—that was to say, that a one-inch plate of ordinary English iron was equal in strength to a ten-inch plank of English oak. The first operation in constructing a ship was the laying down the keel, and in the case of wooden ships the keel, stem and sternpost were necessarily divided into a great number of different parts, and these, with the ribs, or timbers as they were called, were fastened together by bolts and trenails. But the keel, stem, sternposts and timbers had in themselves very little strength. It was only when they put the planking outside, and the ceiling inside, and fastened these also by means of trenails and bolts that the ship acquired strength. But in an iron ship the various parts were practically welded into one another, so that the whole structure became almost a solid body, and formed a vessel infinitely stronger and more durable for all purposes than a wooden ship. Before going further, he might as well state that he was not a shipbuilder and had no interest in any shipbuilding yard. He was, however, a shipowner, and ships both of wood and iron had been built for him in different parts of the country. But for the last ten years he had not built a wooden ship, having come to the conclusion that iron ships were stronger, more durable, and altogether a better investment than wooden ones. Since the discussion in Committee to which he had referred, the Admiralty had laid on the table a statement relating to the advantages of iron and wood, and the relative cost of these materials. The document was signed by Admiral Robinson; but, of course, the Board was responsible for it. Although the Admiralty admitted that on the whole an iron ship was stronger than a wooden one, they argued, in their statement, that it was advisable for certain reasons to continue the construction of wooden ships to be plated with iron. Among other reasons for so doing, the Admiralty said they never could depend on the quality of the iron. In his opinion, that was purely a question of price and could therefore be readily solved. A $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour-plate of ordinary iron cost about £40 a ton; but there was better metal to be got. Lowmoor iron, for instance, was superior, but more expensive. The Swedish and Norwegian irons, which were made with charcoal, were also, he understood, tougher and more durable; but then, instead of £40 a ton, they cost £48 or £50. On the whole outlay for a ship-of-war, however, the difference of price between the ordinary and the superior qualities of iron was comparatively a small consideration. If therefore the Admiralty did not procure the best description of iron, it was their own fault. Next, it was alleged that in iron ships the compasses were subject to dangerous deviations. But there was a vast number of iron ships afloat, sailing to all parts of the world, and it had not been found that there was any serious difficulty in keeping the compasses correct in those vessels. It was also said that iron ships were peculiarly liable to foul. After a voyage of twelve months or so the bottom of an iron ship was, no doubt, likely to be foul; but, according to the experience of the merchant service, the Admiralty exaggerated the difficulty of keeping iron ships clean. It was a remarkable fact, that when an iron ship was taken into a fresh-water river, such as the Hooghly, or any of the innumerable streams on the coast of China, the barnacles were, to a great extent, removed from the bottom. Ships could also be easily cleaned in dock. Another objection raised by the Admiralty to iron was the prodigious ravages, as they stated, caused by the splinters of iron when the plates are broken and smashed by shot, and the greater facility by which ships of iron could be pierced below their armour-plating by submarine guns than wooden ships. On those points he would offer no opinion of his own, but would cite two able witnesses—one an extensive builder of iron ships, and the other a post captain in Her Majesty's navy. Mr. Scott Russell, in two able pamphlets, discussed the whole question of "Wood v. Iron," and the effect of shot upon them. The conclusions he arrived at were that iron ships could carry much heavier weights than wooden ones, that they were more durable, and that they were much safer against the sea, against fire, against explosive shells, against red-hot shot, and against molten metal. He maintained, in fact, that for all practical purposes they could be made impregnable, even against solid shot. Such was the opinion of a gentleman who had great experience as a shipbuilder, and who had dealt with the question not only theoretically, but practically, for a long series of years. He had no doubt that the opinions of Mr. Scott Russell would be borne out by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird), a Gentleman who, from his vast experience, was much more competent to guide the House upon the question of "Wood v. Iron" than even the Controller of the Navy himself. In the course of 1861-2 Captain Halsted delivered a series of lectures before the Royal United Service Institution, and in the presence of a number of able and competent gentlemen, who would have contradicted him if he had gone wrong in his statements. The conclusions of Captain Halsted were almost the same as those arrived at by Mr. Scott Russell. England, he said, possessed a great advantage in the superiority of iron over wood as a material for the construction of ships. Iron afforded greater facility for procuring any required standard of strength without the process of seasoning, and with a certainty unattainable by wood; for producing any form, however finely modelled; for imparting strength to subordinate parts; for obtaining greater lightness with equal strength, and more room with equal exterior dimensions. Iron was also, according to Captain Halsted, adaptable to vessels of every size, was easy of construction, was attended with less expense, possessed of greater durability, was less liable to repair, and afforded superior security against leaking. Against the opinions of such authorities as Captain Halsted and Mr. Scott Russell, the Admiralty had done nothing more than refer to what they called the "prodigious ravages caused by the splinters of iron when the plates are broken and smashed by shot." Were they prepared to produce evidence in support of that statement? He rather thought that they had no experience in firing at ships built of iron. About sixteen years ago, it was true, some experiments were made with the Ruby; but she was a little vessel of only twenty tons, had been employed as a sort of tender at the dockyards, was entirely worn out, and her plates were not thicker than a half-crown piece. No wonder that the broadside directed against her caused "prodigious ravages." What, however, was the evidence of competent naval officers? One of the witnesses examined before a Committee, presided over by the present first Lord of the Admiralty, was Captain Hall, who commanded the Nemesis, an iron vessel, in China. Captain Hall stated that, from his experience in China, he had formed a favourable opinion of iron. Several wooden steamers were employed on the same service; but while they were invariably obliged to lay by for repairs, he was able to repair the Nemesis in twenty-four hours, and she was always ready for employment. On one occasion she was hit fourteen times, when one man lost an arm, and one shot went right through the vessel, coming in at one side and going out at the other. There were no splinters; the shot went through as a man might put his finger through a piece of brown paper, and the holes might easily have been stopped. Similar evidence was given by Captain Charlwood, who had also commanded an iron ship of war, and who said he had no doubt that iron ships could be made stronger than wooden vessels, and that shot in striking them would cause less damage and produce fewer splinters. The Admiralty themselves admitted, not only that iron ships were stronger than wooden ones, but that additional strength was given to wooden vessels by iron. He believed, however, that armour-plates in themselves did not add anything to the strength of the structure of a ship; on the contrary, he rather thought that the great weight of the plates tended to weaken the structure, especially in the case of a wooden ship, and to increase the strain in a gale of wind. A French witness had been produced by the Admiralty to prove that wooden ships, though not so strong as iron ships, were strong enough for our purpose. He saw no necessity for going to France or any other country for evidence upon any point connected with ship-building. The Admiralty might have learnt from any of their master shipwrights that, independent altogether of the great weight of armour-plates upon a ship, the greatest difficulty was found to make the stern frame of a wooden vessel strong enough to resist the tremendous vibration caused by the movement of the engines and screw. In the Edgar, a 90-gun ship launched at Sheerness, the play upon the stern frame was so great, that the master shipwright exclaimed in alarm, "For God's sake stop those engines, or you will drive the sternpost out of the ship." The next question which he desired to bring under the consideration of the House was this—was it advisable, presuming that these ships were to be built, that they should be built in Her Majesty's dockyards? Charges had, he thought, unnecessarily been made by the Admiralty against private shipbuilders, and it was only fair that the answer to those charges should be heard. In Admiral

Robinson's report it was stated—"The first practical fact that comes before us is, that in no one instance have the contractors kept to their agreements with the Government, either as to time or cost." It went on to state—"There is no prospect that more than one out of the four iron ships last ordered will be delivered till many months after the period agreed upon;" that not one contractor only, but all had failed in their agreements, "and this clearly indicates the great uncertainty attending this mode of construction." The paper next stated that—"Two other difficulties present themselves—First, the general slovenliness of the work performed by iron shipbuilders, rendering the presence of an Admiralty inspector necessary on the premises wherever the contract ships are building, and leading to many difficulties between the contractors and the Admiralty;" and secondly, "the great temptation that beset the contractors, owing to the cost and difficulty of procuring good iron, to use inferior and cheaper material;" and moreover, that "after a contract is signed, no alteration or improvement, however great, can be made without submitting to any terms the contractor chooses to enforce." These were very grave imputations; but were they true? Why had the contractors not kept to their time? He had received a letter from Mr. Samuda, an eminent shipbuilder, who, writing to him from the Continent, said he had read with surprise the report of Admiral Robinson as reprinted in The Times. Mr. Samuda continued—

"As regards Admiral Robinson's paper, it appears to me—1. Wooden hulls can, without doubt, be built by the Admiralty in their dockyards faster than iron hulls can be built in private yards under Admiralty specifications and Admiralty interference. 2. Therefore, if the Admiralty could show that a very pressing necessity existed, and could not be induced to trust the work to responsible builders to build on the builders' own specifications, the wooden fleet would undoubtedly be ready first; but, 3. Nothing short of pressing necessity ought to induce the House to sanction this, because wooden hulls when cased in armour-plates are well known to be a makeshift job only. 4. I believe that with an Admiralty specification, Admiralty inspection and direction, and Admiralty interference, iron hulls cannot be built in less time than they have been built—1, because the specifications are complicated in the extreme; 2, because the Admiralty insist on directing every amount of detail; 3, because they are unsettled in their minds and plans on many large points, and on almost every minor point of detail; 4, they take power in every third line of their specifications to have all the unexplained details executed as 'the overseer directs'; and the overseer is very long, and makes many references to other Departments over him, before he does direct, so that, in fact, contrary to what Admiral Robinson would imply, the period of executing every contract lies practically with the Admiralty, and not with the contractor. He is, by his contract and specification, bound hand and foot, and is unable to use his own skill, or proceed at all without getting every point settled for him by the Admiralty, and of course all combination and system by which, and which only, large works can be done in a short time—namely, by preparing large quantities of work by one set of men, to enable them to follow up other work arranged to be in a certain state by a certain time, becomes impossible. Lastly, I am sure under Government arrangements iron vessels could not be built cheaper than those already built have been, including all extras paid. I believe in every case the contractors have scarcely covered their cost, in many have been losers; nevertheless, I believe that the Government have had full justice done by them as a whole, and that they (the builders) are not liable to the imputation cast on them for 'general slovenliness'; but also I should add that I doubt if either the Royal Oak or the Prince Consort have advanced sufficiently to enable even an approximate (certainly not an exact) estimate of their cost to be yet ascertained."

Now, Admiral Robinson's report, having been reprinted in The Times, had gone forth to every part of the world; and the Thames Ship-building Company, the contractor for the Warrior and other vessels, sent a reply to that journal, which had not yet appeared in its columns, owing, he presumed, to a pressure upon its space. He therefore desired, with the permission of the House, to read the Thames Ship-building Company's answer. Their letter to The Times began by stating that—

"A paper on the construction of ships for Her Majesty's navy has just been presented to Parliament and printed. It is signed by the Controller of the Navy, and contains charges so grave, and at the same time so unfounded, against the contractors by whom our iron-cased ships have been built, and singles out so especially our firm, the builders of the Warrior, that we cannot pass it over in silence, and must request the favour of your giving our reply a place in your columns."

Having mentioned the nature of the charges, the writer proceeded—

"To all these accusations we give an indignant and complete denial. We challenge the Controller of the Navy and all his officers to produce a single example of slovenliness in workmanship or inferiority in material; we appeal to the thousands who have seen the Warrior, to every practical man who has examined her (and where are those who have not?), to her present condition after more than a twelvemonth's trial through the worst weather, and to the reports of her captain, as our vindication against these charges; and with the great companies for whom we have built some of the finest vessels afloat; with foreign Governments, by whom we are largely employed; and with the private firms for whom we have worked, we hope that we have established a reputation which will withstand even such a blow as one in the high position and armed with the authority of Controller of the Navy has thus sought to deal against it. . . . As to our failure to fulfil our engagements either as to time or cost, we have specific facts to deal with. The Controller states that we 'agreed' to build the Warrior for '£210,225, including extras.' We never made any such agreement, nor anything giving even colourable grounds for such a complete misstatement. Our original contract sum for the Warrior was £190,225. On the 16th of March, 1861, six months before the Warrior left the Thames, we sent in to the Controller an account of extras amounting to £40,808, intimating at the same time that we had other large claims; and when all was finished we claimed, not the sum of £254,728, as stated by the Controller, but £269,800, of which we were paid only £251,648. The changes and additions made in the Warrior beyond her original design were, as these figures will themselves show, enormous: in fact, the ship as built was to a very great extent different from the ship as contracted for; and when she was finished, we took the following course:—We submitted to the Controller that these additions and changes were so extensive, our claim for extras so large and so difficult for the Admiralty officers to deal with, that the fairest course would be for us to show the Admiralty what the ship had really cost, and that they should pay us that cost with a profit of 12½ per cent, which, considering that all our resources had for more than two years been placed at the disposal of the Government, we did not consider unreasonable, nor so much as we might have claimed in an extra bill. The Controller of the Navy himself recommended the adoption of this principle of settlement, only reducing the profit to be allowed to us to 5 per cent, or £12,000. All our books and accounts were submitted to the closest investigation by the Admiralty accountants, who verified their absolute accuracy; and we consented to receive this settlement, although really, as we now desire to state, it gave us no profit as shipbuilders at all; not contemplating during the construction of the vessel the possibility of such a mode of settlement, all the iron and the armour-plates, which we manufactured ourselves, were charged to the ship at little over their prime cost, and at much less than the market prices, or what, had we been shipbuilders only, we must have paid, and the £12,000 given us as profit just about represents this difference."

On the charge of dilatoriness the writer continued—

"We frankly admit, as we have before done to the Admiralty, that had we built the Warrior without any alteration from the original design, our estimate of time would have been two or three months too little; but beyond that, we affirm that all the additional delay is due to the changes made by the Admiralty, and to the stoppage of our work, and the additional work thereby imposed upon us. . . . With respect to our other engagements with the Admiralty for the completion of the Valiant and the Minotaur, we are prepared to prove that the delay in the former is in no respect due to us as contractors; and as to the latter, we shall launch and finish her within an additional time less than is due to the alterations and delays caused by the Admiralty themselves. . . . We have always admitted that the Admiralty were right in seeking in every way to improve these vessels, and that in the Warrior the improvements were well worth all the time occupied in planning and carrying them out; at the same time, in our correspondence with the Controller we have protested, and do protest, against their system of blaming the contractor for the consequences of their own acts. Having dealt with the private question between the Controller and ourselves, we venture to make a few remarks on the public question as to the building of these ships in wood or iron, and by contract or in the dockyards. . . . The paper admits the superior strength and durability of iron over wood, but imputes to iron certain disadvantages. . . . The bulkheads and double bottom, which are most disingenuously stated to be complicated and costly arrangements introduced to remedy local weakness, are, in fact, advantages which cannot be overvalued, which exist only in iron ships, and for which wooden ones possess nothing equivalent. The Great Eastern struck lately on a rock, and was saved by her double bottom. Many vessels have been saved by their bulkheads; and indeed if there was no other recommendation of iron, this alone would be a reason for preferring it to wood. . . . The great fact, however, that all our large steam companies, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, the Royal Mail, and the Cunard, &c., have long since abandoned wood and adopted iron, proves that at least these drawbacks, be they what they may, are more than counterbalanced by the advantages of iron. . . . The Controller gives the cost of an iron ship at £214,000, as compared with a wooden one at £187,000, showing a saving of £27,000 per ship. Without questioning these figures, which cannot, however, be admitted as correct, we would observe that this is only the cost of the hull, and that in each case is to be added—the cost being the same—the machinery, say £50,000; the rigging and outfit, say £20,000; the armament, stores, &c., say £30,000 more. The real difference, therefore, is not between £214,000 and £187,000, but between £304,000 and £277,000. In other words, on the cost of five vessels as proposed, out of a million and a half for iron, the country is to save £135,000, even on the Controller's own showing; and that for the sake of this difference it is 'wiser and more economical to supply the wants of the moment by a cheaper and less durable structure.' We do not believe in the cheapness, but we only point out now how small the economy is to be; that, if these ships are built of wood in the dockyards, 'no more money will be required than what already appears in the Navy Estimates, whereas if built of iron by contract the whole of the money required to do so must be voted separately, in addition to the ordinary Navy Estimates,' is a most extraordinary statement. Build these vessels as we may, the £50,000 for machinery, the £40,000 for rigging, outfit, armament, &c., will alike have to be spent. If built of wood in the dockyards, each ship will require above 1,000 tons of armour-plates, to be purchased of 'contractors,' which with the expense of fixing will absorb some £50,000 out of the £187,000 put down by the Controller as the cost of each ship. Of the remaining £187,000, say roughly one-third in wages, or £47,000, will be spent if the ships are built in the dockyards, or saved if not; and of the £90,000 balance, representing the material, there will be timber, &c., in the dockyards worth the money if remaining there, or capable of being sold for the money to the contractors, or saving the money on the next Estimates by continuing in stock."

That letter had been forwarded to him by Captain Forde, managing director of the company, and there were important facts in it which would be useful in enabling the House to arrive at a sound conclusion on the subject. In an accompanying note Captain Forde said there were many other points to which attention might be drawn. First of all, in regard to time, the Achilles, building in Her Majesty's Dockyard at Chatham, he said, had been laid down in 1860, and was only half finished now. It had been already as long in hand as the company had taken to complete the Warrior. The statement, he further said, made by the Controller of the Navy was calculated to do great damage to a large and important branch of British enterprise, employing a vast amount of skilled labour; and the impression which was likely to be produced abroad, if that hasty statement was not contradicted, was that for honesty, good work, or good material, foreigners need not come here, and they had better resort to France or America. The Thames Ship-building Company had contracts with foreign Governments amounting to £600,000; Messrs. Napier, of Glasgow, had contracts with foreign Governments amounting to £800,000; the Millwall Company to the amount of £300,000, and Messrs. Laird and Son to the extent of £300,000. Here, then, were five companies having contracts with foreign countries to the amount of £2,000,000, employing 10,000 men, on whom probably 50,000 were dependent one way or another, and that statement was calculated to strike a serious blow at the capital invested in these large and important establishments. Surely there was distress enough already in the manufacturing districts without doing anything to increase its amount, and the Controller of the Navy ought to have considered that. He had spoken of only five firms, but there were hundreds of other ship-building establishments in the country to whom this statement would be most prejudicial. The Report, finally, recommended that the House should agree with the Admiralty that these ships should be built in Her Majesty's dockyards. Now, even if wooden ships were to be built—and he would take the sense of the House on that point—were Her Majesty's dockyards in such a state as to build these vessels economically and efficiently? On that point he would adduce three witnesses. These witnesses were the Committee appointed by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington), the Royal Commission, and the present Secretary to the Admiralty himself. The right hon. Gentleman, he believed, would have carried out the changes recommended by the Committee if he had remained in office. The noble Lord might think that hon. Members below the gangway used rather hard words in regard to the Government of which he was a Member, but had the Members of that Government fulfilled the pledges of retrenchment and economy on which they were placed in office? He (Mr. Lindsay) and the rest of the independent Members had not left the two noble Lords and the Government of which they were Members. They adhered to their principles of retrenchment and economy, which the noble Lords had forsaken. But he was not objecting to the building of the five ships. If they were necessary to maintain our position in Europe, by all means let them be built. He would never raise his voice against maintaining the maritime supremacy of England. The only question was where they were to be built? He would take the noble Lord as the first witness. The noble Lord, on the 11th of March, 1859, before he became a Member of the Government, gave a graphic description of the Royal dockyards. He said—

"There had been a system of extravagant expenditure pursued by the ship-building department of the Admiralty, which, he maintained, ought to be thoroughly looked into. In the statement he was about to make, the figures he should have to quote to the House really appalled him He did not think the House had the smallest notion of what had been going on in our dockyards, in the way of tinkering vessels, amputating them, performing all sorts of surgical operations upon them. They had their heads cut off, they had their tails cut off, they were sawn asunder, they were maltreated in every possible way His object was to introduce economy, and without economy there could be no true efficiency." And the noble Lord added that 'they wanted a little reconstruction at the Admiralty.'" [3 Hansard, cliii. 40, 46, 48.]

The noble Lord had been five years at the Admiralty, but what had he done to effect a remedy for the evils of which he complained, or to carry out the recommendations either of the Committee or the Royal Commission? His next witness should be the Committee on Dockyard Economy of 1859, of which Admiral Smart was chairman. They reported that—"There was an apathy and want of activity and energy pervading many of the supervising officers and many of the men apparent in the dockyards. The Committee consider that too little regard has been paid to the subject of cost, and have found abundant proofs of this fact. The Committee found almost a total want of representation to the superintendent of the men in regard to their idling their time, leaving off work before the time," and so forth, and they added that "the arrangements for the superintendence of the men while at work were generally objectionable."

By this Report it appeared that the average cost of shipwrights' labour on eight corvettes built in Her Majesty's dockyards was £5 9s. per ton, while similar labour on similar ships in private yards was £2 12s. per ton; and that in Her Majesty's yards the cost of labour varied from £4 8s. per ton, to £6 18s. per ton. The Royal Commission was composed of the hon. Baronet opposite, the hon. Member for Glasgow, and Lord Gifford, whose loss he deeply deplored. It confirmed the Report of the Committee, and called attention to the most unsatisfactory state of the accounts in Her Majesty's dockyards. He would admit that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had made strenuous exertions to get accurate accounts, which, at the time he came to the Admiralty, were in a very lamentable state. But what had been done to carry out the other recommendations of the Royal Commission? They reported that—

"The control and management of the dockyards was inefficient, arising from the constitution of the Board, the defective organization of the subordinate departments, the want of clear and defined responsibility, and of accurate accounts."

They pointed out a great many things which were in a most unsound state. They took Pembroke, which was solely a building yard, and calling for a return, found, that without taking into consideration the sum of £323,210 which had been expended upon works, such as buildings, machinery, &c., since 1848, the vessels built at Pembroke dockyard during that period, amounting to 65,435 tons, had cost £33 3s. 5d. per ton for the hulls alone, and exclusive of fittings, &c. These were vessels of all sizes, but the great majority were under 1,000 tons. Allowing that the vessels under 1,000 tons cost £15 a ton, the average price of vessels over 4,000 tons might be put down at £45 per ton. The Controller of the Navy went into minute detail in the endeavour to make out that the building of wooden ships in the Royal dockyards cost a great deal less than the building of iron ships of the same size in private yards. The Controller took the case of a wooden ship of 4,200 tons. But that vessel, according to the cost of building in Pembroke yard—£45 a ton—would entail an outlay, if built in a Royal dockyard, not of £187,000, as the Controller estimated, but of £256,000. Even taking the cost at £35 per ton, such a wooden ship would cost £214,000 in a Royal dockyard, as against £172,677, the cost of the Hector. In conclusion, the Royal Commission reported that large retrenchments might be made in the expenditure without impairing the efficiency of Her Majesty's dockyards; and in that opinion he (Mr. Lindsay) entirely agreed. The ships of the merchants of this country were to be found in every sea, they carried the products of our industry to every country in the world. We built not merely the finest merchant ships in the world, but supplied most other nations with ships of war. How was it that our shipbuilders could not be trusted to construct ships of war for their own country? He was convinced, that as perfect reliance could be placed in our leading shipbuilders, it was desirable not to increase the work of construction in the Royal dockyards, at least till material changes were made in the management of these establishments, and that it was desirable to build the ships we required of iron and not of wood. He, therefore, with great confidence, begged to move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not expedient to commence at the present time building Wooden Ships which are to be cased with Iron Armour Plates,"
—instead thereof.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, in rising immediately after the speech of my hon. Friend I shall lose the opportunity of answering remarks which may be made by-and-by in the course of this interesting debate; but it is so important that the House should be made acquainted with the bearings of this question that I think it better at once to explain the views entertained by Her Majesty's Government on the subject. I gather from the remarks of my hon. Friend that he, at all events, will be no party to arresting the progress of armour-plated ships, and therefore, as far as he is concerned, I have little necessity for advertising to that point further; but, inasmuch as other hon. Gentlemen may take a different view, and may think that the armour-plated navy of England is so powerful that there is no necessity for making any further progress, unless with those ships which we have in hand, I shall address a few observations to the House by way of explanation. First of all, I am not going to make a detailed comparison between the armour-plated fleets of this and other countries; but I may state generally that, great as our exertions have been and still are, we are not yet in a position to abstain from further efforts. Now, upon this point it is very important that the House should be aware of the opinion of eminent men in France, as to the comparative naval position of the two countries, extracted from an authority which the hon. Member for Rochdale will acknowledge—the Moniteur de la Flotte. From that journal I have translated portions of a paper read at the Academy of Sciences in Paris about a fortnight ago, by Admiral Paris, a great authority upon ship-building, and himself employed in large works for the French navy. I shall read the concluding part first, because it is very striking. The Admiral says—

"But, whatever be the future consequences of building iron ships, it must be remarked that we are so much in advance of other nations, that a marked superiority exists at present on our side."

Now, I trust these words have been heard by the hon. Member for Rochdale—[Mr. CORDEN: More shame for you!]
—because I saw him wince under the statement of my hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay), when he said that he thought it would be necessary that continual progress should be made in the building of armour-plated ships. Now, I can distinctly assure the House that it is absolutely necessary we should continue to build armour-plated ships over and above those under construction. I need not repeat in detail the ships which are being built, but taking large and small we have now under construction twenty-one vessels which are to bear armour-plates—a smaller number than are being constructed over the water. Assuming that the House will not for a moment agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale that it is not necessary we should make further progress, I come to the interesting point upon which my hon.

Friend's Motion is founded—the respective merits of wooden and iron armour-plated ships. Now, nothing can be more fallacious than what we hear right and left as to iron ships being imperishable because they are made of iron only. Why, Sir, it is well known that in the construction of armour-plated ships there is necessarily a very large quantity of wood used, because we find in practice that no iron plates will stand the shock of heavy guns, unless they have a cushion behind composed of wood. Therefore, you have at once in iron armour-plated ships a very destructible substance which is more liable to decay than any other part. Therefore, whether we build armour-plated ships of wood or iron, we must use a certain quantity in the one case of iron in the other of wood. But iron ships, besides having a large quantity of wood, which is liable to decay, have other great defects. They are extremely liable to foul. My hon. Friends says that merchant ships, which go over the world, are built mostly of iron; that they go their voyage, come home, and again go out, being for months without docking. But we have found that the Resistance had a marked superiority over the other ships with which she was tried, and what is the reason? She had been two months less time out of dock than the Defence, three months less than the Black Prince, and five months less than the Warrior. It was quite incorrect to say that the Warrior had not been docked for two years. Captain Cochrane had said that when six weeks afloat she lost one knot an hour. That was a very important point. It is idle for my hon. Friend to tell us that because iron merchantmen can go over the world without docking, men-of-war can do so too. Here is an important point which my hon. Friend did not bear in view. A merchant ship goes out for a particular purpose, she takes in her cargo, and comes back upon a return voyage. But what does the navy do? Their normal position, so to speak, is in harbour—they are placed on distant stations for long periods to protect our commerce; and, instead of being kept constantly in motion, they are stationary at various foreign places, where necessarily great aggregations of grass and shells foul their bottoms. Now, hear what Admiral Paris says upon this point—

"There are differences of opinion as to the materials of which armour-plated ships should be built. The English have adopted iron, we wood.

Lord Clarence Paget

The first is adapted to very large constructions, it lasts longer, but it greatly interferes with speed and steerage, owing to the immediate deposit of grass and shells, necessitating continual docking and painting."

Thus, there is not only a question of a loss of speed, but of actual steerage. We have it not officially, but it has been stated in the newspapers, that in American waters a conflict recently took place between two vessels, the Alabama and the Hatteras, and the defeat of the latter was attributed to the foulness of her bottom, she being an iron ship. I do not vouch for the fact, but such is the cause assigned. I have referred to Admiral Paris, and the hon. Member for Sunderland will admit that he is a high authority. The hon. Gentleman will admit that the French have not been unsuccessful in their efforts to form a splendid navy, and that they have an admirable knowledge of the principles of naval construction. Admiral Paris says, with regard to the iron ship—

"Its greatest defect is due to its weakness against shot or shell which might strike below the armour-plating when the vessel rolls, causing, probably, the loss of the vessel, in spite of the numerous water-tight compartments."

That is the opinion of Admiral Paris, and, I believe—indeed, I know—it is also the opinion of M. Dupuy de l'Ome, for I have the authority of the Controller for saying, that he has just received a letter from that distinguished gentleman in which his preference is stated to be rather for wood than for iron. My hon. Friend has quoted largely from Mr. Scott Russell upon this question of iron ships as compared with wooden ships. Now, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) presided last year at a meeting of the Institute of Naval Architects, when a paper was read by Mr. Scott Russell, in which he recommended strongly that we should get our fleets built by him and of iron. But it happened that there was also at that meeting another eminent shipbuilder, Mr. Ditchburn, who is well known as having produced some very remarkable vessels, and who is as much an iron shipbuilder, I believe, as Mr. Scott Russell. Mr. Ditchburn said—

"In considering the strength of ships, it is right to remember that in ships-of-war the bottom is made exceedingly strong; for in addition to the thick external planking which is fitted near the keel, the spaces between the frame timbers are filled in with timber, the frames and fillings being bolted together. Such ships are therefore superior to any iron vessel I have ever seen with respect to strength of bottom."

If any hon. Member will move for the Return, he will find that of vessels built for the navy, and lost, the greater proportion are iron vessels. We know that iron is brittle, and cannot, on striking against a rock, resist the blow like wood. Let us take the case, which happened the other day, of the Defence armour-plated ship, the pea of whose anchor struck against her side, close to the water, and knocked out a large piece. If such an accident had happened at sea, it might have caused very serious inconvenience. It is the particular characteristic of the ordinary iron ship, that although rigid, it will not bear a sudden blow. I am an advocate for iron ships; and if we could get over these difficulties, I would prefer to see iron armour-plated ships; but, I believe, in saying so I am in a minority among naval officers. I can assure the House, that having discussed this question with very many naval officers, the majority of them have said to me, that they would prefer to command wooden armour-plated ships rather than iron armour-plated ships. Now, I must refer to the paper that has been laid upon the table of the House—the Report of the Controller of the Navy. In doing so, I wish hon. Members to understand that nothing was further from Admiral Robinson's intention than to commit any injustice towards the eminent shipbuilders who have been referred to. We have every reason to be generally satisfied with the great contractors, but Admiral Robinson felt it to be his duty to point out where their work did fail, and I think in doing so he was only doing his duty as a public servant. Admiral Robinson, however, has written me a letter, of which I will read a portion to the House—

"There is an expression in the paper presented to Parliament relative to the materials of which armour-plated ships should be built which may be misunderstood, and, if so, may be annoying to the feelings of iron shipbuilders. By 'the general slovenliness of the work performed' I mean only this—that the general standard of iron ship-building work in the trade is so far below what the Admiralty has considered necessary, and has enforced upon its contractors, that they have complained again and again of our insisting upon work being better done than was habitual in the trade. I may add, that there is no quality of work that we have exacted from our contractors, no degree of excellence in workmanship that we have required from them, that we have not ourselves put in practice in our own dockyard at Chatham while building the Achilles."

Upon this point I may quote from a letter which the Admiralty have received from Messrs. Napier, the eminent shipbuilders, dated March 11. Those gentlemen say—

"The unusual test by which the quality of the iron was ascertained, and which had not previously existed in ship-building, was a source of the greatest delay and loss to us, and this could not have been foreseen when we made our estimate. In attempting to attain the strain of twenty-two tons per square inch, and otherwise satisfy the inspectors, we had to pay a very large amount beyond what could ever have been expected from the previous experience we or any other ship-builders were possessed of, and, moreover, had the greatest difficulty in getting, at any price, iron which would stand the test from the most eminent makers either in England or Scotland."

The test required is twenty-two tons to the square inch, but Professor Fairbairn says that the best material ought to bear a strain of twenty-five tons to the square inch, so that we do not exact so much as scientific authority states we ought to require. Well, then, it is said that the Admiralty Inspectors are extremely severe. Sir, it pleases me beyond expression to hear that those gentlemen do watch the interests of the public. In former days, as we have heard, the inspectors used to be so intimate with the contractors that they always approved everything which the contractors did; and it is to their credit that they now do try to protect the public.

Having thus endeavoured to make peace between the Admiralty and the ship-builders, for whom we have the highest respect, I may now, without troubling the House in detail with the statements of the Controller, say that in my opinion his views as to the comparative merits of wood and iron are extremely fair. He gives to iron the credit of great durability, and of much greater strength in very large structures than wood possesses. In short, he says that after a lapse of years the iron frame would have suffered next to nothing as compared with a wooden ship. I entirely go with him in this. But against those advantages he sets "the serious local weakness of the comparatively thin plates of which the bottom of an iron ship is necessarily composed" (I have given instances of that in the Defence); "the danger, consequently, of getting on rocks in such ships," and "the necessity which this weakness entails of constructing double bottoms, thwartship bulkheads, water-tight compartments, sluice-doors, &c., and various other complicated arrangements which add both to the weight and cost of an iron ship." My hon. Friend tells us, that these water-tight compartments, even if a hole were made in the bottom of a ship, would keep the water entirely out. Yes, if you can get them; but in no case in the ships supplied to the Admiralty have the water-tight bulkheads been water-tight. I trust that they will be more perfect in the new ships; but, as yet, not one of those ships has bulkheads or sluice-doors which are perfectly water-tight. The fact is, that the question of wood versus iron is one which may be argued any way. On both sides the greatest possible amount of argument may be adduced. The advocates of iron may show immense advantages over wood. On the other hand, those who are not devoted to iron, but who take a disinterested view of the matter, are bound, in stating the case to the public, to show that iron armour ships are not altogether without very serious defects. There is another matter—the relative cost—which I agree is of small importance compared with the necessity of having the best article. It is, I think, not quite fair to bring into a debate of this kind the Admiralty management for years past in our dockyards. But, since this matter has been alluded to, I cannot quite pass over it. Now, I cannot help saying that my hon. Friend is misleading the House, if, when he alludes to the Reports of the Dockyard Commission and the Committee presided over by Admiral Smart, he gives the House to understand that those Reports have not been very carefully considered by the Admiralty, and that great improvements have not in consequence been introduced. Take the Report of the Committee. The gist of Admiral Smart's criticism was the apathy of the dockyard officers, owing to the system then existing. Well, Sir, we agreed in this criticism, and we did in the dockyards that which has had grave political consequences. We established a rule by which for the future no artificer should be promoted to a higher grade after the age of forty-five, thus giving young men from the time of their entering the service an opportunity of fitting themselves for higher posts; and if they have not so fitted themselves by the time they are forty-five, we hold that they are no longer fitted for promotion. The consequence is, that we are taking young men to superintend the artificers, instead of men of an age when we could not expect from them anything like effective superintendence. Then there is the Report of the Dockyard Commission. My hon. Friend pays me a few compliments for having originated this inquiry. If he will look at some papers which are now on the table, he will see what has really been done in conformity with the Report of that Commission. Here are two papers which will give my hon. Friend some little amusement if he will take them home with him to-morrow. One is the balance-sheet of the cost of manufactured articles in Her Majesty's dockyards for 1860-1; and another is a Return of expenses incurred in building, converting, repairing, and fitting Her Majesty's ships. By referring to these Returns my hon. Friend will see the cost of every article. It is prepared on the double-entry system, and is, I believe, as correct an account as is to be found in any mercantile establishment in the kingdom. We have adopted many other recommendations of the Royal Commission, though some of them we could not adopt. For example, it was recommended that there should be laid on the table the expenses incurred on Her Majesty's ships, and that the Estimates should be accompanied by an annual programme of ship-building works; and I now state to the House exactly what we are doing, and what ships we have got for our money. I mention these things to show that the Report of the Royal Commission has been a text-book for the Admiralty; and I am sure that, if the House has patience, our ship-building accounts, which were very indifferent a few years ago, will be well framed and will represent fairly the cost of the ships at the Royal yards. Moreover, my belief is, that if you come to look at these accounts, you will find that the work is not so expensive in the Royal yards as the House supposes, and as I confess that I used to suppose.

I will turn now to the very important point whether we are to build of wood or of iron, and I beg the House to consider, that if we build of iron by contract, we must be prepared at once to state distinctly and specifically what we want. Now, is any man in this country prepared to state what we want? [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen may laugh, but, in the face of daily changes, will they tell me what they want? What is to be the form and size of the ships which are to compose our future navy? In the present state of transition, no one can say. You have got broadside ships, you have got Mr. Reed's form of construction, and the turret ships. Who can tell me which of these is the best? We are making experiments, and are watching the performances and peculiarities of each class; but until we have got specimens of all these ships at sea, and can fairly test them, it is impossible to say what we shall want two years hence. For the House must remember, that if we enter into contracts for iron ships, we must be prepared to state what is wanting at this future period. It has been shown that vessels under contract cannot be finished under that time, and I do not think we can expect that builders should complete them in less time; but the reason why the Government have paused before entering into fresh contracts is because we are not prepared now to state precisely what, not the bottoms, but the upper works of these ships should be, which are to be completed two years from this date. I shall, perhaps, be told by some ship-building authority, "Why not put it into our hands, and as we go on you can make such changes as you please?" Well, we did that once, but we burnt our fingers. We had very much this sort of feeling when we ordered the Northumberland, the Agincourt, and the Minotaur. The House will remember that there had been great discussions whether the armour-plates should be 4½ inches thick with an 18-inch backing, or 5½ inches and a 9-inch backing. This has been a moot point, and it was only yesterday that experiments were made which, as far as they go, are satisfactory, as showing that we did right in choosing the 5½-inch plates with a 9-inch backing. When we ordered these ships, we left ourselves a margin. We said, "You shall build these ships, and in the course of a certain number of months we will tell you what is to be the thickness of the armour-plating and of the backing." The time came, but the experiments tried were altogether insufficient, and at the end of three months we were just as unable to come to a decision as when we entered into the contract. The builders then said, "We have arrived at a stage when you must decide one way or the other," and we were obliged to come to a decision in the dark. That was a mere question whether you should have thicker armour-plate and thinner backs.

But what is the question before the public now? Nothing less, than the whole form and shape from the water-line upwards. Here are the Americans, who have adopted the turret principle; but they built things which the moment they went to sea went to the bottom. The Monitor, as soon as she was caught in a gale of wind, was shown to be unfit for sea. Now, we do not like ships that go to the bottom. We want to build ships which shall remain on the surface. We are told, that if we have turrets, we cannot carry masts and rigging, as they would interfere with the range of the guns. That and other difficulties we are endeavouring to get over, and I trust they will be got over. I do not wish to speak too confidently of turret ships, because they are still matters of speculation. I have confidence in them, but many officers and other great authorities have not. Then, we have Reed's plan, which is a square tower in the centre of the ship, and Mr. Reed says that by concentrating your weight in and near the centre you may have thicker armour as a coating to that tower. We are trying his principle, and we are also building ships wholly armour-plated. Mr. Whitworth tells you that he will pierce through any armour-plating you may have, not only with shot but with shell; and if he is right, what is to become of armour-plating? I trust these vessels will resist shell, but I mention these matters, though at the risk of wearying the House with matters of detail, for the purpose of showing that it is impossible for any Government now to undertake to give distinct specifications, such as would be absolutely necessary if they desired to build ships by contract. It is impossible in 1863 to give such specifications as should rule the building of iron ships for the navy of 1865. We have, however, given this subject our careful consideration, and we believe that we can progress gradually, and not by fits and starts, as has hitherto been the case, which only produce alarm in the country. The Government believe that the navy is in a satisfactory state with respect to the present year, and in a satisfactory state of progress for the year to come also; but it is still absolutely necessary that we should progress in building ships. We are of opinion that on the whole it is advisable that we should prepare, in the Royal dockyards and at leisure, a certain number of wooden frames for armour-plated ships, up the Channel at the rate of eleven knots and a quarter at half boiler power. Then, again, in the case of the fight between the Alabama and the Hatteras, of which, however, he knew nothing beyond what had appeared in the newspapers, it was the superior force of the former, and not the fouling of the latter, which decided the contest. In Admiral Robinson's report it was stated, that while iron ships were more rigid and durable than wooden ones, they were more open to damage by missiles under water. He disputed that assertion. When the Great Eastern, an iron vessel, with a double bottom, lately struck on a rock at New York, she could have returned at once to this country without being repaired, had it not been for the underwriters. Again, about twenty-three years ago he built an iron vessel called the Nemesis, which, on a voyage from Liverpool to Portsmouth, ran on some rocks. The water got into the fore compartment only; and she steamed on to Portsmouth, where she was docked and fully repaired within a week, and at the cost of only £40. That vessel was built in the usual way, and was not inspected by the Admiralty. Her safety, on the occasion referred to, was due to her bulkhead being perfectly water-tight. A similar event occurred in the East Indies, where a vessel belonging to the India Company, after having struck and suffered considerable damage, steamed to a place of security 1,500 miles from the scene of the accident, where she was repaired at a small expense. He had no hesitation in saying, that had that vessel been built of wood, it would have been lost. It was true, perhaps, that the injury done to an iron ship was usually of a more local character than in the case of a wooden ship, but then the repairs were also more local. When an iron-plate sustained any damage, it could be taken out and replaced at the cost of a few pounds; but a wooden ship could be repaired only at an enormous outlay. He had received a letter that very day from Liverpool, in which the writer stated that 120,000 tons of shipping were being built for Liverpool ship-owners at present, but he could not hear of any large wooden ships on the stocks. The shipowners had all made up their minds that iron ships were more serviceable and economical, and would have nothing to say to wooden ones. The Peninsular and Oriental Company some years ago deliberately adopted iron as the material of their ships, and had seen no reason to repent the experiment, but, on the contrary, every reason to adhere to the new system. The Cunard vessels, lately built, which crossed the Atlantic in all weathers, and braved the most severe and trying storms were also of iron. In the event of a shell exploding below water the chances were that a wooden vessel would go down, whereas an iron one would probably be affected only in one compartment, and would continue to float. It was a great mistake to suppose that armour-plates strengthened a ship; so far from doing so they actually weakened her, because the immense weight added to her sides rendered it necessary to cut off the upper deck to compensate for the extra weight of armour-plates. The noble Lord said the wooden vessels could be got ready in a very short time; but it was well known that when even the smallest craft, such as gunboats, were constructed in great haste, it was not long before their worthlessness was discovered. The Admiralty ought to take care that in their hurry they did not use insufficiently seasoned timber, which before a year or two was over would be seized with dry-rot. It would also be well to find out, before more wooden ships were built, whether those which had already been iron-plated would hold out against a storm at sea. That was still a matter of doubt. When the French began to reconstruct their navy, they could not build iron ships to any extent. They applied to him, and he built a number for them. But the Emperor had given great encouragement to the construction of iron vessels in public and private yards, and the result was that the French were becoming quite expert at the work. As long as wood was used for their fleet, they would have to go to other countries for a supply of timber; but if they used iron, we should be independent of foreign aid. The difference in cost between iron and wooden ships ought not to deter them from adopting the former material. The great point was to get ships which would last a long time without repairs—these were the cheapest in the end. There could be no doubt that Admiral Robinson's Report had produced much suspicion and distrust in regard to the ironmakers and shipbuilders who held contracts for the navy. If any of them had supplied bad iron or done imperfect work, they ought to be exposed by a public investigation; but, on the other hand, if they had fulfilled their contracts honestly, they ought to be cleared from the imputation which had been cast upon them as a body. There had, no doubt, been some difficulty in getting iron of the exact kind which the Admiralty required, but the manufacturers were becoming every day more capable of producing it. He had that day been told by one manufacturer that he was going to turn out armour-plates 12 inches thick. One great advantage of iron over wood was that it required no seasoning and was easily altered and adapted to the wants of the day. He might mention in reference to this subject, that while in business he had built forty ships for the Admiralty, that there had never been a complaint as to the work or materials. The system of contracting for ships, as at present in practice, was a bad one. In the case of engines the parties contracting were required to send in their own plans, and were judged according to those plans. That system had raised English engine-makers to the head of all engine-makers in the world, and the adoption of a similar system in regard to the building of ships would prevent the recurrence of these complaints about bad workmanship, and would insure that the contracts would be intrusted only to men who knew how to build a ship, and would give their attention to it. The adoption of such a course would do more than anything else to develop the ship-building talent of this country, and would place the navy in a position such as it had never hitherto occupied. If the Admiralty were allowed to cut out these frames, they would in a few months be converted into something else, and in two or three years but little of the original timber would be left. He looked upon this as an attempt to get in the small end of the wedge for an expenditure of £1,300,000 or £1,500,000 on the plea that we are going to spend only £500, or £600. In his opinion it would be better to sell the timber and wait for a few months, until they saw what Captain Coles's ship and the Royal Oak would do. They had tested the iron ships, let the Government now transfer their crews into four of the wooden ships and send them into the Atlantic for twelve months, and then decide whether they would build iron or wooden ships.

Mr. J. C. EWART said, that he had been for some time past a director of the Peninsular and Oriental Company to which reference had been made. That Company had forty-one iron vessels, of an aggregate burden of 61,700 tons, and were building six more of a burden of about 12,300. Those vessels had been built by contract on the Tyne, the Thames, the Clyde, and the Mersey, and had given the most complete satisfaction. The troop-ship Himalaya, the best transport on the service, was built for them by Messrs. Mare, and afterwards sold to the Government. Two or three of their old iron steamers, having become antiquated in form, were being converted into sailing vessels, and Lloyds surveyor, in a report dated August, 1862, said of one of them, "The bottom plating externally presents a most satisfactory appearance, being free from corrosion, with scarcely any defective rivets, or any leaking butts or seams." That vessel was built in 1847; and as she had performed a great deal of hard work, he thought that this was a good proof how faithfully she had been built. Another vessel, the Garryowen, constructed by Messrs. Laird, was now in the Shannon in almost as perfect a state as when she was built. As additional proof of the capability of private builders to construct iron ships, he might refer to the magnificent line of steamers employed in the postal service between Holyhead and Dublin. In the case of those vessels a form of tender was sent to a few of the most eminent builders, merely specifying the size of the vessels, the speed desired, and the accommodation required, all the rest being left to the contractors. How satisfactory the result had been was known to every one in the House. As a large proprietor in steam-packet companies, he had the greatest confidence in the building of ships by private contract.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, he had always entertained a very decided opinion that it would be far better, and far more economical, to build our vessels by contract than in the Government Dockyards, and he was glad to find that his opinions were justified by the authority of some of the ablest and most experienced men in the country. He could not see when the system of contract had been so successfully carried out with reference to engines, why it should not be applied to ships. He had pressed Admiral Robinson on that point when examined before the Select Committee; and while he admitted that the manufacture of engines was perfectly successful, he seemed to think there was some abstract reason making it impossible to have, under a system of contract, that thorough inspection which was absolutely necessary. He would certainly support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Sunderland. The only question was whether the Resolution ought not to have gone beyond the question of iron plates, for he was informed that the system of iron plating might be succeeded by the more effective system of steel plating. He regretted the reactionary and retrograde policy adopted in that as in other matters by the Government.

MR. JACKSON said, the great difficulty was, not as to whether they should build iron or wooden ships, but as to what they should do with the artisans in the dockyards. The Admiralty were overridden by officialism, and one reason why they could not adopt a proper and economical mode of construction was that they could not send their vast hosts of workmen about their business. The country was paying £1,400,000 per annum in superannuation allowances. He wished to know, whether the Admiralty were taking steps to prevent any further increase in the number of their non-effectives? There was no reason why the workmen in the dockyards should not be engaged from week to week, instead of being permitted to establish a claim for superannuation.

MR. BENTINCK said, a great deal more was meant by the Motion than met the ear. Ostensibly, the House was discussing the comparative merits of wooden and iron ships; but that was the least important part of the question. Upon that subject very little need be said. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty had disposed of it when he told the House that there was a great deal to be said on both sides, and that no living man could say what would be the result of the various experiments now taking place. Two things only could test the matter. One was inevitable—time; the other he trusted was long distant from us—war. His own opinion was that the right system of ship-building should embrace the use of both wood and iron—an iron frame with wooden planking; and that he thought would be the most economical, the most durable, and altogether the best mode of building heavy ships. He would not insinuate that there was anything of self-interest or of improper feeling or object in any views or opinions which had been expressed on the subject in or out of the House. Every allowance must be made for the impressions of men in favour of a particular branch of trade or manufacture in which they had been long engaged. But the most important part of the question raised that night was not so much whether they were to build ships of wood or iron as whether they were to be, to a certain extent, independent of the private building yards, or be solely dependent on them. He, for one, could not think it advisable for this country to be dependent for its navy solely on private yards. It had been said that a great deal of the difficulty which had occurred in building in the private yards was attributable to Admiralty interference; but, on the other hand, it had been shown that without such interference the Admiralty could not have justice done to the country by obtaining the best work. His noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had proved also that no practical economy would result from the complete substitution of the private yards for the public dockyards as far as building was concerned. To render our dockyards incapable of undertaking the construction of the heavier class of ships, would be to do a very unwise and impolitic thing; but if it could be further shown that no real economy would result, nothing more was needed to discredit the proposal. It had been openly stated that there had been much to find fault with in the mode of construction in the private yards; that it had required constant Admiralty superintendence to prevent the introduction of bad work, and that the iron used in building for the merchant service differed in quality from that used in constructing ships for the navy. Here, then, they had the whole case in a nutshell. Nothing could be more impolitic or dangerous than to denude the Royal dockyards, and leave ourselves entirely dependent upon private enterprise. The rivalry carried on between private shipbuilders and the employés of the Admiralty was, he believed, beneficial to the country, and he hoped the double system would long continue. But, if any circumstances should ever render the two incompatible, he should say unhesitatingly let them dispense with private enterprise and rely on their own dockyards for the construction of their fleets. It would be utter destruction to the position and safety of the country if the dockyards were so placed as not to be able to construct every description of vessel. One more remark. The real effect of the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland was this:—He proposed that the House of Commons should take out of the hands of the Government of the day the details of the business of a great department of the Government. [Cries of No, no!] No! He said, "Yes." He contended that the Motion simply amounted to this:—That the House of Commons were dissatisfied with the mode in which the Government of the day were conducting a particular Department; that they expressed their dissatisfaction at the manner in which the Department were carrying out certain details; that they thought those details ought to be differently carried out; and that they intended to take out of the hands of that Department the conduct of those details, and to prescribe a mode in which they should be conducted. That was the substance of the Motion. He ventured to say that such a course was most mischievous, and he would go further and say it was most dangerous. He could imagine nothing more unconstitutional than the adoption of the principle of that Resolution. Whatever his opinion might be with regard to the Board of Admiralty, this was not the way to apply the proper correction; and whatever was done, he trusted that the House would never sanction the principle that the House of Commons was to become the executive in matters of detail.

MR. H. ROBERTSON said, that he saw no impropriety in the House honestly and distinctly telling the Government what it wished them to do in the matter. In his opinion the very reasons assigned by Admiral Robinson to induce them to build ships of wood ought rather to induce them to build them of iron. The delay and cost complained of as incidental to building ships for the Government by contract were the result of the officials of the Admiralty really not understanding what plans and specifications to adopt and adhere to. The Controller of the Navy sent out plans and designs which could not be executed without material alteration. That naturally led to increased cost, for which the contractor was in no way responsible. Take the case of the Warrior. The price first contracted for was £210,000, and the actual cost was £254,000. The contractors did not, however, get that excess of £44,000 as a simple bonus or gratuity, but for additional work that had to be done in consequence of the acts of the Controller. There was no difficulty in the contractors or the Government getting any description of iron they pleased if they only specified what they wanted, and chose to pay its cost. He was convinced that the country was now paying larger prices than were necessary for iron plates, simply because the Admiralty inspectors, not having a correct knowledge of the qualities and properties of iron, laid down improper rules for the guidance of the manufacturers. The result of the incompetence of the inspectors sent down frequently was, that they sometimes ordered an inch to be cut off the ends of the plates simply because somebody happened to say that ought to be done. The result was, that those whose work they were sent to inspect had to pay dearly for the want of knowledge which those gentlemen displayed. He, for one, should like to see a principle of competition established, by means of which a fair standard of comparison might be obtained between ships built in Government and those constructed in private yards. If the Admiralty, out of every four ships, would have one built at Chatham and three at private yards, they would obtain the necessary standard of comparison. Without competition there could be no comparison; and as he objected to monopoly and a sort of "protection shop" in ship-building, and was satisfied that iron was a better material than wood, he would support the Motion.

MR. BEECROFT: The statement issued the other day by the Admiralty relating to the advantages of iron and wood in the construction of ships for Her Majesty's navy, astonishes me no little. In this statement one of the reasons given against the advantages of iron over wood is—"The extreme uncertainty as to the quality of the material used; in fact, the small quantity of real good iron of the best ship-building qualities that can be found in the market." I venture to say, on behalf of the ironmasters, that this statement is a reflection upon them which they do not deserve. It is a slur upon all the ironmasters in the kingdom. The extra demand for armour-plates came on so suddenly, it was impossible to get ready in a moment the requisite machinery and appliances to meet this extraordinary demand. The ironmasters immediately put their shoulders to the wheel, and did all they possibly could to meet the requirements of the Government; they have spared neither expense nor talent. They have spent hundreds of thousands in enlarging their works. As a proof of this, I may mention Mr. John Brown, of the Atlas Works, Sheffield. The noble Lord at the head of the Government went over these works in the autumn of last year, and he there saw many acres of ground which three years ago was a green field, covered with works employed in the manufacture of armour-plates. Mr. Brown is now increasing his works to such an extent, that in April next he will be prepared to supply 1,200 tons of armour-plates per month, that is, as many armour-plates as are required for a ship of the Warrior class; therefore, he will be able to supply plates for twelve Warriors every year. He expects to be able to roll plates up to twelve inches thick. Mr. Charles Cammell, of Sheffield, is now constructing works on a gigantic scale for the same purpose. I could name many other instances of ironmasters who are already able to supply large quantities of armour-plates. Many of these firms supply the best quality of material that can be produced. Indeed, they take a pride in supplying the very best material for our iron-clad ships, the future defence of our country. Therefore, I repeat, it is a slur upon the ironmasters of this country to say that "only a small quantity of real good iron can be found in the market."

With respect to the alleged "extreme uncertainty as to the quality of the material used," I may observe there is no difficulty, by paying a fair price, in obtaining iron plates of a uniform good quality; and I am quite sure no respectable contractor or iron shipbuilder would knowingly use an inferior quality of iron, for by so doing his reputation would be irrecoverably damaged. In fact, a contractor cannot make use of inferior plates, because the plates are invariably tested before being used. In common justice to respectable contractors, the Government ought, I think, to name the defaulting parties alluded to. It would, I think, be a mere waste of money to build wooden ships and cover them with armour-plates. The iron casing would most certainly weaken the ship, hanging as a dead weight on her sides; and in rough weather the iron plating and fastenings would be liable to strain and tear the wood to pieces. It is said that the French are constructing their ships of war of wood in preference to iron; but how is it that the French are building some of their frigates entirely of iron? I was at L'Orient a few months ago, and saw a 40-gun frigate, the Heroine, in course of construction, and built entirely of iron, outside casing being 4½-inch armour-plates. Wooden ships, not cased with iron, have been proved to be too weak, as it is an admitted fact that in many of them the guns have had to be taken out fore and aft. There cannot, I think, be a shadow of a doubt of the immense superiority of iron ships over wooden ships.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he was happy to feel that the House approached this question without any political feeling. It was one in which both sides of the House were equally interested. He had been a Member of the House fourteen years, and the first question he heard debated was the very one they were then discussing, and he recollected perfectly well a naval Lord stating, that the question had been settled for ever by the experiment which had been recently made, whereas now it appeared that the experiment was made on an old ferry boat, whose plates were not thicker than half-a-crown. He also recollected when the Government would not have iron vessels even for the conveyance of the mails, saying, that they would not be fit for the transport of troops if they should be wanted for that service; whereas the best vessels they had then for that purpose were the iron vessels they had purchased of the mail companies, who had built them almost in defiance of the Government. He believed that they owed it to the courage of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich that they had in the service some of the best iron ships in the world. Had he not been at the head of the Admiralty, they would, no doubt, have gone on merely following the example of other nations, till they were obliged to take action. The hon. Member for Norfolk said, the question ought to be left in the hands of the Government, and that the House of Commons, in meddling with it, was taking upon itself that which did not belong to it. But that was not the case, for they were debating the question on the invitation of the Government, the construction of the five vessels having been stopped till the matter had been discussed in the House. In his opinion, the House was entitled to lay down the principle on which they should proceed in the matter, and then leave the details to the Government. He had been greatly struck that night with the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, showing as it did the want of appreciation on the part of the Government of what their future should be. The noble Lord argued, that as the Government did not know what was required, therefore the House ought not to prescribe to them a particular course. Now, what the House wanted was, that the ships which should be built for the service of the country should be those which were best adapted for the service. They believed that iron vessels were best fitted for the service. He came now to Admiral Robinson's paper. Admiral Robinson said—

"There are two important points involved in this consideration—First, the nature of the material. Iron possesses these advantages over wood: An iron ship can be built of larger dimensions than a wooden ship, with no loss of strength. Secondly, an iron ship has more rigidity and strength of structure as a whole than a wooden ship, though locally weak."

Now, he took exception to that statement. If an iron ship were properly constructed, with bulkheads and water-tight compartments, it would be much stronger in all parts than a wooden ship. Admiral Robinson went on to say—

"An iron ship has much greater durability in certain parts of the structure, indeed, in all parts where no wood is in contact with the iron."

Now, in this admission lay practically the whole question. Admiral Robinson added—

"After a lapse of years the iron frame would have suffered next to nothing as compared with a wooden ship."

Why, then, not build iron ships, and get rid of the incubus which had so long lain upon the nation, the immense expenditure on the navy. What he and those who acted with him wanted, was to get rid of the enormous expenditure in repairs of the navy. The dockyards should be made as efficient as possible, but to render them efficient, was it necessary to spend millions on millions in useless repairs? What was wanted was, that the dockyards should be conducted on the best possible commercial principles, to do all that was necessary for the country in the very best possible way, and that not a pound should be wasted that a commercial man could object to. A remarkable proof of the superiority of iron over wood was given by the Great Eastern, which, after having one large and eight smaller holes in her bottom, traversed the Atlantic, and did not make water to the extent of an ordinary vessel. The Great Britain was another instance, for he was sure that no nautical man would say that a wooden ship could have stood such a beating as that vessel did in Dundrum Bay. In order to test the question of the relative value of iron and wooden ships, he wrote to the managers of two of the largest steam packet companies. The manager of the Peninsular and Oriental Company wrote in reply—

"We now build none but iron ships—a proof that we have found them by long experience superior in all respects to wooden ships. Some of our iron ships have come almost scathless out of difficulties, such as groundings and collisions, which would have destroyed wooden ones."

The Manager of the Royal Mail Company gave similar testimony, and among other instances cited the case of the Victoria, which after getting into the cleft of a rock in Balaklava Harbour, and having twenty feet of her keel wrenched away, brought home a full cargo of stores, whereas a wooden ship would have been a total loss. As to fouling, it had come to his knowledge within the last few days, and he was prepared to stake his character and reputation upon the proof of the fact, that the wooden vessels lately made by the French in their navy, which had copper bottoms, became as foul as any iron ships in her Majesty's navy. Sir Humphrey Davy thought that a line of zinc round the top of the copper would prevent the wearing of the copper, and so it did, but it destroyed the cleansing quality of the copper. In a galvanic battery copper and zinc produced galvanic action, and so would copper and iron, but the effect of iron on the top and copper on the bottom, while preventing the wearing of the copper, was to deprive the copper of its cleansing property, because the constant cleansing caused by the copper was nothing more than the wearing away of the substance of the copper itself. The French had found that out with regard to the Gloire, from the bottom of which, only the other day, forty tons of barnacles and accumulations had been removed. As to the greater damage from splintering when the iron plates were broken by shot, he should like to hear the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay), than whom there was no higher authority in the House. He believed that the effect of splintering was the same, whether from iron or wood, and that if a vessel were armour-plated to a certain depth below the water-line, the observation of Admiral Robinson on that point would apply equally to both descriptions of vessels. As to submarine guns, he was not aware that any were in existence, and he did not think the House would be influenced by any dread of what was now a philosophic toy. As to the possibility of iron-clad ships being superseded in consequence of improvements in artillery, the argument that they should therefore construct less expensive vessels amounted only to this—that they ought not to have the best thing which they knew of, because something better might be invented. He was as anxious as any man to save the money of the country; but true economy consisted in stopping short of nothing less than perfection if perfection could be obtained. With regard to the example of France, it should be remembered that wood was cheaper and iron much dearer there than in England; and that if France were in the same position as England, commanding natural advantages in the raw material, and the first engineering and mechanical science in the world, she would just do what they were endeavouring to induce the Government to accomplish. He hoped the House would not be led off the trail by the question “where the iron ships were to be constructed.” He inclined to think that the dockyards should be made efficient for repairing vessels, and that the hulls should be made by private firms, in the same way as marine engines. But that was not the question. The question in issue was whether these five ships were to be built of wood or iron. With regard to the delays of the contractors, the Government was certainly somewhat to blame; because, if the designs for the vessels had been furnished complete, and in the general form in which they were to be built, with the specifications properly drawn out and all the details, there never would have been that delay. Of course, the Government could not be greatly blamed for that, but it was ungenerous and unjust in Admiral Robinson to throw that reflection on the contractors. The Achilles, of which the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had often spoken as a proof of what the Government dockyards could do, had practically been as long, if not longer, than some of the other vessels. At the present moment they were better able to build iron vessels in the private yards than any other nation in the world, and the best proof of that was that there were now £3,000,000 worth of iron vessels being built by their private builders for foreign nations. In the latter part of the paper Admiral Robinson referred to the comparative cost, and on that part of the subject the whole question at issue resolved itself into a sum of £135,000, as the extra cost of the five vessels if built of iron. That sum was practically a bagatelle as compared with the enormous issue at stake in the navy of the future, and it would be most unwise economy if the House were to sanction an expedient which, though involving less immediate outlay, would in the end be far the most costly, simply for the sake of saving so small a sum.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he should have been content to give a silent vote in favour of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Sunderland had he not been appealed to so frequently on matters of fact in the course of the debate. The question at issue, as he understood it, was between iron frames and wooden frames, and the best evidence of the superiority of the former seemed to be given in the paper placed before them by the Admiralty. Admiral Robinson said that iron frames were most durable, most rigid, and had the most lasting qualities. Indeed, it was almost suggested that on that account they were least desirable, because changes would be made, and therefore it was better to have ships of perishing, rather than of durable, material. He could hardly suppose, however, that the House would agree with that. Since the great extension of the railway system, nothing had more clearly shown our engineering skill than the application of the tubular principle to bridges for crossing wide rivers and valleys. There was first the iron-framing to bear the weight, then the wooden sleeper to deaden the blow of the passing train, and then the iron rail to receive the blow. That was exactly the iron-ship—the iron-framing inside of all, the wooden backing, and the armour-plate, and it seemed to him just as reasonable to substitute wooden frames for iron as it would be to take down the tubular bridges and put up wooden scaffolding in their places. He agreed with the Admiralty that at present it was desirable that the ships should be coppered, and, though in the present state of science it was difficult to apply the copper directly to the iron, that was no reason why iron ships should not be coppered. Mr. Grantham, of Liverpool, had two ships at sea, which, by an ingenious arrangement of wooden sheathing, separating the copper from the iron, were very efficiently coppered. With regard to the splintering of shot, with respect to which an hon. Member had appealed to him, there was no doubt that a cast-iron shot passing through an iron plate would splinter into a thousand pieces, which the wooden frames would not arrest, and there was a much less chance of the splinters being carried through into the ship and causing greater destruction if there were an internal skin of iron. Another advantage of an internal skin of iron—which was, in fact, the ship proper—the wooden backing and the armour-plates being placed upon it—was that there would be a much smaller risk of the ship being set on fire by the penetration of shells, as the internal skin would exclude the air. Another point which he must notice was as to the test of iron, which some hon. Members thought was too exacting, as requiring a strain of twenty-two tons per square inch. The fact was that steel would bear a strain of forty tons, and the Committee over which he presided had recommended twenty-two tons as the very minimum which iron should bear. He agreed with the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) that the discussion had disclosed an additional reason for considering the construction of the Board of Admiralty. Whenever a question of difficulty arose, it was referred to the House or to a Committee, and the Admiralty was shown to be incompetent to deal with it. At present no individual was responsible for anything done at the Board. It seemed rather hard upon the Controller of the Navy that a document intended for the consideration of the Board should be thrown broadcast before the House, when he was not present to explain or defend it. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty had suggested that he was in a minority of naval officers who approved of iron ships, and that he was merely the mouthpiece of the Admiralty in defending wooden ships. It appeared, that whenever the Admiralty was in a difficulty, they appealed to the example of France; but there the Minister of Marine was responsible for everything. In England no one was responsible for anything, neither the First Lord nor the distinguished naval officers who assisted him, and who each bore an infinitesimal share of responsibility. He thought that the heads of the fourteen great Departments—namely, manning, discipline, construction, public works, pay, stores, victualling, ordnance, medicine, hydrography, marines, coast-guard, naval reserve, and transport, should each come to the front, and be personally responsible for whatever happened in his office. They ought to be non-political public servants, and hold their situations either dum bene gererint, or for a term of years; but there might of course be over them all a political Minister of Marine, who would go out with each change of Government.

SIR FRANCIS BARING:—Sir, I thought the question before us was that of iron ships or wooden ships, and not that of the construction of the Board of Admiralty. I shall not be tempted to follow the hon. and gallant Member (Sir John Hay) into the latter question; but, lest the House should have any misapprehension as to the opinion of the Committee which sat last year, I may say there was not a single person examined, who had been First Lord of the Admiralty, who did not say that he considered himself responsible for all that was done. As to the question really before us, I must say I do not look upon it in quite the same light as some hon. Gentlemen. If it be a question of scientific knowledge as to the best mode of building ships, I do not think I am competent to decide it. The Secretary of the Admiralty has told us that we have the opinion of the professional adviser of the Board, who is responsible for his advice, and in addition he tells us that a large majority of the officers whom he has consulted prefer wood to iron. He adds, that the professional advisers of the French Government have expressed the same opinion. We may be all wrong; but I am surprised, I confess, to hear a gallant Officer tell us that such opinions are absurd and not worthy of consideration. I admire the confidence with which he and other Gentlemen have stated their opinions; but the little weight they seem inclined to give to that of others does not increase my confidence in their judgment. Neither am I inclined to enter into the discussion between the contractors and the Controller of the Navy. I admit that there are words in that Report which I wish had not been there, and which may hurt the feelings of men who are as honourable and as intelligent as any other body of men, and as capable of doing the work they undertake. I believe there are good contractors, but I know also there are bad contractors. But at the commencement of our building iron ships it is not surprising that the Admiralty should change their plans, nor that contractors should find a difficulty in carrying them out. But the question before us seems to me to be, what the House will do with the Resolution. I am not prepared to give an opinion whether or not iron is better than wood at the present moment; much less am I prepared to say which will be the better material three years hence. When iron was first recommended for ship-building, I remember that the vessels constructed of it were supposed to be utter failures, and were so regarded by the French naval authorities as well as by the Admiralty in this country; and if the opinion of the House had then been taken, it would no doubt have been decided that no iron ships should ever be built. I only mention this to show that what may happen to-day may be quite reversed a few years afterwards. As to the statement of the Controller of the Navy, I am not sure that it is so ridiculous as hon. Gentlemen seem to suppose. The hon. Member (Sir Morton Peto) stated that these iron ships would last for fifty years. Now, if all your screw wooden ships and sailing vessels would last fifty years, I am afraid you would not find it a very economical arrangement in these times of change and improvement. But the question now is what are we going to vote. This Resolution does not say that we are to have a certain number of ships and that they are to be built of iron. The wording of it is that we are not to build ships of a particular description. Do those who are going to vote for the Resolution mean that they are prepared to vote for iron ships, or will its words cover those who wish to prevent the construction both of iron and of wooden ships? But suppose you bind yourselves to the employment of iron only. Is that wise? I should have thought that at this time, with the great improvements and changes which are taking place both in artillery and in ship-building, it would be well to leave the executive Government as free as possible, not tying their hands either one way or the other. It is not very prudent to bind yourselves at any time; but when all these changes are taking place—when you are calling upon the Government to follow the improvements of the day—is it wise to say, "There is one thing which you shall not do, and another thing which you shall do, and you shall be bound by this Resolution?" Without, therefore, expressing an opinion on the relative value of these two materials, I object strongly to bind the House of Commons and the Government. One question raised by the hon. Member (Mr. Beatinck) is worth considering—namely, who is to be responsible for the conduct of the navy—the Executive or the House of Commons? My impression is, that whatever form of Admiralty you have, they should be responsible both for the building of the navy and the whole business of the Department. I do not think it wise, unless for the strongest reasons, nor do I think it constitutional, for the House to take into its own hands the Government of the country, and to interfere with the responsibility of the Executive. At present, the First Lord is responsible. But suppose we should be wrong in the decision we now arrive at, who will be responsible then? Again, the Admiralty think that additional expense will be occasioned by adopting this Resolution. In that case it will of course be their duty to come down for an additional Vote. If they follow the decision of the House, they must ask the House to provide the money. Who becomes responsible for the expenditure? The Queen's Government do not ask for it, and are not responsible for it. They come down in obedience to the Vote of the House, and ask for money which they believe is not wanted for the service of the country. That is an extremely inconvenient course. I thought that one of the duties of the House of Commons was to check the Government in the expenditure, but the House of Commons seem to me to be going beyond their proper functions when they press the Government to increase the expenditure and to tax the country, when the Government is of opinion that no such expenditure is requisite.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON:—Sir, the noble Lord has most fairly redeemed the pledge he gave on a former evening, that this subject should be first of all explained by a statement on the part of the Admiralty, which we have all received and read, and then that an evening should be set apart to carry on the discussion, which the importance of the subject demands. And, whatever may be the result at which the House may arrive to-night, I hope that no hon. Member will vote except under a full sense that the decision he is about to give is one of extreme importance, both as regards the future efficiency of the navy, and as regards the finances of this country, so far as they depend upon our prospective naval expenditure. I quite agree with what has been just stated by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that of the Members of this House a great majority, and I freely confess that I am one of the number, would not venture to pronounce a decided opinion, upon their own part and from their own knowledge, as to the comparative advantages of these two modes of building. But, on the other hand, we are bound to give weight to evidence—we are bound to decide upon the weight of testimony before us; and since I have sat in this House I never heard so one-sided a debate as this. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down passed no opinion on the relative merits of wood and iron. The only other hon. Gentleman who has spoken otherwise than in support of the Motion, is the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), and he, too, carefully avoided the expression of any opinion upon this point. But then I entirely dissent from the notion that we are now called upon to decide any other question than the one fairly involved in the words of the Motion. It has been said, that this is a question whether you will build in Her Majesty's dockyards or in private yards. Again, the right hon. Gentleman has asked, whether the House is prepared to take out of the hands of the executive Government a matter of detail. I do not refuse to attach due importance to either of these considerations. I am not disposed to abandon Her Majesty's dockyards in order to build our ships in private yards, but I believe that he would not be a wise man who laid down for the future either course. I believe that we shall, in the management of our navy, have abundant work for Her Majesty's dockyards; and that, on the other hand, we should act most unwisely if we were to reject that assistance which we have derived, and may again derive, from the ability and the talent to be found in the private building establishments of this country. With regard to the other objection of taking out of the hands of the executive Government a matter of detail, I am not disposed to underrate its importance, but I submit to the House, that this is an objection which you may push too far. The House of Commons has an important duty to discharge, and I deny that this is a question of detail. I say it is a question of principle. It is a most important question, affecting the future welfare of the navy, and I entirely agree with the hon. Baronet (Sir Morton Peto), who said that we ought to approach the subject solely with reference to its merits, and without considering whether the Resolution comes from one party or the other, or whether it affects one Board of Admiralty or another, but that we are bound to discharge our duty, to the best of our judgment, upon the evidence before us. The right hon. Baronet has just told us that we should give weight to the opinions of the officers of the executive Government, and in particular that the opinion of the Controller of the Navy is in favour of the course taken by the Admiralty. Now, is that true? I have no means of knowing Admiral Robinson's views, except by the paper before me; but I say that this paper does not bear out the intention of the Board of Admiralty. If Admiral Robinson be in favour of the views of the Admiralty, certainly this paper does not inform us of that fact. On the contrary, I think it can readily be shown from it, that the Admiralty have made a serious mistake in the decision which has given rise to this discussion. What was the argument of the noble Lord at the head of the Government the other night? He justified the decision of the Admiralty on two grounds. He said that which has been repeated this evening by my noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty—namely, that the Government are desirous of, as soon as possible, completing a number of armed ships. I think that question has been raised unnecessarily. There is no man in this House who has urged the Government more than I have to lose no time in building those ships; and the feeling of the House is in favour of such a course. Then the noble Viscount said, there were two reasons for following the plan laid down by the Admiralty—the one time, the other money. I presume that when we have an official paper before us proceeding from the Controller of the Navy, we are to regard it as the production of the first authority within his own Department. What does he say on the question of time?—

“To build the wooden ship leisurely and to the best advantage would take about as long; but if as much pressed as the contractors have been for the Hector, and if the workmen were entirely uninterrupted, the period might be shortened to twenty-one months.

With this statement before me, I confess it was with no little astonishment I heard my noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty say that the wooden ships might be built in twelve months.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: What I said was, that after the ships were cut out, if energy were applied they could be built in twelve months.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: We do not want "ifs" and conditions in this matter. We want a plain and unconditional statement. I beg the House to bear in mind that we have got a plain statement that the building of an iron ship is solely a question of time. The building of a wooden ship is not a question of time. Nothing is so dangerous as hurrying a wooden ship. What danger proceeds from hurrying it? Rapid decay. When my noble Friend committed himself, as I think most incautiously, about the twelve months, if we took him at his word he would find himself very much in the position of the contractors referred to in this paper, who could not finish the work in time, and who, if they could, would do a very foolish thing if they did finish it, because they would build a ship which would decay. Assuming I am right in my view, that the Controller of the Navy is the first authority on this matter of time, I say the noble Viscount's argument founded on time is gone, and a wooden ship has no advantage in point of time over an iron one. Then what becomes of his next argument, that there is an advantage in money? I hope the House of Commons will agree with me that the weakest and worst view we could take of the question is, that it is one of money. Do not build the cheapest vessel if it is not the best. Whatever money you are going to expend let it be for the best article, and let the country have the advantage of it. In the body of the paper I find a statement of the comparative cost of the Valiant, as compared with that of a wooden ship. The former is stated at £206,000, and the latter at £187,000, which shows a saving of about £19,000 in favour of the wooden ship, in favour of the worst of two things, for the House must remember that. But I must observe, that on looking at the schedule attached to this statement, I find that though the Hector and the Valiant are ships of precisely the same tonnage (4,063 tons), with the same number of guns (32), and the same horse power (800), the cost of the former is £172,677, while that of the latter is £206,000 or rather £207,212. Why is the most costly iron ship selected for comparison with the wooden one in the body of the paper? If the least costly iron ship had been selected, the advantage of money as well as that of time would be in favour of the iron vessel. The noble Lord, then, has given us two reasons in favour of iron and both are equally unsound. I now come to the question, what is the authority upon which we are to act? I do not ask hon. Members to act upon their own judgment in matters of this kind, but I must say I have great confidence in the opinion of the Controller of the Navy, and on the question of durability, we have this statement of the Controller—

"An iron ship has much greater durability in certain parts of the structure, indeed in all parts where no wood is in contact with the iron, than a wooden ship; and after a lapse of years the iron frame would have suffered next to nothing as compared with a wooden ship."

I appeal to the common sense of hon. Members whether this paragraph is not conclusive against the wooden ships. As to the splinter argument, I think the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield has disposed of it. Next comes the objection founded on an iron ship getting upon a rock. My first answer to it is, that Her Majesty's ships had much better keep off rocks; but if she gets on a rock, is there no danger to a wooden ship? I speak in the presence of naval men when I say I believe the danger is much greater to a wooden ship in such a case. I am reminded of the unhappy case of the Conqueror, which is an illustration of what I say. She was a wooden ship. The bottom of a wooden ship is no doubt stronger than that of an iron ship, but then the wooden ship has not the advantage of water-tight compartments, but I think no great weight can be attached to the rock argument. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty has reminded us that we are in a transition state, and that we cannot tell what inventions we may have within two years. That is true, but it is equally applicable to one side of the question as well as to the other. You are going to lay down five men-of-war, and before you lay them down you must decide what they are to be. The only remaining argument I think it necessary to touch, is that founded on the alleged success of the French armour-covered wooden ships. I confess I read that portion of the Controller's statement with surprise; because it does not agree with what I have heard generally stated in private conversations. I have heard again and again that the celebrated ship La Gloire, which as yet has only been backwards and forwards between Toulon and Algiers, was so strained while cruising in the Mediterranean, in consequence of the weight of her armour on a wooden structure, as to make it a grave question with the French whether they should not give up wood and take to iron. My impression with regard to the Normandie, the Magenta, and Solférino is that they have not yet had a fair trial. I believe that none of them have had a trial which could be compared with that which the Warrior had a year ago in the Bay of Biscay, where never a ship of war went through a severer test, nor came into harbour in a better condition after such a trial. But wooden ships, in consequence of the enormous weight of their engines, which the House will remember must be irrespective of the weight of armour-plating, are obliged to go into dock to be repaired after they have been exposed to heavy weather. I cannot sit down without referring for a moment to that portion of the Parliamentary paper on this subject which throws a most harsh, and, as I think, a most unjust stigma on the shipbuilders of this country, many of whom have made contracts for building ships for the Royal Navy. I cannot understand how the Board of Admiralty can have allowed themselves to place upon the table of this House a reflection upon men of high character and standing so severe and so utterly unmerited as I believe this to be. No exceptions are made. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird) has alluded to this subject in most just terms, and what must be the feelings of those able and accomplished men his sons, who are an ornament to their profession, when they find themselves included in the category of shipbuilders who are guilty of slovenly work and of using dishonest materials? What must be the feelings of that venerable and accomplished man, Mr. Napier, of Glasgow, whom I feel proud to call my friend, when he finds himself accused also of slovenly work and dishonest materials? Another house in this town, the Thames Iron Company, constructed the Warrior; Mr. Napier, of Glasgow, built the Black Prince, and what right has any Department to come down to this House, and, in order to bolster up a bad case, to stigmatize in this manner men of the highest possible character and standing? I very deeply regret the course which has been taken in this matter, and I know of nothing to justify it. In dealing with private firms you may be liable to treatment to which exception may justly be taken. But to stigmatize a whole class, and that class embracing some of the most accomplished men in the country, is a matter which I think the Board of Admiralty will regret, and which I have read with pain and sorrow. Sir, I will not detain the House, for this question lies in a narrow compass. I, for one, do not desire to take any course which would involve any undue interference with the Executive; but we have to decide to-night a matter of grave importance to the country; and if the hon. Member for Sunderland presses his Motion to a division, undoubtedly I shall find it my duty to vote with him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I concur with the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down on two points—namely, first, that this is a most important question, and next, that the House ought to confine itself to the words of the Motion of my hon. Friend. Therefore, I abstain from entering into that field which was opened to our view by other Members—namely, an intimation that my hon. Friend ought to have included in his Motion the reconstruction of the Board of Admiralty. Whether that meant that the Board of Admiralty ought, like our ships, in his opinion, to be constructed by contract, and made of iron, I will not inquire. I believe that my hon. Friend, on the other hand, instead of wishing that the Board should be made of more hard and more stern material, would rather wish them made softer and more plastic, and more liable to be moulded according to his opinion. But the right hon. Gentleman said that the debate hitherto has been one-sided. Well, in some degree I concur in that opinion, because I think that many of those who have spoken have taken a very one-sided view of the question. It is very natural that Gentlemen who by their daily experience know the advantages and facilities which the contractors have, and who also are in the habit of moulding iron to their will, should think that everything ought to be made of iron. It is the old story—that everything should be of leather. They say that iron is the only material. Well, but I think the whole of this discussion has turned on a misconception as to what has been and what is intended to be the course of the Admiralty. Any one who had come into this House and had heard this debate without knowing what the Admiralty has done would have imagined, that whereas the Admiralty has pertinaciously persisted in building nothing but wooden ships, and whereas it has been shown in this House by recent experience that iron is the preferable material, this House has a right to interpose and arrest the Admiralty in its vicious course, and to tell it to build no more wooden ships, but to have recourse to iron. But what is the fact? Is it true that the Admiralty have set their faces against building iron ships, that they have set their faces against building ships by contract, and that they have done nothing but build wooden ships, and in Government dockyards? Why, quite the contrary. Out of twenty-one iron-clad ships that are built and building eleven are of iron entirely, of which ten were built by contractors. Therefore, I say there is no ground for assuming that the Admiralty are indisposed either to build iron ships or to build those iron ships by means of private trade and contract. The Achilles is the only one of those iron ships built in a Government dockyard. The question then is, we having eleven iron ships actually afloat, and five more of wood cased with iron that are constructing, making sixteen in all, the French—for it is no use disguising the state of the matter—having built, or being now engaged in building twenty-seven, whether the Admiralty are right or wrong in proposing to add five to the sixteen that are now building, and thus giving us within one, and only one, of the number the French now have. [LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The French will have thirty-one.] We do not wish to overstate the question. Now, Sir, a great deal has been said with regard to the relative merits of wooden and iron ships; and I think that whereas some hon. Members take exception to the statement of my noble Friend, that if the Admiralty were to-morrow to issue a contract for an iron ship, they would be at a loss to know what particular thing they desired to have, I agree with my noble Friend, and think, that if this House, according to the debate this evening, were to order these five ships to be made entirely of iron, the person to whom the order would be given would be very much at a loss to know what sort of ship it was intended he should make; for a great variety of opinions have been stated by

hon. Members who have spoken as to what is the best kind of ship. My hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) says that only yesterday he obtained information tending to show that wooden ships cased with iron and sheathed with copper are not likely to answer the purpose. Another hon. Member thinks that iron is likely to be superseded by steel. Another hon. Gentleman has said that different methods are every day invented for the preparation of iron. So that really, if you had to order an iron ship, it would be very difficult to determine what sort of a ship would be best for the purpose two years hence. Now, there is one objection that no one denies as applied to iron ships, and that is the fouling of the bottom. My noble Friend has stated, on the authority of Captain Cochrane, that the Warrior loses a knot every six weeks she is afloat by fouling. Now, those Gentlemen who have taken that which the right hon. Baronet calls a one-sided view of the question, and who are all for iron, have founded their argument very much on the analogy between packet and merchant ships and men-of-war, totally forgetting the immense difference between packet ships and mercantile ships, and ships intended for the purposes of war. If a merchantman that goes from London to China, to the West Indies, or to the Cape of Good Hope, gets her bottom fouled, and loses a portion of her speed, and, what is a material thing, some part of the power of steerage, what is the consequence? A delay in her voyage. She may arrive some days or weeks later than she ought to do. The steerage being merely to keep her in a straight course, it does not very much matter, except she is taken in a storm or finds herself in any difficulty, whether she steers less well or perfectly. But in regard to ships of war, speed and steerage, may be of the utmost possible consequence—in an action everything may depend upon them. A battle may be lost from some defect in them, and no man can tell the disastrous results to a country of the loss of a naval engagement. Now, it is perfectly clear that iron ships require repeated cleansing of their bottoms from incrustations and marine growths; and as a great part of the service of the navy is performed in distant places, where your ships are required to remain for two or three years without coming home, an iron ship is not fit, in the present condition of things, for such a service. You could not, in the present condition of things, send the Warrior, or a ship of the same kind, to a distant foreign station, for they would have to go into dock, and when their services were wanted they would be getting their bottoms cleansed from the incrustations. But would your wooden ships be less effective as men-of-war than the ships of the nations which they might have to encounter? All the French iron-clads, except one, the Couronne, are built of wood. It is said that La Gloire has been strained. I believe that is a mistake. As far as we know, La Gloire has not been strained, and is in perfect condition. Hon. Gentlemen seem to imagine that a wooden ship coated with iron is the same as a wooden ship not so coated. A ship coated with iron is strengthened in every possible way. She has an iron deck, iron beams, and she is strengthened internally with iron which renders her stronger and stiffer than a wooden ship usually is. Therefore, when the right hon. Baronet says a wooden ship must be strained by the weight of her armour plates, that is perfectly true, but that does not apply to a wooden ship prepared to receive iron armour, because that ship is strengthened in a different manner. My noble Friend has stated that a great number of naval officers say they should very much prefer having the command of a wooden ship armour-plated rather than of an iron ship plated in the same way. Opinions are very much divided upon the matter. Well, then, that being so, what do the Admiralty intend to do? Why, in the course of this summer there will be a mode of testing by experiment the qualities of the Royal Oak, a ship built of wood, but strengthened with iron, as compared with those of the Hector, a ship of the same size, but built entirely of iron, and the result of that experiment will instruct the Admiralty as to the course to be pursued with respect to the number of ships necessary to be built. But my hon. Friend, instead of leaving to the Admiralty to determine, as is their proper function, what is best for the public service, calls upon the House to rush in by a hasty decision, bind up the hands of the Government, and take from them that responsibility which belongs exclusively to them. This House, by deciding upon a question of ship-building, will assume to itself a function which, with all due deference, I contend it is incompetent to perform; and if the result were to be that by yielding to the wishes of the House the Government were turned away from that course which they are disposed to pursue, and if the time should come when we were without the number and class of ships which we ought to have, in order to be on an equality with other Powers, it would be all very well for the Government to say, "The House of Commons are answerable." The House would reply, "You ought not to have submitted to a wrong decision of the House; you are answerable, and we shall wreak upon you that resentment which the nation ought properly to feel against an Executive that has not done its duty." Well, then, I do entreat the House not to consent to a course which I quite agree with the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) would be most unwise. There are certain functions which belong to a deliberative assembly, and others which belong to an Executive; and although a deliberative assembly may usurp the function of an Executive, it acts unwisely in doing so. The responsibility ought to rest upon the Executive, and the House ought to judge, by the acts of the Government, whether they have properly or improperly performed their duty. All that we want is that our hands should be left untied, in order that we may build the best navy which, from time to time, may be possible. The experience of every month may lead to a considerable modification of preconceived notions, but errors hastily committed cannot be hastily repaired. When an hon. Gentleman remarked that iron ships would last thirty or forty years my hon. Friend behind me said, "Well, Heaven forbid! because long before that we may find them superseded by other inventions better adapted to the service." Even now we have several kinds of iron-clad ships proposed—the broad-sided, the turreted, the square-towered, and what are called sinking ships—that is, ships which are to be filled with water so as to expose very little surface to the fire of an enemy; but the question of the rival merits of all these is to be solved by experiment. Only one thing is well ascertained—namely, that in power of resistance a ship with iron plating and a thick wooden side behind the iron is equal to the Warrior. Therefore, whether wooden ships plated with iron are to be regarded simply as ships for sea-going purposes or for purposes of action, they are capable, on the one hand, of maintaining their position in any part of the world

just as much as any other wooden ship is, and, on the other hand, they are as well able to resist shot as an iron ship would be. Therefore, when the right hon. Baronet says that the papers on the table show that we would gain neither in time nor in money by building wooden iron-plated ships, I must beg to differ from him; because if the preparations which may be made in the dockyards with very little expense be carried out, a wooden iron-plated ship can be put together in a twelvemonth, whereas an iron ship would take two years and a half. No doubt the difference of expense is not very material, but it is something, and I did not expect that from that quarter of the House (below the gangway, on the Ministerial side) we should have urged upon us an arrangement which, not only in point of time, but also of money, would involve a greater expenditure. Therefore, I do hope and trust the House will leave to the Government that proper discretion which belongs to them in regard to the defence of the country; that it will not prescribe any one particular course; but that as the Government is responsible to the House for the conduct of its departmental arrangements, it will leave them free to act upon the best information which they can obtain as to which class of vessels may be best suited to the wants of the country.

Mr. HENLEY said, the noble Lord had placed the question in a somewhat different position from what it occupied before. He said, "Leave the Government to do whichever of two things they think best." But that was not the issue before the House. The matter had been suffered to lie over for consideration from the Naval Estimates. Was it fair, then, for the noble Lord to place the House in its present position? The Government made a definite statement at the time the Naval Estimates were before the House, and they agreed that the consideration of that statement was to stand over. They placed printed evidence upon the table to sustain their statement, and now did they take their stand upon that issue? No such thing; for the noble Lord said, "Leave the Government to do whichever of two things they think best." The noble Lord stated that the French were beforehand with us, that we could not stand still, that we must have five ships, and still we should be behind. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said, "We must progress." How were they to progress? The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said, that it was all matter of experiment whether there should be broadside ships, turret ships, or other ships, and that it would not be right to keep behind the French while these experiments were being made. The paper presented to the House stated that iron ships and wooden ships took equal time in building; and the noble Lord said, that if wooden ships were put up in frame, it would only take twelve months to finish them. But how long would it take to put them up in frame? and were the frames to be put up so as to answer for this purpose or for that, and then to be pulled to pieces? for the Admiralty had acted in such a way before. He thought that the Government had no right to bring such a question before the House; but as that had been done, and as documentary evidence had been placed on the table, the House could not help considering it. The paper on the table of the House afforded a strong illustration of the wisdom of the saying, attributed to a distinguished Judge, "Give your judgment, but do not give your reasons." The paper from beginning to end was a distinct contradiction of the very conclusion which the person who wrote it had drawn. With regard to the question of expense, he was of opinion that that expense was the least which procured the best and most durable article. It was evident that the noble Lord at the head of the Government was in favour of iron rather than wooden ships, and the reasons in the paper drawn up by the Controller of the Navy led to the same conclusion; but the Controller ended by saying that, as iron ships could not be built in the dockyards, it would be better for the present to have wooden ships, which were worse articles. With great difficulty he had come to the conclusion to vote in favour of the Resolution moved by the hon. Member; and he could not have done so until he had read the paper of the Controller of the Navy and heard the speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said, that the Controller of the Navy never intended to throw any reflection on the contractors for iron ships; but if the paper signed by the Controller was meant to be a friendly salute, he must say, "God bless the contractors if ever that gallant Admiral fired a broadside upon them." What faith could the House put in any part of that document when the Secretary to the Admiralty came down and explained away a portion of it? If the writer did not intend to say what he had said, the statement was not worth the paper on which it was written. He regretted that such a paper should have been put forth, and agreed with the right hon. Member for Droitwich in thinking that no public man had a right to cast those reflections on any set of individuals. He was sorry that the question had come before the House in the shape it had. It was not right for the Government to hold over a question of this sort; then put reasons before the House for what they were doing, and finally tell the House, as the noble Lord had done, not to tie the hands of the Government, but leave them at liberty to do anything else but what they had proposed to do.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he thought it would be most unwise for the House to take on itself to decide a scientific question, and say that iron ships for warlike purposes were preferable to wooden, especially when they had been told that a preponderance of naval authority was in favour of armour-clad wooden ships. They were told by the Controller of the Navy, and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, that at present there existed no available means for building an iron armour-clad navy in the dockyards, and that for such a fleet the country must have recourse to private yards. It was not his intention to question the integrity of the owners of private yards, for he was acquainted with some of them, and he knew that nothing could be higher than the character they bore; but he asked whether the House was prepared to hand over the building of the most important portion of our navy to private yards? Were all the ships, on which the safety of the country must depend, to be built by contract in private yards? Experience taught them to take the very opposite course. At the time of the Crimean war the country was dependent for small arms on private contractors, but experience soon showed that it was necessary for the Government to create an establishment of their own for the manufacture of those arms, for the purpose of control in dealing with the contractors for a portion of the supply. He conceived that it would be a most unwise and imprudent course to hand over the whole of the ship-building of the most important branch of the navy to contractors, at whose mercy the country would then entirely

The House divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 81: Majority 73.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 30.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, which proposed to establish a system of registration for Ireland similar to that established for England in 1836 and for Scotland in 1854. The Bill differed, however, in one important particular from

just as much as any other wooden ship is, and, on the other hand, they are as well able to resist shot as an iron ship would be. Therefore, when the right hon. Baronet says that the papers on the table show that we would gain neither in time nor in money by building wooden iron-plated ships, I must beg to differ from him; because if the preparations which may be made in the dockyards with very little expense be carried out, a wooden iron-plated ship can be put together in a twelvemonth, whereas an iron ship would take two years and a half. No doubt the difference of expense is not very material, but it is something, and I did not expect that from that quarter of the House (below the gangway, on the Ministerial side) we should have urged upon us an arrangement which, not only in point of time, but also of money, would involve a greater expenditure. Therefore, I do hope and trust the House will leave to the Government that proper discretion which belongs to them in regard to the defence of the country; that it will not prescribe any one particular course; but that as the Government is responsible to the House for the conduct of its departmental arrangements, it will leave them free to act upon the best information which they can obtain as to which class of vessels may be best suited to the wants of the country.

MR. HENLEY said, the noble Lord had placed the question in a somewhat different position from what it occupied before. He said, "Leave the Government to do whichever of two things they think best." But that was not the issue before the House. The matter had been suffered to lie over for consideration from the Naval Estimates. Was it fair, then, for the noble Lord to place the House in its present position? The Government made a definite statement at the time the Naval Estimates were before the House, and they agreed that the consideration of that statement was to stand over. They placed printed evidence upon the table to sustain their statement, and now did they take their stand upon that issue? No such thing; for the noble Lord said, "Leave the Government to do whichever of two things they think best." The noble Lord stated that the French were beforehand with us, that we could not stand still, that we must have five ships, and still we should be behind. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said, "We must progress." How were they to progress? The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said, that it was all matter of experiment whether there should be broadside ships, turret ships, or other ships, and that it would not be right to keep behind the French while these experiments were being made. The paper presented to the House stated that iron ships and wooden ships took equal time in building; and the noble Lord said, that if wooden ships were put up in frame, it would only take twelve months to finish them. But how long would it take to put them up in frame? and were the frames to be put up so as to answer for this purpose or for that, and then to be pulled to pieces? for the Admiralty had acted in such a way before. He thought that the Government had no right to bring such a question before the House; but as that had been done, and as documentary evidence had been placed on the table, the House could not help considering it. The paper on the table of the House afforded a strong illustration of the wisdom of the saying, attributed to a distinguished Judge, "Give your judgment, but do not give your reasons." The paper from beginning to end was a distinct contradiction of the very conclusion which the person who wrote it had drawn. With regard to the question of expense, he was of opinion that that expense was the least which procured the best and most durable article. It was evident that the noble Lord at the head of the Government was in favour of iron rather than wooden ships, and the reasons in the paper drawn up by the Controller of the Navy led to the same conclusion; but the Controller ended by saying that, as iron ships could not be built in the dockyards, it would be better for the present to have wooden ships, which were worse articles. With great difficulty he had come to the conclusion to vote in favour of the Resolution moved by the hon. Member; and he could not have done so until he had read the paper of the Controller of the Navy and heard the speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said, that the Controller of the Navy never intended to throw any reflection on the contractors for iron ships; but if the paper signed by the Controller was meant to be a friendly salute, he must say, "God bless the contractors if ever that gallant Admiral fired a broadside upon them." What faith could the House put in any part of that document when the Secretary to the

Admiralty came down and explained away a portion of it? If the writer did not intend to say what he had said, the statement was not worth the paper on which it was written. He regretted that such a paper should have been put forth, and agreed with the right hon. Member for Droitwich in thinking that no public man had a right to cast those reflections on any set of individuals. He was sorry that the question had come before the House in the shape it had. It was not right for the Government to hold over a question of this sort; then put reasons before the House for what they were doing, and finally tell the House, as the noble Lord had done, not to tie the hands of the Government, but leave them at liberty to do anything else but what they had proposed to do.

MR E. P. BOUVERIE said, he thought it would be most unwise for the House to take on itself to decide a scientific question, and say that iron ships for warlike purposes were preferable to wooden, especially when they had been told that a preponderance of naval authority was in favour of armour-clad wooden ships. They were told by the Controller of the Navy, and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, that at present there existed no available means for building an iron armour-clad navy in the dockyards, and that for such a fleet the country must have recourse to private yards. It was not his intention to question the integrity of the owners of private yards, for he was acquainted with some of them, and he knew that nothing could be higher than the character they bore; but he asked whether the House was prepared to hand over the building of the most important portion of our navy to private yards? Were all the ships, on which the safety of the country must depend, to be built by contract in private yards? Experience taught them to take the very opposite course. At the time of the Crimean war the country was dependent for small arms on private contractors, but experience soon showed that it was necessary for the Government to create an establishment of their own for the manufacture of those arms, for the purpose of control in dealing with the contractors for a portion of the supply. He conceived that it would be a most unwise and imprudent course to hand over the whole of the ship-building of the most important branch of the navy to contractors, at whose mercy the country would then entirely be, should circumstances of the greatest pressure arise.

The House divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 81: Majority 73.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

INCLOSURE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bruce, Bill to authorise the Inclosure of certain Lands in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRUCE and Sir GEORGE GREY.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 58.]

TRUSTEES (SCOTLAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to explain the Act for the amendment of the Law relative to Gratuitous Trustees in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Sir WILLIAM DUNBAR.

House adjourned at a quarter after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 1, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Salmon Exportation (Commons) (No. 39).
Second Reading—Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland) (No. 30); Malt Duty (No. 38).
Committee—Drainage of Land (Ireland) (No. 33).

SALMON EXPORTATION BILL.

Brought from the Commons, and read 1° (The Lord Stanley of Alderley). (No. 39).

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 30.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, which proposed to establish a system of registration for Ireland similar to that established for England in 1836 and for Scotland in 1854. The Bill differed, however, in one important particular from both these Acts, inasmuch as it made no provision for a registration of marriages. The Roman Catholic priests in Ireland were forbidden by law to celebrate mixed marriages; and they were so averse to any measure for the registration of marriages that legislation to that end had been found to be impracticable. He hoped, however, that the time was not far distant when the marriage law of the three countries would be revised, amended, and consolidated, and then the difficulty would probably be overcome. It was proposed that the medical officers of the Poor Law unions should be the registrars, with power, in case of their refusal to act, for the guardians to make appointments of other properly qualified persons. The Bill passed with very little opposition in the House of Commons, and he trusted that it would receive the sanction of their Lordships.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would not oppose the second reading, though he considered that some better provision was required to meet the event of the refusal of the medical men to undertake the duties of registrars. With regard to the marriage law of Ireland, he thought that it required amendment, and trusted that it would have the serious attention of the Government. As to the registration, the Government, whilst it acted with judgment, must act with firmness and with a desire to consider the views of all sects.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

ECCLESIASTICAL PATRONAGE OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY having appealed to the Lord Chancellor to postpone his notice respecting the Ecclesiastical Patronage of the Lord Chancellor,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in the absence of several noble Lords and right rev. Prelates, for whose opinions he entertained the highest respect, he had no hesitation in acceding to the request of the noble Earl. He must express a hope that when the measure, of which he had given notice, was introduced, it would be pressed forward in that House with as much rapidity as was consistent with the gravity of the subject, in order that it might go down to the other House before the Session was too far advanced.

The Earl of St. Germans

He should call attention to the subject on Tuesday next, and in the mean time the Bill would be printed and placed in the hands of their Lordships.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Six o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

CAPE GERMAN SETTLERS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, if the two Letters dated 18th December, 1861, from Sir Benjamin Hawes to the Lords of the Treasury, and the Answer of the Lords of the Treasury, dated March 10th 1862, are the whole Correspondence, according to the Order of the House for a "Copy of the Correspondence between the War Office, the Treasury, and the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, relating to any payment made to the Cape German Settlers during the financial year 1860-1;" and, if the whole Correspondence has not been given, whether there is any objection to place it upon the table of the House.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that all the material correspondence had already been given, but there was one other letter which could be produced without any inconvenience, but he did not think it was material. He had, however, no objection to lay that letter on the table.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know, whether that letter will make up the whole correspondence?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, all the material correspondence. There was a correspondence on the general subject as to German Settlers at the Cape, but it did not refer to this particular point.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he wished to know if the right hon. Baronet will have any objection to lay the whole correspondence before the House?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the correspondence took place under the administration of the Earl of Derby. He had not examined it in detail, but he understood that a difference of opinion existed between the War Office and the Treasury as to the payment of the expenses. A good deal was said last Session as to the production of a correspondence which would, if produced, show a difference of opinion between the Treasury and the Admiralty. The correspondence in question would also show a difference of opinion between two Departments of the Government; and under those circumstances, unless the House pressed for it, he should object to lay it on the table.

CLAIMS UPON OUDE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown have been obtained by him upon the claims of the representative of the late Captain R. Frith, or of any other of the claimants upon the late State of Oude; and, if so, whether he has any objection that Copies of such opinions be laid upon the table of the House?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, his hon. Friend must be aware that it was contrary to all practice to lay upon the table the opinions of the Law Officers upon any point upon which they had been consulted by the Government. He could say, however, that the decision which he had arrived at and the steps which he had taken, as he had already announced to the House, were in conformity with the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown.

FUSTIAN-CUTTING OPERATIVES. QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any official inquiry has been made into the present state of the Operatives of Lancashire and Cheshire employed in the business of Fustian Cutting; and, if so, whether it is his intention to lay the Report of the inquiry upon the table of the House?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the only official inquiry which had been made was one instituted by the Assistant Commissioner, who was employed by the Commission which was appointed some time ago to inquire into the employment of women and children in manufactures not regulated by law. The Assistant Commissioner had made his inquiry, but no Report had as yet been presented to the Government. He understood, however, that it would be presented in a short time.

DELHI PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

MR. M'EVOY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Why the second instalment of the Delhi Prize Money has not been paid to the troops engaged in that service, and when they may expect payment?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that this matter had caused a great deal of anxiety to the Indian Government; and in order to meet the wishes and natural expectations of claimants, a distribution to a considerable amount was ordered as early as it was possible to make it. It was perfectly well known, however, at the time, that certain claims had not been presented, and might afterwards be made, and therefore a certain percentage of the prize money was kept back to meet those contingencies. Many claims had since been preferred, but were not decided, and a second distribution could not be made until the authorities were satisfied that the whole of the claims had been sent in. It was impossible for him to say either that there would be a further distribution to those who had already received a portion, or when any distribution might take place.

MR. M'EVOY said, he wished to ask if the right hon. Baronet could say how long he intends waiting for the further claims.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that it was impossible for him to fix any time. He could not say whether there would be any funds for a second distribution after the additional claims had been met. He wished to guard himself against holding out any expectation that it was certain there would be any further distribution.

THE ARMSTRONG AND WHITWORTH GUNS.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, before the Committee which he stated on Monday last had been appointed to consider the respective merits of the Armstrong and Whitworth Guns, the latter are to be tried against the Service, Field, and Garrison Guns of Sir William Armstrong's pattern, or against others of an altered construction?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, that no restrictions had been placed either upon Sir William Armstrong or Mr. Whitworth with respect to the guns to be employed in the experiments.

DISEASE IN ROTHERHAM.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, much alarm had been excited in the neighbouring towns in consequence of the malignant species of fever which had broken out at Rotherham. He wished, therefore, to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the alarming extent of mortality and disease in the town of Rotherham, arising from the state of the drainage and the imperfect supply of water; and whether Government will take measures to enforce a remedy thereof?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, the attention of the Privy Council was called last year to the sanitary state of Rotherham, and the great mortality which prevailed there; and that Department of the Privy Council which was invested by law with the power of making sanitary inquiries sent down two inspectors to investigate the matter. The inspectors had made a Report, and his hon. Friend might have it by moving for it. The cause of the disease had been traced to the bad quality of the water in the place; but he was informed that the Local Board had a Bill before Parliament at the present time with a view to procure a supply of better water.

OFFICERS OF THE COURT OF PROBATE. QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is his intention to extend the usual Civil Service system of Superannuation and Classification to the Officers and Clerks of the Principal Registry of the Court of Probate; and, if so, when the necessary arrangements will be completed?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the duties of the Clerks of the Court of Probate were somewhat peculiar. However, it had been thought better to appoint Clerks with specified duties on fixed salaries. He was not aware that the Treasury would have any objection to their classification. With respect to superannuation, he believed it was settled by the Civil Service Commissioners and the Judges of the Court of Probate that the Clerks should be examined, and upon passing the examination that they should receive their Civil Service Certificates. Then, upon complying with the other conditions of superannuation, they were to be entitled to a pension in the usual manner.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE METROPOLITAN AND CITY POLICE.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR DE LACY EVANS rose to bring under the consideration of the House the question of the expediency of amalgamating the Metropolitan and City Police, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whether, after what had occurred in connection with the Procession on Saturday last, some steps ought not to be taken to place the aggregate body under one control, so as to have one police force for the whole Metropolis? In order to prove the necessity for that measure, it would be requisite to show that one of the two corps was comparatively inefficient. He knew that Gentlemen connected with the City authorities maintained that the superiority of the City force was quite decided; and if that were made out, of course no case for extending the organization of the Metropolitan Police to the City could be established. It was generally admitted that the Procession on Saturday last was very much interrupted in the City, and that there was a state of things such as to give cause for alarm to the Prince and Princess in some portion of their route. It was said, indeed, that some persons among the crowd had climbed into the Royal carriages. It would have been a very sad affair if anything of a disastrous nature had happened to the illustrious pair on that occasion. The Corporation, according to their generous habit, had, it appeared from the public press, a déjeuner à la fourchette at the Mansion House on the occasion, and it was alleged that this circumstance had the effect of interfering with the proceedings. He could not say how that might be, but during the time when the Procession was passing through the City great inconvenience was occasioned to the public. There had appeared in the newspapers a controversy between an officer of the City Police and an officer of the City Volunteers, each casting blame on the other; but of course it was far beyond his power to say which was right or which was wrong; he, however, concurred with the noble Lord near him (Lord Elcho) that the Volunteers were not a body well adapted to be employed on such occasions. Then came the deplorable events which happened on the illumination night, when a vast concourse of people was assembled in the streets. In a report from the Metropolitan Police it was stated, that in the area under their supervision not one life had been lost, nor had any accident of a serious character occurred on either occasion to which he had just alluded; while, on the other hand, there was little or no doubt that as many as eight lives had been lost in the City on the night of the illuminations, and that some serious accidents had taken place besides. Under these circumstances, the case looked rather unfavourable for the City Police. His object was to induce the Government to make inquiries as to which of the two bodies of police was the more efficient, and then to effect an amalgamation of the two forces. He had no doubt, and, he believed, the public had no doubt, which was the more efficient body of the two, and therefore he thought that the Metropolitan Police should be extended to the City. No doubt the City had privileges, which were entitled to all due respect; but, if it were contended that the City had, at least, the same right as provincial municipalities to the regulation of their own police, he asked whether any provincial town could be compared with the metropolis, which contained an immense population, and received a vast increase to it every year? He, consequently, put it to the Government to consider the question of the expediency of amalgamating the Metropolitan and City of London Police Establishments.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman ROSE) said, that the subject brought under the notice of the House involved a much larger question than the fusion of these two civil forces—a question which had already been much under the attention of the public. There were a number of noticeable coincidences connected with the matter alluded to by the hon. and gallant General. In the first place, the Commissioner of Police of the City of London unfortunately died a week before this great procession took place, and before the arrangements were completely organized. In the next place, the whole of the pressure of this extraordinary loyal demonstration was thrown on the City Police, and on them only, within the boundaries of the City. Another very extraordinary coincidence was that, during the progress of the procession through the City, another procession of large unwieldy vans containing Metropolitan Police was thrown into the City in an opposite direction. This caused a great obstruction, which some hon. Members now present experienced, having been detained through it for the duration of about an hour. It seemed to him a very odd coincidence that all these events should have happened at this particular conjuncture, and that the culminating point should be that the City of London ought to be deprived of the regulation of its Police. He had some experience of the City Police; and as he had attended at the Central Criminal Court as one of Her Majesty's Commissioners, he also knew that the expressed opinion of the Judges with regard to the intelligence, activity, and reliability of the City Police, as compared with the Metropolitan Police, was very much to the advantage of the former. With regard to what occurred on Saturday last, the newspapers had said that the City authorities refused the assistance of the troops and of the Metropolitan Police. That was not true. The noble Lord who had just come into the House (Lord Alfred Paget) conveyed to him an intimation that a number of troops would be placed at the disposal of the City authorities; and they understood, in the first instance, that those troops were to be Life Guards, who were used to deal with large concourses of people, and had temper and discretion, and whose majestic appearance in a crowd had the effect of awing the masses and keeping people in their places; in addition to which the horses of the Life Guards were used to that sort of work, and had acquired, by long practice, habits of forbearance like the riders. Instead of the Life Guards, however, 200 Horse Artillery were sent to the City; their horses were not so well suited for the purpose, and were besides caparisoned in such a manner as induced people in a crowd to lay hold of the trappings. Still, so far from refusing the offer when it was made, he said that he should like not only 200, but 400 if they could be spared. Allusion had been made to the City Volunteers, and he might explain that most emphatic instructions were given that no Volunteer should be employed in any shape as keeping the crowd back. In every case they were to form up against the barriers merely as an object and spectacle. They were to be placed as objects of attraction, but not to interfere in any way with police duties; and the order was that, in all instances, they should give way to the crowd. His own regiment, instead of being at their post at one o'clock, as they should have been, were forming in the very place where a portion of the City procession was being arranged. They were ordered off the ground, but they did not go; and when they ought to have gone to the space allotted to them in front of the Mansion House, by a direct route of less than 450 yards, they took a route of somewhere about 2,825 yards. The consequence was that an immense confusion was created by a body of 700 or 800 men travelling a circuitous route instead of a direct one, and like the vans laden with Metropolitan Police, facing the procession. The Volunteers, not being at their post by the proper time, created a great amount of confusion, and instead of backing up against the barriers, were themselves lost in the crowd. Was it, then, a fair way of treating the City authorities to cast all kinds of imputations upon them? He repeated they did not refuse the assistance of the military, or the aid of the Metropolitan Police, for the latter was not offered to them. There were circumstances, however, in the whole affair which induced the magistrates of the City to think that there should be an inquiry. That inquiry was being vigorously pursued, and he hoped the result of it would be to show that the causes to which he had referred were sufficient to account for the difficulties that had arisen. Allusions had been made to the night of the illuminations. It had been said that the arrangements made by the City Police for the illumination night were not so complete as they should have been, and that many people who went in carriages, had the advantage of staying many hours and going home without having seen the illuminations. Now, so far as the City was concerned, he felt all along that the Mansion House was the point of danger. It was no doubt a point of danger, because the illuminations there would be sure to attract a large concourse of people, and the thoroughfare was rather narrow. But having himself been at the Mansion House, he could say from personal observation that there was a constant movement in the line of carriages during the whole night. There was, of course, a tremendous pressure; but if people would go in such immense masses into places which were not large enough to contain them, it did not require great philosophy to say what the result would be. Two men could not stand in the place of one, and that was the problem to be solved on Tuesday night. It was very deplorable that fatal accidents should have occurred, but no possible precaution could have prevented them. Had barriers been erected, he believed the loss of life would have been greater. Under all the circumstances, he appealed to the House whether it would sanction an attempt to interfere with a local police. Unless the principle of a local force was recognised, there was no reason in the world why Sir Richard Mayne should not be the Commissioner of Police for Liverpool, Manchester, or anywhere else, as well as the City of London; and the English police system assimilated to that of France. He thought, however, that the House would hardly be prepared to sanction such a principle.

LORD ALFRED PAGET: Sir, as I had the honour of accompanying the carriage of the Princess Alexandra through the City, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. First of all, I must bear witness to the perfect good humour and excellent behaviour of the people on the day of the procession. I cannot conceive a more trying situation than being in a vast crowd with a great pressure from behind and on every side, and seeing outriders, equeuries, and cavalry advancing to crush one's toes; but I can truly say that I never heard an angry word, but that, on the contrary, the people behaved with the utmost good nature. Of course, on such an occasion, when, on emerging from London Bridge, we beheld an immense mass of human beings in front, it was of no use to lose temper and try violently to force a passage. All we could do was to ask the people to make way for us, as in point of fact we were bound for Windsor. I can only say that when we came upon the people—I will not call them the mob, for that they were not—they opened up on all sides as well as they could, and made way for us. As to the police, I am bound to say that they were so few in number, and so completely overwhelmed, that to use a common phrase, they gave up their duty as "a bad job." Moreover, it seemed to me that the great majority of them were just as anxious to see our beautiful Princess as anybody else. Many hon. Members present, I dare say, witnessed the scene at the Mansion House. It was, undoubtedly, a very tremendous "squash." Some of the crowd actually got on the top of the carriage, and I saw a great many running not only by the side of it, but between the leaders and the wheelers of the carriage. I appealed to several policemen who were standing in a row beyond the Mansion House to keep the people out of that dangerous position; but they would not move. I took the number of one of these fellows—it was 68—and reported him to the head of the police, who was, of course, excessively annoyed at the circumstance. As to the change from the City to the Strand, I can only describe my feelings as I approached Temple Bar as something like those of Arctic voyagers who having been locked for weeks among icebergs, at length see clear water in the distance. That was very much the sensation I felt when we got beyond Temple Bar. "Thank God," I said, "now we have got over the worst of it." With reference to what passed between me and the Lord Mayor, I have to say that when I learned that I was to have the honour of taking part in the procession, having had experience for nearly a quarter of a century in such affairs, I thought it right to see the Lord Mayor on the subject. My right hon. Friend first of all gave me a most excellent luncheon; and then I said to him, "Are you quite sure you have got a sufficient force to keep the line clear, as there is sure to be an immense concourse of people?" My right hon. Friend replied that he thought they had, but he would consult the head of the police. I then said, "I don't come as Her Majesty's Chief Equerry to you as Lord Mayor. I have no right to interfere in this matter, or give orders about anything. But coming merely as Alfred Paget to Mr. Rose, I may tell you I have reason to believe, that if you want any assistance, you will get it, not only from the Horse Guards, but from the Metropolitan Police." Of course, it would have been beyond my province to have said more. I was not charged to keep the streets clear, and what I said to my right

hon. Friend was merely by way of suggestion. I left it to my right hon. Friend to communicate what he wished to the Horse Guards and the Metropolitan Police; though I should have been very happy if my right hon. Friend had authorized me to carry any message to Sir Richard Mayne. I, however, went to my right hon. Friend merely as an old friend, and not as in any way authorized to make an official communication to him.

COLONEL FRENCH said, it could not be expected that the Secretary of State would take upon himself at once to decide the respective merits of the City and Metropolitan Police. The right hon. the Lord Mayor spoke rather disparagingly of the Horse Artillery, but they had been thanked by his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief for the services they rendered on the occasion in question.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman ROSE) did not mean to cast any reflection on the Artillery. The men did all that men could do under the circumstances; but the trappings of their horses were not adapted to the sort of work they had to perform.

MR. AYRTON said, the Lord Mayor seemed to think that Her Royal Highness went through the City for the purpose of testing the efficiency of the police, and that the hon. and gallant General (Sir De Lacy Evans) had been too eager in seizing an opportunity of attacking that force. But it was really a very old question whether the City Police should exist as a separate body, with a separate jurisdiction from the general metropolitan force. In 1854 the subject was investigated by a Royal Commission, presided over by the right hon. Gentleman who was now Secretary for War, which reported against the continuance of the separate jurisdiction of the City Police. The matter was again brought under the notice of a Committee of the House in the year before last, and attention was directed to the Report of the Commission, which had hitherto been disregarded. This question involved many serious points, which ought to be considered by the Government. It was an extraordinary thing that in the heart of the metropolis there should be a separate jurisdiction, which had the right to co-operate or not, at its pleasure, with the great body of the police, to protect the interests of the inhabitants by whom their jurisdiction was surrounded. As Sir Richard Mayne had often pointed out, if the City rested in security, it was not due to the City Police, because there was no place within the limits of the City where the thieves and ticket-of-leave men dwelt, while the City was occupied by shops and warehouses, against which the thieves exercised their vocation; but all the persons by whom the City might be invaded necessarily resided outside the City, watched by the Metropolitan Police; and it was therefore essential, for the protection of the public, that there should be one force, one jurisdiction, and one administration for the whole metropolis. He believed the peculiarity of the present system was due to the fact that it was introduced by Sir Robert Peel, as a tentative measure, to be at first confined to one or two districts, and extended gradually if it proved successful. As it had worked well, its extension had naturally followed; and the Government ought now to consider whether the time had not arrived when the City ought to be included within its scope. The Commissioners expressed their belief that the amalgamation of the Metropolitan and City Police was a measure recommended by considerations alike of efficiency and of economy, and they proposed that the corporation should be relieved from the contribution it now paid towards the police, the City receiving the same assistance from the Consolidated Fund as the rest of the metropolis. Nobody benefited by the existing arrangement, except those who managed the corporation. The inhabitants of the City actually paid more for police purposes than those of other towns, and the separate jurisdiction was maintained solely in order that certain parties in the City might have the gratification of a little municipal self-importance. Great streams of carriages poured every day into the City from all parts of London, and nobody would deny that any police regulations which might be adopted in the City should have some reference to the various sources from which the immense carriage traffic was derived. Would it be believed that a Bill had been introduced in another place empowering the City corporation to make any rules they might think fit for the regulation of that carriage traffic, coming, as it did, from all parts of the metropolis? That extraordinary power was claimed for no other purpose than to bolster up the present unhappy state of things in the City. He hoped the Government would not imagine that the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster had brought forward this subject on the impulse of the moment. It had been brought forward because recent events had proved—that anybody might have known before—that there could not safely be in the centre of London a police jurisdiction separate from that which existed in the rest of the metropolis. He trusted, now that their attention had been called to the subject, that the Government would give it their earliest and most earnest consideration, and that at no distant day they would be prepared to deal with it in a practical manner.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am not surprised that the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) should have brought this subject under the notice of the House, for it is one which well deserves attention. There can be no doubt that on Saturday last there was a serious obstruction to the passage of the Royal carriages through the City, and I have felt it my duty to write to the Lord Mayor on the subject, calling his attention to the reports I have received, and reminding him that the route was fixed, and obtained the sanction of Her Majesty, on the distinct understanding that every effectual means would be taken to prevent confusion and delay. It is well known that from the Bricklayers' Arms to London Bridge, and from Temple Bar to Paddington, although the whole route was crowded by vast multitudes, there was not the slightest obstruction or delay; but that no sooner had the procession entered the City than its progress was obstructed by dense masses of people, a stoppage of nearly twenty minutes taking place on London Bridge. At the Mansion House also a considerable delay occurred; and I have been informed by gentlemen who were in attendance on the Prince and Princess that there appeared to be an absence of any authority, and a want of those efficient arrangements which should have been made on such an occasion. In the letter which I have addressed to the Lord Mayor, I have requested him to state the number of police who were on duty in the streets on Saturday, the orders under which they acted, and the arrangements which were made beforehand for maintaining order and preventing confusion. I deeply regret what took place, because it was the only circumstance of the day which could in the slightest degree lessen the effect or diminish the splendour of the cordial and enthusiastic reception which was given to the Princess on her passage through the metropolis. The Lord Mayor has stated that no assistance was offered by the Metropolitan Police, and that the assistance offered by the military authorities was promptly accepted. I am surprised at that statement, because I have been informed, by the highest authority, that the Quartermaster General was sent into the City to offer every assistance; that all assistance was in the first instance refused; but that on further consideration the City authorities consented to admit into the City the mounted artillerymen, who were very useful in aiding the progress of the Royal procession. With respect to the Metropolitan Police, I may remind the House that the Act which constitutes the City force gives the City authorities absolute power on all extraordinary occasions to remove all obstructions from the streets and to regulate the traffic in whatever manner they please. It also authorizes the Metropolitan Police to be employed in the City on such occasions, but only at the request of the Lord Mayor. Now, Sir Richard Mayne has assured me that on the 28th of February he attended a meeting of the Reception Committee in the City, and offered to take charge of that part of Fleet Street which adjoins Temple Bar, reminding them of the section which authorizes the Metropolitan Police to be employed in the City at the request of the Lord Mayor, and stating his readiness, on such request being made, to comply with it by sending a body of his men into the City. He also reminded them, that on the occasion of the Emperor of the French paying a visit to the City, the Metropolitan Police took charge of the streets from Temple Bar to St. Paul's. I am afraid that the confusion arose from the over-confidence of the City authorities in the efficiency of their police, which, although efficient for the performance of its ordinary duties, is insufficient, in point of numbers, to meet the extraordinary circumstances of such an occasion as Saturday. At the same time, I think we cannot say at once, without further consideration, notwithstanding what has occurred, that there should be an amalgamation of the Metropolitan and City Police—although I certainly agree with the opinions which have been expressed as to the expediency of such amalgamation. It is no doubt a great anomaly that a comparatively small district in the centre of the metropolis should have a separate police jurisdiction of its own; and I think some alteration of the law is necessary to give to the Government—acting in concert with the City authorities, but not wholly dependent upon them—the power on special occasions to take precautions against the recurrence of such scenes as those which happened in the City on Saturday. The Lord Mayor has referred to certain vans of Metropolitan Police which helped to obstruct the streets in the City. I believe that a certain number of the Metropolitan Police, ordinarily stationed in the eastern districts, but required to do duty in the west on Saturday, passed through the City on that day; but I do not see how they could have caused the obstruction and delay on London Bridge. I am afraid that the arrangements of the City authorities were not such as to insure success; and I have no doubt that what has taken place will lead to the introduction of some change which will prevent a repetition of what occurred on Saturday. Except from the reports in the newspapers, I have no information on the subject of the fatal accidents which occurred on Tuesday night, and I am not prepared to say that any one is to blame on account of those calamities. So vast were the crowds which flocked into the City to see the illuminations, and so great was the pressure at nearly all points, that I doubt whether it would have been practicable to make any police arrangements which would have insured absolute safety to every person in the streets; although it is doubtless important that every practicable precaution should be taken on such occasions to prevent loss of life. It is right that I should say that Her Majesty has commanded me—and I have addressed a communication on the subject to the Lord Mayor—to express the regret and concern with which she has read the accounts of this loss of life, and her deep sympathy with the families of the sufferers. Her Majesty has also intimated her desire that an inquiry should be made into the circumstances of those families, in order that the information may be communicated to her.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, that advantage had been taken of recent circumstances to inveigh against the management of the City police. He would, however, remind the House that the City was by no means an insignificant portion of the metropolis, either as regarded wealth or population, for though only about 120,000 persons slept within its walls more than 800,000 persons resorted to it daily in their avocations of trade and commerce. He thought he might challenge any hon. Member to show whether any complaints had ever been made by the merchants or other business men of the City as to the management of the City police; and it would be too much to insist upon a change because a calamity had occurred which none deplored more than the citizens themselves. He was of opinion that Her Majesty's Government had interfered most injudiciously with the arrangement of the civic authorities for the Royal procession. If those authorities had been marshalled at the Bricklayers' Arms, and allowed to go through to Paddington, the area for sightseers would have been greatly extended, the sightseers would have dispersed themselves over the whole route, and there would have been no undue crowding in the City of London. He admitted freely, as an eye-witness, that the City police arrangements opposite the Mansion House broke down. But they had all heard the popular story that on account of the nail the horse was lost, and its owner was overtaken and fell into the hands of the enemy. So it was on this occasion. The gallant Colonel, who, he was sure, would, in the face of an enemy, show that he was made of the right material, was animated by a slight desire for popularity, and instead of taking up his position opposite the Mansion House with the troops under his command by a route measuring 420 yards, he marched westward from the Guildhall, and took a route measuring 2,820 yards, and arrived at the position too late to be of service. From this cause, and this cause alone, the police arrangements broke down; and it would be manifestly unjust for the House of Commons or the Government to take advantage of a small circumstance like this to say that the City of London was incompetent to manage its own police. He was strongly in favour of municipal government, and he believed that the municipality of London were equally capable of selecting good administrators with the Government, that they did so without favour to individuals, and that on all occasions they endeavoured to select the most efficient men for the discharge of public duties; and he was at a loss to know if the Government or any other body could do more. He considered it was a great defect that so much of the police force of the metropolis was already concentrated and placed under one head; and it would be better if the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), instead of complaining of the municipal regulations of the City of London, would insist that his constituents should have a like municipality. If the Tower Hamlets, Westminster, Marylebone, and the Borough had their own municipalities, we should hear little indeed of a concentrated police force for the whole metropolis. It was an important fact, which must not be lost sight of, that there was not a man in the crowd on Saturday but who was willing and anxious to render every service; and was not this a testimony to the popularity of the authorities of the City of London? The circumstance mentioned by the noble Lord (Lord Alfred Paget) was a proof beyond anything that could be adduced of the popularity of the municipal rule in London. Hundreds of thousands were congregated in a small space, and still there was not a single manifestation of ill-humour; but if there had been any cause for ill-humour, or if there had been any unpopularity, they would have been manifested. He, therefore, asked the House not to look at one single occasion to the prejudice of the City of London, but to look at its general rule, and then adduce if they could any portion of the metropolis that was more contented with its rulers or more happy in the demonstration of its loyalty. He deplored the breaking-down of the police arrangements on Saturday, but it was attributable to a circumstance which Parliament would act unwisely to make too much of.

LORD ELCHO said, that having a Question of his own on the paper, he had not intended to take any part in the discussion of the merits or demerits of the City authorities. But the Lord Mayor and the hon. Alderman (Mr. Alderman Sidney) having animadverted on the conduct of a brother officer of his who had charge of the City of London Rifle Brigade, he wished to read a passage from the letter which that gallant officer had recently sent to the newspapers. Colonel Warde wrote thus—

"Sir,—I see in your paper of this day's date that the acting Commissioner of Police, Captain Hodgson, attributes the failure of the City police in maintaining order on Saturday last to what he calls a breach of orders by the City of London Volunteer Corps, which I have the honour to command, by, in the first place, not having taken up the position appointed for it in front of the Mansion House at twelve o'clock; and, in the second place, by the parade of the corps at the Guildhall Yard, and so by its presence interfering with the formation of the civic procession. My answer to these accusations will be brief. If Captain Hodgson will refer to the orders published by the War Office, he will find that the hour for the City Corps to be at their posts was one o'clock, and not twelve, as he makes it appear The total absence of police arrangements necessitated a circuitous route by broader streets, and to gain the Mansion House by the main line of the procession, in which it might have been expected that some effort would have been made to maintain order."

THE VOLUNTEERS IN HYDE PARK.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO proceeded to say, he would now come to the Question which stood on the Notice paper in his name. It was the wish of the Volunteers to join in the loyal demonstration of Saturday. Her Majesty had graciously acceded to that wish, and by Her Majesty's command they were drawn up in Hyde Park. All these Volunteer gatherings were organized by the War Office and the Horse Guards; and in this instance the space of ground railed off for the Volunteers was as much as those authorities thought sufficient, and no more; the space allotted was 1,000 yards by 100, and in that space 17,000 men took up their position, and held it without confusion or delay. Now, the following paragraph appeared in the official part of The Times the other day in large print, and bearing the character of an official communication:—

"THE POLICE IN HYDE PARK.—The arrangement by which the spectators in Hyde Park on Saturday were kept at an unnecessary distance from the line of the Royal procession caused some well-founded complaint on the part of the public. We understand that the regulation enforced formed no part of the original instructions given by the police authorities, and was contrary to the express orders of Sir Richard Mayne."

That paragraph implied that the public had been kept at an unnecessary distance, or, in other words, that too large a space had been enclosed for the Volunteers; and the name of Sir Richard Mayne appeared in it. Now, he did not presume, on his own authority as an humble Volunteer, to say whether the space so enclosed was or was not sufficient for the necessary manœuvres the Volunteers had to perform; but he would quote an authority which might be set against the authority of Sir Richard Mayne, whose qualifications for his office had not been acquired in the army or the field, but at the bar. In the opinion of General Rumley, who was in command on Saturday, not one foot more than was absolutely required was railed off. Some inquiry was, he thought, necessary as to the authority by whom that paragraph was furnished to The Times; because it was literally a censure upon the Horse Guards and the War Office, by whom the Volunteer demonstration was directed. He could hardly suppose that it appeared with the sanction of the Secretary for War, because it conveyed a censure on his own Department; nor with the authority of the Home Secretary, because it was a censure upon his Colleague. He must, therefore, think it was sent by the authority of Sir Richard Mayne; and he must say, that if that gentleman had either directly or indirectly authorized its insertion, he had forgotten his position and exceeded his duty in so doing. If they were to have these Volunteer demonstrations in Hyde Park, it was important to know whether they were to be regulated by the War Office and the Horse Guards, or whether the space required for them was to be under the control of Sir Richard Mayne and the Metropolitan police. He did not think the Secretary of State for War would object to his putting the question of which he had given notice, as it would enable the right hon. Gentleman to maintain the dignity and importance of his Department. He would, therefore, ask by whose authority an official paragraph appeared in The Times, complaining that the space railed off for the Volunteers on Saturday was unnecessarily great.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS:—Perhaps it would be more convenient that I should answer this question now, although some other questions may be put to me in the course of this discussion, and which, according to strict rule, I should be unable to reply to if I at once answered the noble Lord. I have been informed by Sir Richard Mayne that the paragraph in The Times to which my noble Friend refers was founded upon information furnished by himself. I had no knowledge myself of the paragraph in question before I saw it in the paper, nor did my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary have any more knowledge of it than myself. I believe the arrangements in respect to the Volunteers were carefully made; that their stations in the Park were marked upon a map which was shown to His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and Sir Richard Mayne, and it was understood their assent to that position had been obtained. I have communicated with General Rumley, who had the command of the Volunteers on Saturday, and he has informed me that no more room was assigned to the Volunteers than was necessary for their movements. My own belief is, so far as I am able to form a judgment, that the arrangements were properly and carefully made, and that no unnecessary ground was occupied by the Volunteers. I can only regret that any misunderstanding should have taken place; but, so far as my own information and knowledge extend, I cannot admit that any error was committed by the military authorities with respect to the position of the Volunteers on that day.

LORD HOTHAM: What has been said by the noble Lord and the right hon. Baronet renders it necessary for me to say a few words on this occasion. It may be asked why do I interfere in a matter of this description? My answer is very simple. On my way down to the House to-day I accidentally met Sir Richard Mayne in the street. He asked me if I had seen the notice given by my noble Friend, and, anticipating that some attack would be made on him, he asked me, not to defend him, but if I would have any objection to state what he did, and all that he did, on that occasion. I therefore beg the indulgence of the House for a few moments. It has always been the custom on all public occasions, excepting reviews in Hyde Park, for the police to take charge of, and to keep the streets clear through which any procession has to pass, and on that occasion the duty was confided to Sir Richard Mayne by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. In the execution of that duty he made arrangements for the procession, not only through the streets, but through the Park. He caused to be marked off in the Park a space sufficiently wide for the passage of the Royal cortège, and, in addition to that, space sufficient to be occupied by the Volunteers who had expressed the laudable desire to line the way for the passage of the Royal Prince and Princess; but in doing this care was taken not to take possession of a single inch of ground which might be available for the gratification of the natural curiosity of the large population of this metropolis. This was done on Friday; but the same evening Sir Richard Mayne received information that the military authorities were making different arrangements; that they desired a much larger space to be provided, and that tickets were issued by the military authorities for the accommodation of spectators. The Commissioner of Police did not understand the thing to have gone any further than the expression of a wish that a larger space should be provided than had been marked off by himself. Great therefore was his astonishment, on going to the spot the following morning, to find not only that the space he had considered sufficient for all legitimate purposes was departed from, but that a vastly larger space had been set apart than could be necessary for the Royal procession, thus depriving thousands of the opportunity of seeing the illustrious Princess on whom the thoughts of every one were fixed. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) has talked of no larger space being taken than was necessary for the execution of manœuvres by the Volunteers, and he has also spoken of what is usual on Volunteer gatherings. To hear the noble Lord talk of Volunteer manœuvres, one would suppose that a review or field-day was to have taken place; and as to a Volunteer gathering, it was no further to be considered a Volunteer gathering than to exhibit to the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra the earnest desire they had to pay their loyal respects to them. If my noble Friend means to say that no more ground was taken up than was necessary for enabling the Volunteers to get into their places, he must be attributing to the Volunteers a want of discipline which I should be ashamed to impute to them. [Lord Elcho: I quoted the opinion of the General in command.] Let me tell the noble Lord no one has greater respect for the General in command than I have; but if he were asked whether it would be necessary to give a space of from 100 to 120 yards in width to enable the Volunteers to get to their places in the Park, I am greatly mistaken if he would not think that any person putting such a question to him could have but a poor opinion of their discipline. Do not let my noble Friend imagine that I mean to say anything disrespectful to the Volunteers. No man in England appreciates more than I do their loyalty, the zeal they display, or the time and money they expend in acquiring a knowledge of their duties. No one witnessed with greater pleasure than I did the Volunteers, including my noble Friend's well-appointed corps, pass along Pall Mall that morning; and the noble Lord could not fail to see a battalion of Her Majesty's Guards, through which he himself passed, the regiment indeed to which I formerly had the honour to belong. They marched down Pall Mall, and took up their places; they did not require a space of 100 or 120 yards wide to do so. They marched down Pall Mall, with their band at their head, the street being tolerably crowded at the time. In Waterloo Place one wing took its post on one side, the other wing on the other side, and scarcely any disturbance of the street took place. Therefore, I do think my noble Friend must have expected that something more was to be done by the Volunteers than the mere lining of the space through which the Royal cortège was to pass. I have heard it said that one reason for taking up this large space was that they might "march past," but whom were they to march past? [Lord ELCHO: The General in command.] The General in command! The senior officer on the ground, no doubt; but I am quite certain that General Rumley, if left to himself, never would have submitted to be "marched past" by a body of Volunteers on such an occasion. They were assembled to do honour to the Prince and Princess; that was the duty they had to perform; and when that duty was performed, they ought to have done what, in point of fact, they did—the moment the procession passed, they went away home. I have said so much—perhaps more than was necessary for the occasion—in explanation of the part taken by the Chief Commissioner of Police. I have stated that when he went in the morning he was greatly surprised to find his orders contravened; and so displeased was he that without any notice to him his orders had been deviated from, that the first thing he did, and very properly, was to suspend the officer who had charge of the police in that particular quarter. He pleaded, in extenuation, that he was almost compelled to deviate from his orders by a Staff officer; but, said Sir Richard Mayne, "Your duty was immediately to have sent notice to me of the orders you were compelled to obey, instead of taking up different ground from that which I ordered you to occupy;

you should never have yielded it except to force or without giving notice to me." On the morning after the procession there appeared in The Times newspaper some observations reflecting very strongly on the conduct of the police, and perhaps some hon. Gentlemen may say—my noble Friend has said so—it was not fit for a person in the situation of the Chief Commissioner of Police to communicate with the Press. [Lord ELCHO: I did not say so. I said to censure the arrangements of the War Office.] Well, censuring the arrangements—my noble Friend puts his own construction on it. The paragraph simply says, that Sir Richard Mayne denies that what is charged against him is true, or that it was done by his authority. It may be said to be wrong for any official to communicate with a newspaper. That, however, is a course which hon. Gentlemen on every side of the House adopt when any imputation is wrongfully cast upon them. If it is said to be wrong that a Member of the Government should communicate with the Press, I can only say, I have heard the noble Viscount justify the propriety of sending papers to the newspapers before they were delivered to Members of the House; and therefore I think it can hardly be said that there is any great blame to be cast on any one for taking the opportunity of contradicting, in the way my noble Friend quoted, an accusation unjustly preferred against the police. Let me further say, there is not the slightest soreness on the part of Sir Richard Mayne in consequence of anything that may have been done by the War Office. My noble Friend has said, that it was usual upon such occasions for arrangements to be made by the War Office and the Horse Guards. That may be so; but if Sir Richard Mayne had been told by the Home Secretary that he need not pay any attention to Hyde Park, he would have said something like, "I am very much obliged to you, as I shall have four hundred constables to place elsewhere." As no communication was made to him that any departure from the ordinary course would be made, Sir Richard Mayne felt it to be his duty to not as he had always acted upon such occasions. Lest there should be any mistake, I will read what was written by Sir Richard Mayne to the gentleman connected with The Times newspaper, and which led to the paragraph which my noble Friend has quoted. Sir Richard Mayne wrote—

"With reference to the just observations in The Times report this morning (page 11) of the people having been kept at too great a distance from the line of the procession in Hyde Park, as regards the Police interfering for that purpose, it was contrary to my express orders, and I have suspended the Superintendent of Police who had charge of that part of the line, although he pleads in extenuation that he acted on the urgent demand of Colonel M'Murdo that he should place the Police at the distance along the hurdles. My intention was that so much ground only should be kept as would allow room for the Royal cortège and the columns of Volunteers at the side. I was much annoyed on coming into the Park to find that the Police were acting contrary to my orders, the effect being to deprive many thousands of all sight of the Princess, and to deprive the Royal party of the joyous cheering there had been elsewhere at every point. I never witnessed such continued hearty acclamations of welcome as were given on Saturday from countless multitudes of all classes, from the Borough along the whole of the route. You may take any notice you think proper of the arrangements in the Park."

Thanking the House for its indulgence, I need hardly say my only object has been this—that when an individual, be his station high or be it low, has been aspersed, he should have an opportunity of having his case fairly stated; and I know, that although we are sometimes governed by political feeling, yet, when it is a question of justice and honour, the House of Commons may safely be trusted to deal with it.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Although in strict right I have no right to address the House again, yet, perhaps, it will permit me to say a few words upon this subject. I must, in the first place, express my regret that conflicting orders should have been given by the civil and military departments, and I must also express my regret that my noble Friend has thought it worth while to bring the subject before the House. Sir Richard Mayne was influenced by a feeling which does him great credit—a desire that his arrangements should be such as to enable the largest number of persons to see the procession and to welcome the Princess. The military authorities appear to have taken a different view of the occasion as regarded Hyde Park. Sir Richard Mayne understood that the arrangements as to the Volunteers were, that they should form a line on each side through which the Royal procession would pass, and that a space beyond would be kept clear by hurdles, sufficient to prevent the pressure of the crowd, up to which the general public would be allowed to come, and thus obtain a comparatively near view of the Princess. The military authorities thought it should be treated as a parade-ground, and therefore required a much larger space to be kept clear. I am sorry there was this misunderstanding, and that there was not a better previous concert, but I have no doubt that in future means will be taken to prevent the recurrence of any such misunderstanding.

COLONEL BURGEVINE AND HIS CHINESE CORPS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government will communicate to the House any further Papers, in continuation of those of the Session of 1862, respecting the progress of affairs in China, particularly in regard to the recent mutiny of the drilled Chinese troops under General Burgevine; the accusation of treason and robbery against that Officer; his removal from his command, and the issue of a proclamation by the Foo-tae of Shanghai offering a reward of 20,000 dollars for his head; the appointment of Captain Holland, of the Royal Marines, by Major General Staveland, commanding the British Force at Shanghai, to the temporary command; the refusal of the Chinese troops to accept him as their commander; and any information of the proceedings of Captain Dew, R.N., at Ningpo?

ITALY—AFFAIRS OF ROME.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STIRLING—in rising to call the attention of the House to a portion of the Correspondence relating to the affairs of Rome, and to ask for the production of the despatch, or a portion of the despatch from Mr. Odo Russell reporting the words of the Pope during their conversation on the 26th of July 1862, which led to Earl Russell's despatch of the 25th of October 1862, and the suggestion that the Pope should retire to Malta—said, he wished in particular to draw the attention of the House to Earl Russell's despatch dated the 25th October, which he believed many Members of the House would agree was one of the ablest State Papers on the subject of contemporary politics which had proceeded from the Foreign Office. But after the first feeling of admiration was over, there arose another feeling of wonder why that despatch had ever been written; and this feeling was rather strengthened when it was seen that the despatch which followed contained a reason why the first should not have been published at all. This despatch was written six days later than despatch No. 1, and was addressed to Lord Cowley, for the purpose of being read to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs in order to elicit from him a frank interchange of opinion on the dangers and inconveniences of the prolonged occupation of Rome. Now, he (Mr. Stirling) thought it might fairly be questioned whether it was altogether frank to invite a discussion of this nature with the French Minister, and yet to conceal the fact that the writer of the despatch, the English Foreign Secretary, had proposed to the Pope that he should withdraw himself from his French protectors, and should elope with the English Admiral to Malta. But proceeding through the succeeding despatches, it was not until we came to No. 7 in the published Correspondence that we found any explanation of the mystery. Then we discovered that the French Government, in the yellow-covered collection of despatches which it presented to the public annually, had inserted what Earl Russell regarded as a very inaccurate statement of what took place between Mr. Russell and the Pope so long ago as the 26th of July. Lord Russell characterized that statement as a compilation of the hearsay of Rome; and on the 29th of January, he addressed a despatch to Earl Cowley for the purpose of setting the matter right, and referred to the original despatch of Mr. Odo Russell, which was not compiled from hearsay, but was written on the very day when the interview took place, and while the facts, therefore, were fresh in the recollection of the writer. One might suppose that a paper of this kind, coming from the British Foreign Minister, would have met with a courteous response, and that some apology would have been made for the rash romance put forth in the French "yellow-book." But this was far from being the case. Lord Cowley was directed to read this despatch to the French Foreign Minister, but no intimation was afforded as to the answer made by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, or the manner in which he received the despatch. But it was remarkable that since the publication of the "yellow-book" and of these Parliamentary papers the French press had never ceased to attack the policy and impugn the statement of Earl Russell in regard to the affairs of Rome, unless at such times as it was engaged in attacking and impugning his policy with regard to Poland. Now, the comments of newspapers where the press was free, however valuable in themselves, would not be fit subjects for discussion in this House; but we knew that as regarded the articles in the French press, their intrinsic merits were by no means a fair criterion of their importance. Since the establishment of military despotism in France, the French press had been merely a machine with a hundred mouths through which the Sovereign addressed the world. The present Minister of the Interior in France entered office with a flourish of trumpets about extended freedom of thought, but he had since been principally occupied in repressing and punishing any movement in that direction. That Minister sat in his office with a kind of telegraph by his side, by means of which he was enabled to drop an extinguisher on any newspaper in France. He was in fact the sub-editor of the French press, responsible to no one but the Emperor, who was himself in reality the editor-in-chief. The French press, so conducted, had been especially eloquent, sarcastic, and bitter on the subject of what it called "the incident Odo Russell." It denied that Lord Russell's statement was correct, it asserted that the romance of the "yellow-book" was substantially true, and it had hinted at the existence of an official document, emanating from Cardinal Antonelli, denying the accuracy of the one and confirming the statement made in the other. The question naturally arose, were these imputations made from some pious motive, but upon confessedly insufficient grounds, or were they made under a misapprehension of the facts, and in the conviction that the statements they put forward were true? It appeared to him (Mr. Stirling), in the original despatch of Mr. Odo Russell there must be ample means of setting the matter completely at rest. He did not ask his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State (Mr. Layard) to produce the whole of this despatch, because at the interview between the Pope and Mr. Russell on the 26th of July much might have passed which it would be improper to make public. The position of the Pope, between his French protectors on the one hand and his duties to the Church and his people on the other, must be painful indeed to a man universally allowed to be of so excellent a character. Possibly the Pope dropped to Mr. Russell some hints concerning these varied perplexities. On these points the Under Secretary of State might withhold information; but would he not give the House the precise words reported by Mr. Odo Russell which led to the suggestion that the Pope should go to Malta? The subject-matter of Mr. Russell's despatch to his chief, though perhaps important, was evidently not urgent, for the Foreign Minister took twelve or thirteen weeks to answer it, and must therefore have written with great deliberation, and under the impression that there was no great urgency as regarded time in the proposal that was made. Under these circumstances, he would ask his hon. Friend, whether there was any objection to lay upon the table a Copy of the Despatch of Mr. Odo Russell, or of a part of it, reporting those words of the Pope during their conversation on the 26th of July, 1862, which led to Earl Russell's Despatch of the 25th of October, and the suggestion that the Pope should retire to Malta?

AFFAIRS OF JAPAN.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR rose, according to notice, to call the attention of the House to recent occurrences in Japan, and said, that great care was requisite in the selection of a Minister to Japan since the opening of the ports in 1858; but the fact was that two gentlemen sent out as Consuls there had misconducted themselves. One of them, Mr. Hodgson, had been recalled, and Mr. Morrison, as far as the merchants in Japan could ascertain, had been sent home to answer certain accusations made against him for very indiscreet conduct as British agent in that country. From the published papers it now appeared that Colonel Neale also was at variance with the whole of the British community out there. He did not wish to impute any blame to Colonel Neale, but he wished to know whether any further despatches had been received than had yet appeared, for in one of this officer's letters he seemed to allude to some further despatches as having been sent home by him, and the British residents were very anxious that the Under Secretary should produce any despatches in which Colonel Neale had attacked them, or, if no such despatches had been received, should state so publicly. He wished also to ask what steps the Government intended to take in consequence of the outrages which had been perpetrated on British subjects in Japan. These outrages began on the subject of other countries. In 1859 an attack was made on a Russian naval officer and a sailor; in 1860, on two Dutch captains; in the year following, on the American Secretary of Legation at Yeddo; then there were two attacks on the British Legation; and in 1862 occurred the cruel murder of Mr. Richardson. The British merchants and their friends, feeling the insecurity of life in Japan, were naturally most anxious to know whether the Government would take any steps to prevent these lamentable occurrences. He believed he represented the general feeling of the British merchants in Japan when he said that sufficient care had not been taken by the Foreign Office in the selection of its agents; and he thought it was quite possible, in opening up relations with Japan, for the Government to choose gentlemen who would be able to execute our consular duties and at the same time conduct themselves as Christian men. Colonel Neale, our Chargé d'Affaires in Japan, was a gallant gentleman; but what were the antecedents which, in the eyes of the Foreign Office, qualified him for his present post? He had not had Oriental experience. He found that the gallant Colonel joined the liberating army of Portugal in 1832, and until 1860 he had not been further east than European Turkey. Suddenly he received a despatch from the Foreign Office appointing him to an official post in China, whence he had since been transferred to Japan. At that time our relations with Japan were extremely delicate, and surely some gentleman versed in Eastern diplomacy could have been found to fill the post. This country had been involved in wars which cost us millions by the ignorance or unfitness for their duties of consular agents sent to foreign countries. There had not been a more fruitful source of expense to this country than the bad choice of our agents abroad; and that remark applied in many cases, from Mexico to Peking. He hoped the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would afford the House some information on the points to which he had directed his hon. Friend's attention.

MR. LAYARD, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) said, that all the papers which the Foreign Office possessed with regard to our relations with China had been laid upon the table of the House. He had no information on the subject of the 20,000 dollars referred to by his hon. and gallant Friend as having been offered for the head of General Burgevine. His hon. and gallant Friend relied much on his private correspondence; but, judging from the manner in which it had misled him (Colonel Sykes) last year, he feared it was not so trustworthy as it might be. With regard to Captain Dew's proceedings at Ningpo, if his hon. and gallant Friend would take the trouble to look into the papers laid on the table, he would see that all that gallant officer's operations were described in them.

As to the Question put by the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Stirling) he was sure his hon. Friend would quite understand that it would be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the table of the House despatches containing a recital of conversations held by our agents abroad with persons in the exalted position of the Pope or any other European Sovereign. It had never been the custom to do so; and in the present instance it would be improper and inconvenient to produce the despatch or any part of the despatch referred to by his hon. Friend. But he might repeat that what took place on this occasion—when an inquiry was made by the Pope whether in the event of his being compelled to leave Rome an asylum would be afforded to him in England—was fully and accurately reported in the despatch of Earl Russell, dated the 29th January, which had been laid upon the table. It was true, as his hon. Friend said, that certain French papers—he knew not on the responsibility of what persons—contradicted our account of those transactions; but he was convinced that what the noble Lord had stated on the authority of Mr. Odo Russell was strictly true; because of this we might be sure, that the utmost reliance might be placed on the word of an English gentleman, and more especially on the word of a public servant so honourable and conscientious as Mr. Odo Russell. Under these circumstances he did not think it necessary to vindicate Mr. Odo Russell or to contradict any charges which the French papers might make against us. But his hon. Friend said, that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had taken many weeks to answer the question which the Pope had addressed to Mr. Russell. The fact was, the latter gentleman had left Rome at the beginning of the unhealthy season, and it was quite untrue, as stated in the French papers, that he had been called to England in consequence of anything that had taken place between him and the Pope. When Mr. Russell's leave of absence had expired, and he was returning to Rome, Lord Russell took the opportunity of furnishing him with the despatch to which his hon. Friend referred.

With regard to the Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour), his hon. Friend had been very much misinformed with respect to Mr. Consul Morrison. That gentleman was not recalled to this country to have his conduct investigated: he came home after a considerable residence in Japan, during which his health had become impaired. It was quite true that charges were made against him by a Singapore paper which much affected his character as a consul and a gentleman; and when these charges were brought under the notice of the Foreign Office, an immediate order was given for a full inquiry on the spot. The result of the investigation was an entire acquittal of Mr. Morrison. It was true that he had struck a Japanese, and the Government took occasion to express their disapprobation of his conduct in so doing. He trusted that when he returned he would be more careful in regard to his treatment of the natives; but he must take occasion to say, that Consul Morrison was one of our ablest agents, that he was intimately acquainted with his Consular duties, and had obtained in their discharge the approval both of the British Mission and of the British residents in Japan. As to the barbarous murder of Mr. Robinson, the House might rest perfectly certain that Her Majesty's Government would take the proper steps to obtain the fullest satisfaction for the outrage; but as the instructions which they had sent out had not yet been carried into execution, they could not with propriety lay them on the table. His hon. Friend (Mr. Henry Seymour) had made some observations with regard to the appointment of our agents in the East, and had criticised the conduct of Lord Russell in reference to his selection of those gentlemen. His hon. Friend had referred to the Foreign Office List for the antecedents of Colonel Neale, and, having first said that he had had no Eastern experience, he then told the House that he had been for some years in the consular service in Turkey. It would have been difficult to have obtained a diplomatic officer who had experience in Japan itself, because our diplomatic relations with that country had only existed for a very short time. But Colonel Neale had shown remarkable qualities as a Consul in the East—indeed, he had been one of our best Consuls—and when the position of Secretary of Legation at Pekin became vacant, the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, thought he was the man best fitted for the post. His conduct in China justified the selection of the noble Lord; and when it became necessary to send a chargé d'affaires to Japan, Colonel Neale was selected; and he (Mr. Layard) ventured to say, that a better selection could not have been made. His hon. Friend made his accusation in such general terms that he had not even expected Sir Rutherford Alcock, than whom no officer in the service was more deserving of consideration. The hon. Gentleman had asked whether Colonel Neale had sent to England any observations in reference to the accusations made against him by the merchants in Japan. The answer was, that no such statement had been sent to England by Colonel Neale. He believed that after the despatch printed in the blue-book had been written, a good understanding was restored between Colonel Neale and the merchants; and therefore the Colonel very wisely thought it better not to carry on the controversy. They had all become good friends again, and no such observations as those alluded to had been sent to England.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought it was necessary to make a correction of the statement of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Layard). He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that Mr. Odo Russell asserted that the Pope had asked whether in certain events an asylum would be afforded to him at Malta. He did not think it had ever been alleged before, either in the despatches or otherwise, that the Holy Father had mentioned Malta. All that the Pope was alleged to have done was to inquire whether, if at any time circumstances should lead him to take refuge in England, he would be likely to be well and hospitably received. Of course to that Mr. Russell (it was stated in the printed despatch) could only give a general answer. Then the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs suggested Malta in a despatch which was read to Cardinal Antonelli. The real explanation was, that it was a mere random expression of the Holy Father just as Mr. Russell was leaving the room, which Mr. Russell had taken too much au pied de la lettre. The thing occurred at a time when Garibaldi was carrying on his operations in the South of Italy. The Holy Father said, "We are in bad circumstances"—"Siamo in cattive acque" was the expression he believed; and he went on to say something to this effect—"It is impossible to say what may happen; we may have to ask the assistance of your Government." It was a mere random expression, taken too seriously by Mr. Russell, who probably was only too glad to have something to report to his Government. It was something very like the extraordinary report which got about last year, that there was to be a rifle match between the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker. A noble Lord went up to the Speaker when he was busy, and began talking to him about a rifle match, to which the Speaker answered in a jocular way, "If I am to go to a rifle match, it must be with the Lord Chancellor of course." This the noble Lord took seriously, carried a message to the Lord Chancellor, and that noble and learned Lord actually announced from the Wool-sack that he was going to shoot a match with the Speaker of the House of Commons. Of course it was explained that the Speaker had not meant anything serious from his casual expression. He believed the conversation between Mr. Russell and the Holy Father was precisely analogous, and that Mr. Russell had attached too much importance to it. Cardinal Antonelli, when Lord Russell made a serious offer of asylum to the Pope at a time when nothing seemed likely to happen to put him in want of it, explained that the whole thing was a misunderstanding; though, of course, with that courtesy which distinguished great ecclesiastics and Sovereign Princes, the Pope thanked the English Government for the offer. Too much had been made of the affair. He must say he thought the despatch which Lord Russell wrote, recommending the Pope to accept the asylum, and stating that circumstances might arise which would make him glad of it, was uncalled for and improper. It was a part of that system of meddling which distinguished the noble Lord, and which had produced so many inconveniences in all parts of the world. He was afraid that what had occurred had placed Mr. Russell in a more unfavourable position than he had occupied before with the Papal Government—although he had never held a diplomatic position. He hoped the hon. Gentleman opposite would be able to state that this was not the case.

MR. LAYARD: The hon. Baronet is perfectly correct. It was a slip of the tongue when I said Malta; I meant to say England, of course. I believe Mr. Odo Russell's position at Rome is as satisfactory as ever, and his conduct is as much liked as ever.

MR. ARTHUR RUSSELL (Tavistock) said, that of course it was very difficult to contradict any account of what had taken place in conversation between the Pope and his brother, at which only the two were present, but, of course, he believed the statement of his brother in preference to any other. He remembered distinctly having a conversation with his brother on the subject, and the account which he gave of it. It should be remembered that the circumstances were then very different from what they were now. Garibaldi was marching on Rome from the South, the Vatican was alarmed, the French General had withdrawn his troops from the Southern frontier, and was concentrating them at Civita Vecchia. The Pope feared some act of treachery such as had occurred before; for it must be borne in mind that he was not at all grateful to his Imperial protector, not being able to forget that he had lost two-thirds of his States under that protection. Of course, if this conversation were published officially, it would put his brother in a very awkward position at Rome, for it was contrary to all diplomatic usage to publish private conversations with a Sovereign, and to make use in this way of the confidence with which the Pope had honoured him in a critical moment. An hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stirling) had called attention to the great abuse lavished on Mr. Russell by the French press. The position of an English agent at Rome was one of exceeding difficulty. In every other capital of Europe English agents were able to co-operate thoroughly with the representatives of France; but at Rome there could be no such co-operation, for there unfortunately he represented a policy which was entirely opposed to that of the French Ambassador. In popular opinion at Rome the English agent represented national independence and the liberation of Rome from foreign occupation, and the French agent represented the perpetuation of the temporal power of the Pope and the perpetual occupation by the French troops. That was an inconvenience inseparable from the different policies of the two Governments, and nothing could alter it. The best and the most prudent policy for the English Government was to have as little to do with the Pope as possible, and to leave the Pope and the Catholic Powers to get out of the difficulty as well as they could. In a moment of great difficulty Lord Russell had offered the Pope an asylum at Malta under the protection of British guns. In case any pressure should be put upon him by his Imperial protector, that offer must be of great importance to the Pope; but instead of satisfying the Catholics of Europe and England, it seemed only to have irritated them, and they had not shown the slightest gratitude. He was glad to assure the hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) that his brother's position was not in the least altered by what had occurred. The day before yesterday he had received a letter from his brother, assuring him that Cardinal Antonelli still treated him with the same courtesy and confidence. The Pope had never denied the conversation, he merely said that his brother had attached greater importance to it than it deserved. But considering the respect he owed to his Holiness, it was only his brother's duty to conclude that the Pope was not speaking at random.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Supply considered in Committee.

Mr. Massey in the Chair.

(1.) £5,709,733, General Staff and Regimental Pay Allowances and Charges.

GENERAL PEEL thought it necessary, before voting this large sum of money, to have some further explanations of what the capitation rate actually covered. Although there was a less number of men by 3,000, there was an increase in the amount for pay and allowances of £255,000. He believed it would turn out to be an excess of Estimates over Estimates, and not of expenditure over expenditure, and to be owing to an insufficient amount having been estimated for the present year, while the amount was more correctly estimated for next year. He was confirmed in his opinion by the fact that the Estimate for the pay of officers on furlough, in page 12 of the Estimates, which for this year stood at £45,000, for next year was no less than £130,000, being an increase of £85,000 on that item alone. That was equal to the pay and allowances of seven whole regiments; and there could be no doubt that the Estimate for this year was found to be totally inadequate and not that the Estimate for next year was too high. He had no doubt that the greater part of the officers on furlough had been invalidated. Now, he wanted to know whether this was one of the charges that were covered by the capitation? He believed that there was no real increase, but that the discrepancy in the Estimates arose from the improved manner in which they were compiled. They were now framed in the Accountant's branch of the War Office, where some of the most able public servants were employed, and where an opportunity was afforded of comparing past Estimates with absolute expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would, perhaps, be better able to answer him than the right hon. the Secretary of State for War; but he wished to know from some Member of the Government whether the capitation rate was a fixed payment from the Indian Government to the Treasury at a specified period, or whether it was merely a matter of account, in which the Indian Government would have the power of setting off against it any claim they might have for services performed for the Imperial Government? He should like to know, also, whether the Indian Government had ever set up a claim to make any such set-off—because the employment of Indian troops not being limited, and payment being first made by the Indian Government, twenty regiments, instead of two, might, under those circumstances, be serving in China for years before the House of Commons were asked for repayment, and would therefore not know the real amount of the expenditure? Three reasons had been given for not including Indian troops in the number of men voted by Parliament—First, that the number was not known; secondly, that if they were voted, they must be included in the provisions of the Mutiny Bill, which would not be convenient; and, thirdly, that it never had been the practice to include troops of that description in the Estimates. As to the first reason, the number ought to be known; and, as to the second, Indian troops are not included by the present form of the Mutiny Bill, and if they were, nothing would be easier than to exclude them by a special clause. As to the third reason, he was aware that in the Persian and Chinese wars Indian troops were employed which were not voted. The result was that in 1860 there were five open accounts with the Indian Government in regard to the expenses of troops, and that the accounts for the Persian and Chinese wars were not settled at that time. He might quote the authority of Lord Herbert when Secretary for War, given before the Committee, in favour of the principle he contended for—that of giving the House an efficient control over the expenditure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he should simply reply to the question addressed to himself individually with regard to the character of the arrangement for commuting into a fixed rate the expenses incurred by the British Government on account of the Indian army. He understood the question to be whether the capitation rate of £10 on account of the effective service was to be considered as a charge which they were entitled to make and receive without reference to any other question between the two Governments, or whether it was liable to counter claims. The best answer he could give to that question was to state, that ever since he had been in office, the attention of the Government had been very much given to the expediency, and almost necessity, of winding up the complicated pecuniary relations which had grown up between the Indian Government and the Government at home. With regard to the several wars which had been made matters of account between the two Governments, an arrangement had been made in 1839 that the ordinary expenses of the troops should be borne by the East India Company and all other charges by the British Government. A difference of opinion afterwards arose, and he did not know whether the question was settled when he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) quitted office in 1855 or when his successor held office. Such questions, however, had now almost entirely disappeared. The British Government had received a certain amount during the present financial year for capitation, and had paid the Indian Government a certain amount, or were on the point of doing so, on account of the claims of that Government for the expenses of the late war with China. The plan which had been pursued was that doubtful claims should stand for discussion, and that clear claims should at once be met. He believed, that at the end of the present financial year, he should be able to report that substantially almost the whole sum due to the British Government on account of the capitation grant had been received; and that on the other side there was no sum due to the Indian Government still outstanding; and that by that time they would have entered upon a system the continuance of which would afford an effectual guarantee against any recurrence of the very complicated and unsatisfactory state of things which formerly prevailed.

GENERAL PEEL wished to know whether, when Indian troops were employed anywhere, in China, for example, they would be paid for out of grants voted for army purposes, or whether they would be paid by the Indian Government, and the amount set off in account between the Indian Government and the British Government. If, as he believed, they must be paid eventually by money voted for army purposes, then the House would have some check; but if they were paid by the Indian Government, they would have no such check. All he required was that the House should know what was done in these matters.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he believed he could answer the right hon. Gentleman's questions satisfactorily by stating that no part of the capitation grant could be a set-off for any expense voted in the Army Estimates. He could not but think that the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman was purely technical, and had no substance in it. The real security was that possessed by the House in voting the money, for there was none at all in voting the men. As a general principle, the custom had always been to vote no money in the Army Estimates except to men included in the British Mutiny Act, which did not include the Indian troops. Every effective security was given to the House by voting the expenses of the two regiments to which the right hon. Gentleman so often referred. With regard to the charges of the Indian Government, if that Government should make a claim upon the home Government during the year, it would be provided for out of the money which the Committee were asked to vote; and if they made no claim, the sum saved would lapse into the Exchequer, and a new Vote would be taken in the following year. The matter, however, did not depend upon him. All he could do was to ask the Committee to vote the money, in case it were to be paid during the present year. With regard to the capitation rate, which was the material part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, it was true that part of the expenditure for Indian purposes in the Estimates for the current year was for last year; but in extenuation he might plead that the charge was brought upon the Estimates last year for the first time, that in many cases they were obliged to guess, and that there were but few data upon which to found certain calculations. Notwithstanding all that, he believed the total sum voted last year would be sufficient to cover the whole expenses, and that it would not be necessary to ask the House to agree to a supplementary Vote. It was a problem of great difficulty to anticipate by a year anything so fluctuating and uncertain as the expenditure for military purposes of a great empire like this, which had its army scattered over every part of the globe; and a priori it would have appeared impossible to calculate what the aggregate expenses might be. But the difficulty had, in a great measure, been got over. However, in some cases a Secretary of State could make but an imperfect prophecy. The great object of the House should be, that if a deficiency should arise on one Vote, there might be an excess upon other Votes which might cover the deficiency, and that the calculations upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer founded his Budget might not be falsified. But, besides the difficulties he had mentioned, there had been an addition of twelve regiments not included in the capitation rate last year, and the new charge would not take effect to a great extent until the coming year. The principal error was in the item connected with Indian furloughs. During the mutiny, of course there were but few furloughs granted to officers; and, in order to compensate for the rigour which was then necessary, furloughs had been granted with greater liberality when a perfect state of security was established. There had, consequently, been a disproportionate amount calculated for furloughs in the present year. These circumstances would account for the discrepancy which existed between the Estimates of the last and the present year. It had been calculated by the clerks of the War Office that, upon the whole, the arrangement made with the Indian Government in respect of the capitation rate was fair, and that it did about cover the expenses of the Imperial Government in that particular.

GENERAL PEEL contended that the Estimate of the sum received last year for the capitation rate showed that the view which he had taken of the matter was correct. The twelve regiments were included last year.

MR. T. G. BARING said, they were not included in the capitation rate of last year. A comparison was made in the Returns between the strength of the army in the then past and the coming financial years, and the regiments were borne on the Estimates of last year only for the purposes of that comparison.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the statement made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel) had enabled the House to see the difference in the cost of the army at different periods. There was an excess in the Estimates this year of £255,000, as compared with last year, while there was a diminution of 4,160 in the number of men, which, calculated at the rate of £100 per man, would represent a sum of £416,000. The real excess, therefore, was about £660,000. The number of men required for the present year, over that included in the Estimates by Lord Aberdeen's Government, was 45,000, whose extra cost amounted to £4,500,000. It was for the House to consider whether a reduction in the number of men ought not to be made. Some arrangement ought to be made with the Colonies for their defraying the cost of the troops stationed in them.

GENERAL PEEL never intended to say that each man in the British army cost £100. What he had stated was that at a rough calculation £100 per man would give the whole military expenditure.

COLONEL SYKES said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find himself deceived if he expected that there would not be a constant, open, and fluctuating account between the British Government and the Indian Government as long as it was felt necessary for Imperial purposes to employ Indian troops out of India. With regard to the remounts, the same detailed information ought to be afforded in the English Estimates as was given in the French Budget, where the number of horses required and the price of each were stated. In the English Estimates money was taken in a lump, as if by haphazard, for the purchase of horses.

Sir George Lewis

SIR FRANCIS BARING hoped he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War to say that, in framing the military Estimates, he contemplated to resort to an excess on one Vote to meet a deficiency on another, and that provided the sum expended did not exceed the whole Vote the Chancellor of the Exchequer was satisfied. He (Sir Francis Baring) did not think such a system would be satisfactory to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but if it were, it would not be satisfactory to the House. It was understood, that when money was asked for a particular service, it was to be applied to that service, and not to any other. This was a question which the Committee on Public Accounts had endeavoured to provide against, and he believed that the recommendation which that Committee had made had been adopted by the Government. The system was most objectionable both in principle and in practice. The Government should keep as near as possible to the amount voted by the House, and its expenditure on the particular service.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS regretted that he should so have expressed himself as to produce misunderstanding in the very clear mind of his right hon. Friend. He had not meant to convey that any of the Votes were framed on the principle of covering a prospective deficiency. What he had stated was that great difficulty existed in framing an exact Estimate of fluctuating military expenditure diffused over so large a portion of the world; and that when the Secretary of State had to administer the Estimate, and found an excess of expenditure on any one item voted, he should endeavour to effect a saving on other Votes, in order to prevent the necessity of a further application to Parliament at the end of the year.

MR. C. BERKELEY asked for some explanation regarding an increase of nearly £60,000 in the Estimate for recruiting.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the increase was occasioned by the necessity of increasing the number of recruits for India to meet the demand.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM requested the explanation promised by the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the increased charge for instruction in engineering.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the increase was owing to the augmentation of the salary of the Director, who had been raised to a higher rank.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that as the discussion on the details of the Vote appeared to have terminated, he wished to make a few observations on the details of the Vote generally. In the debate the other evening both the hon. Member for Lambeth and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon, appeared to join in the statement that £100 per man represented with sufficient accuracy the actual cost of our army. And it seemed, from the general tone of the debate, to be agreed that any reduction in our Army Estimates was to be looked for more in the reduction of the number of men rather than in the reduction of their cost. Last Session, also, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War told the House that a reduction of cost meant a reduction of efficiency. Now, against that doctrine he wished to protest, and he would take leave to advance a few figures in support of his view of the case. Nobody who looked at the present state of the country could believe that the army would remain on its present costly scale; and if the number of men were reduced, it came to nothing more than this:—That whenever war broke out again, we should witness, as in 1853-4, the melancholy spectacle of boys hurried out to the trenches, and again incur the humiliation and reproach of hunting in every foreign country for volunteers to fill our ranks. He looked, therefore, with distrust and dislike on the doctrine, that reducing the cost of the army must depend exclusively on a reduction in the number of men. How were they to discover whether the alternative of reducing the cost was possible? Last night a discussion regarding the cost of ships had taken place, and the test generally accepted was the expense which would be incurred in private dockyards. There were no private yards to compare with the army yard kept by the right hon. Gentleman, so that this test could not be applied literally. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: The Volunteers.] But a test analogous to that which he had referred to was supplied in the cost of armies kept by foreign Powers. In searching for an authorized statement of the cost of the armies of different European nations, he found one compiled by Von Reden, an eminent German statistician. He did not vouch for the calculations, but he would give them to the House as showing how strangely paradoxical was the position occupied by England. The document had been compiled about three years ago, for the troops of the "Sardinian" kingdom were included in it. The cost per head of the armies of Europe, according to this Prussian statistician, was in England, £93 15s.; in France, £34 7s.; in Sardinia, £30.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that the average of £93 15s. for the English army was obtained by dividing the total cost by the total number of men. It was by no means certain that in other countries the same principle was adopted, and unless the noble Lord could show that the foreign estimates were made upon the same principle as the English Estimates, and that the Yeomanry Militia and Volunteers were included, there would be no analogy between them. In some, half-pay was a separate account; unless, therefore, the noble Lord had verified all these details, the comparison he had begun to read was utterly worthless.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he did not know whether it was habitual for a Minister to interrupt a Member in the middle of his argument. At present he was merely laying what might be called prima facie evidence before the House; he hoped, however, before he concluded, to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman that there was the closest analogy between them. In Spain the cost of the army per man was £28 13s.; in Portugal, £28 1s.; in the German States, £28 12s.; and in Denmark it was only £12 12s. Now, he meant this statement merely as an introduction to further inquiries. He confessed, that when he saw it, he was much startled. Well, there had lately been added to the library of the House, a valuable contribution in the shape of a French "blue-book," which enabled him to make a more detailed comparison between the armies of England and France in regard to cost. The total cost of the English regular army, comprising 148,242 men, was £13,157,000, or £88 per head. The French army included 400,000 men and cost £14,515,702, or £36 5s. 10d. per man. Now, that cost was calculated upon precisely the same series of charges as those of the British army. He knew he should here be met by the argument of the conscription which existed in the French army. That, no doubt, was a most important consideration, for the services of the volunteer could not be secured at the same price as the pressed man. But then it was equally true that the French army occupied a different position to that of ours, for in France it was the greatest power in the State, and upon it the Crown actually rested, and it would not allow itself to be ill-used. But in order to eliminate the objection as to the conscription, he had ascertained what were precisely the non-combatant forces of both armies. There were the fighters and the non-fighters—the element that fought and the elements that wrote and manufactured. There was a very large number of men provided for in the right hon. Gentleman's Estimate who could not in any form be raised by conscription, and a reference to whom in comparison with the same classes in France was both fair and just. Now, he wanted the Committee to deduct from the £13,157,000 the cost of those that must be considered the non-combatant force of our army. They should, in the first instance, take away the pay and allowances of the non-effective force—namely, £5,700,000, deduct also the cost of its food, the commissariat supplies, and also the forage, although it was so mixed up with the other items in the Estimate it was difficult to separate it. Taking away, then, all those items, they obtained the sum total of £8,778,000, being the cost of the combatant force of the British army, whilst that of £4,378,460 was the precise cost of the non-combatant force, giving as the cost of each man £29 10s. Now, let them go through precisely the same operation with the French army, and see what was the expense that was due to the conscription. There were 400,000 men in the French army, the cost of which amounted, as he had said, to £14,515,702. For the combatant cost, taking out precisely the same items as those he had mentioned in connection with the English Estimates, they arrived at the amount £8,883,000 as the cost of the non-combatant force of the French army, being the proportion of £9 14s. 2d. as the cost of each man. And the Committee should never forget that the French army numbered 400,000, whilst ours numbered only 148,242 men. In other words, the English soldier cost two and a half as much as the French soldier, and in the non-combatant force each man in England cost three times as much as the man in a similar position in France. Why, the difference between the cost of the two forces was equal to threepence in the pound in the income tax. He had shown, he thought, that it could not any longer be said that it was the element of conscription which occasioned the greater expenses of the English army. But let them see the difference in a practical form. Let them suppose the scene to be altogether changed; let them suppose the French to have authority in this country, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of War was supplanted by Marshal Magnan. Let them imagine that the French system of economy in this respect was established in the place of our English mode of expenditure, and that the non-combatant expenses were regulated according to the French model—what would be the result? The proportion of the cost of each man of the non-combatant force of the French army was £9 14s. Let them multiply that by the number of men in the English non-combatant force; the result would be the sum of £1,447,516, which would be the cost of our non-combatant force if we managed things upon the model of French economy. Deducting that sum from the actual cost of that force—namely, £4,378,469, the result would be a saving of £2,930,000 upon the expenses of our non-combatant force, or, as he had before said, a saving equal to a reduction in our income tax of threepence in the pound. He trusted that he had now proved by the most unanswerable arguments that it was possible to reduce the Estimates without reducing the number of our men. In order to illustrate his argument more in detail, he would take the cost of the central administration in each army, preferring, as a civilian, to deal with civil matters. Here the contrast was even more striking. The cost in England for 148,000 men was £182,000; the cost in France for 400,000 men was £76,000. The proportion per man in England was £1 4s. 8d.; in France, 3s. 10d. In other words, we actually paid six times as much as the French. If we could administer the English system as cheaply as the French, the present Vote, instead of being £182,000, would be £28,000. Then as to the number of employés in the War Office, omitting the offices of the Adjutant General and the Quartermaster General, the number in England was 565; in France, 480. But what were they paid? In the English offices there were receiving more than £2,000 three persons, in the French only one; receiving more than £1,000 and less than £2,000, in England twelve persons, in the French not one. There were in England fifty-seven clerks, in the receipt of from £500 to £1,000 per annum; in France only seven. The French offices were calculated for an army of 400,000 men; the English for an army of 148,000. It was utterly inconceivable how the force of these figures could be evaded. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War might say that the constitution of the two countries was different—and that was an argument which it was impossible to meet, because nobody could tell what it meant. Probably, too, the right hon. Gentleman might state that intellectual wages were higher in England than in France. That was true enough; but as he had always understood the English characteristics they were these—that whereas you must pay twice as much for an Englishman as for a Frenchman, an Englishman did three times as much work as a Frenchman. The peculiarity of our War Office, above all others, seemed to be, that whereas its employés were paid twice as much as those of France, they only did a third of the work. Such was not the system by which our merchants and manufacturers had attained to their present pitch of prosperity, and had been able to beat their foreign competitors in all parts of the world. It was only in the Government offices that so strange a disproportion existed. The Secretary for War might tell the Committee that our War Office managed the affairs of the Volunteers. He did not know whether that entailed much additional work; he should be inclined to think it did not; but what did the French War Office manage? Owing to a form of government which he certainly did not approve, but which must be accepted as a fact, the French War Office had under its care and control the whole police of France. There was not an assassination, not a burglary, not a riot, not even a forgery committed in any part of France, that was not reported direct to the Minister of War; and whatever labour our Volunteers might throw on the English War Office, it was nothing compared with that involved in the management of the gendarmerie of France. He should listen to the reply of the right hon. Gentleman with great attention, but it distanced his powers of imagination to conceive how this enormous disproportion could be justified. Then there was the question of warlike stores. Whatever doubt might exist as to whether English clerks were better than French clerks, there could be none as to whether English workmen were better than French workmen. In warlike stores, made in great measure by machinery, we certainly ought to be able to do as much for less money than the French. It was in the item for warlike stores that the great reductions so much wanted had been made. The Secretary for War had cut off about £1,000,000 at a blow. He wished to show the Committee what splendid ruins the right hon. Gentleman had left, in order that they might judge of the magnificence of the original structure. The cost of warlike stores was £1,794,000; but £680,000 had to be deducted for naval stores, leaving a balance of £1,114,000. The proportion per man in the army was £7 10s. 3d. In France the warlike stores cost £327,681, and the proportion per man was 16s. 2d. If we could manage our warlike stores as economically as they did in France, instead of £1,114,000, we would expend £119,000, and the saving upon this Vote alone would be £995,000. Such were the results of his examination of the blue-book in the library. For the honour of his country he should be glad to find his figures wrong, because the comparison he had made indicated one of the most disgraceful states of things that could be conceived. He made no personal charge against the Secretary for War. In common with every Member of that House he deeply respected his talents and accomplishments, and he knew that a good workman liked an expensive tool. The blame rested not with the right hon. Gentleman, but with themselves. The evils he had pointed out could not be remedied by any of those small parings which were sometimes suggested. What was wanted was not a saving in this or that item, but the re-casting of a vicious organization. They could not expect the Secretary for War to incur the extreme odium—certainly from below, probably from elsewhere—of effecting a thorough reform, unless he was fortified by the opinion of that House and of the country. That opinion it was their business to form. Let them first ascertain and sift the truth, and then let them discuss it until they had provided officials like the right hon. Gentleman, with a strength sufficient to complete the work. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would be glad to move a smaller Estimate, but they could not safely neglect their duty. For the last few years we had enjoyed great prosperity, and could well afford to keep a few more clerks in a comfortable position; but dark times were at hand. Our principal industry had suffered a reverse, from which there was no prospect of its recovering, and there was every probability, that when that anticipation of future supplies from America was ended, we should feel the effects of the convulsion there far more severely than at present. Then the call for economy would become too loud to be resisted. He was anxious to direct it into a right channel. There was nothing he dreaded so much as the reduction of our army to the point at which it stood a few years ago; but if they could lead the people to believe that they might relieve the taxpayer by diminishing the expense of the army while maintaining its numbers and efficiency, they would be able to accede to the demand for economy, and to mitigate the distress of large classes without doing any permanent injury to the interest of the country.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that the Committee were greatly obliged to the noble Lord for his able and interesting statement, though he thought some of his points might be answered. For example, in going into a comparison of the expense of the War Offices of the two countries, there were points of difference which should not be overlooked. The business of the French War Office was almost entirely conducted by military clerks. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: The whole is charged in the Estimate.] He had no doubt, however, that in many respects the observations of the noble Lord were well-founded. The real point of the noble Lord's argument lay in the system of the administration of the War Office—but as to that he should give no opinion. Some years ago he was staying with General Canrobert, who said to him one day, "You have the finest soldiers in the world, but your whole system is bad and cannot be compared to ours, which is such that French troops are always ready for service." If, he said, he received that moment a telegraphic order to march to Lyons, his men were ready to march, because the provision of food and everything the army wanted were in the hands of the Intendant Général, and the army had nothing to do but to fight. The noble Lord had also omitted altogether the expenses of transports. The expense of transport in the English service was enormously greater than that in the French; and English soldiers, like English labourers or navvies, were paid at a much higher rate than French ones. While we were put to great expense in erecting huts for our men, the French soldiers when in camp built their own houses; and in the same manner, while the clothing of our army was made by contractors, that of the French army was all made in barracks. From an amendment in this system, and from the development of soldiers' clubs and institutes, and other means for preserving the health and improving the character of our soldiers, he anticipated a considerable reduction in the expense of our army.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that when, some years ago, he had the charge of an office which involved the provision of the Ways and Means of meeting the expenditure of the War, as well as other Departments, he went through a statistical study very similar to that upon which the noble Lord had so laudably employed himself—namely, a comparison of the detailed expenditure of the English and French armies. He was then very much struck with the difference in these expenses, and especially the lower rate with which the French appeared to accomplish the object which we accomplished at a higher rate. He then sent over to Paris a gentleman who received great facilities from the French War Office, and made a confidential report to the English Government on the very subject to which the noble Lord had called the attention of the Committee. He regretted, however, to say, that he found the inquiry, although interesting in a statistical point of view, altogether barren of practical results, so different were the circumstances of the English and the French armies. The French army was formed by conscription; the English by voluntary recruiting. The rates of wages were totally different in the two countries, and altogether the systems of finance were different. Perhaps any Gentleman who took the Almanach de Gotha, or whatever was the authority the noble Lord followed —[Lord ROBERT CECIL: I followed the French blue-book.] He supposed that the Almanach de Gotha was an authentic transcript of the French blue-book. In it the noble Lord would find, in the first place, that the French budget was framed two or three years in advance, and was made on the system of providing only for ordinary expenditure. There were often extraordinary credits allowed in aid of the ordinary expenditure, and unless these were taken into account, very erroneous results were arrived at. He held in his hand the work which was readiest to hand—the Almanach de Gotha—a book to which the noble Lord objected, but which he believed to be perfectly accurate; and in it he found that in the years 1862-3, the Minister of War demanded 366,000,000*f.*; but then there was an extraordinary budget of 7,889,000*f.* Then there was, for the general government of Algeria, 14,000,000*f.*; and this, he apprehended, included in part military expenditure. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: It includes no war expenditure.] Then there was an extraordinary budget of 3,000,000*f.* for Algeria; and he supposed some part of that must be due to war. It was difficult to make a comparison of this kind without minute inquiry; and he did not believe that any practical result could be arrived at from these comparative views. If the noble Lord was prepared to act on his principle, he ought to propose to reduce the pay of the army. ["No, no!"] Then what was the value of the calculation? The noble Lord said that the expenditure for our army was excessive as compared with the expenditure of the French army.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: What I laid stress on was the non-combatant expenditure. I do not want to reduce the pay, pension, or food of the soldiers.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Then the noble Lord set aside the pay, pension, and food of the army. Well, that cleared away a considerable part of the ground, and narrowed the question. It was now admitted that the pay of the army and the pay of the navy—for the army and the navy must go together in this matter—was moderate and reasonable, and was not to be touched. His argument, then, was directed exclusively to the non-combatant part of the army. As he (Sir George Lewis) understood, this included the Militia. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: No; I entirely excluded all the auxiliary forces.] Then the noble Lord included the wages of the artificers? [Lord ROBERT CECIL: No doubt of it.] Then precisely the same argument applied to the wages of artificers as applied to the pay of the army and navy. It was impossible by any Vote of that House to lower the wages of the artificers. They depended on the market rate of wages in the country, and the Government must deal with those things as they found them. They could not regulate the wages of labour. Precisely the same argument applied to the clerks in the War Office. It was true that the clerks in the War Office were paid higher than the clerks in the Office of the Ministry of War at Paris. If the noble Lord wished to diminish the salaries of the clerks at the War Office, he must apply the same process to the clerks in the Treasury, the Home Office, the Foreign Office, the Admiralty, and the whole Civil Service of the country. The War Office stood on the same footing as every other branch of the Civil Service; and the noble Lord could not compare merely the War Office of London and the War Office of Paris unless he compared every other office in London with every other similar office in Paris. The truth was, all these comparisons were deceptive. They led to no practical result. All we could do was to compare the Estimates of one year with the Estimates of another, and say whether, taking the whole circumstances of England, the circumstances of our army, and the circumstances of our community, we could effect any material reduction in our expenditure. He (Sir George Lewis) had attempted to show, in introducing the Vote, that the Government had this year reduced the army within as narrow a limit as was consistent with the exigencies of the public service. It was with the pay of the army they were now dealing, and he hoped the Committee would vote the amount asked for without entering on the discussion of matters that were irrelevant to the Vote.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that the very able and important statement of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) ought not to be treated in the manner it had been by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis), who could scarcely have misunderstood the noble Lord to the extent he professed to have done. He believed, with the noble Lord, that undue expenditure was to be attributed to mismanagement, and that great extravagance existed in respect to the non-combatant part of the army. He entirely concurred in that opinion, and he hoped that the noble Lord's speech would have the effect of making them watch the Estimates carefully in Committee, with a view to reduction. When the proper time came, he should himself be able to show one item of enormous unnecessary expenditure—and ex uno disce omnes. The gymnasias and other soldiers' institutes in France were, he believed, conducted much better than in England, and with much more advantage to the men. It was at our War Office that money was wasted, and, as the noble Lord had pointed out, in other armies there was much more done by military men than there was in ours. Our clothing establishments were now monstrous, and they were a source of outrageous and unjustifiable expense which was saved in other armies, because the clothing system was managed by regimental soldiers. He hoped the Committee would not lose sight of the valuable remarks of the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil).

MAJOR O'REILLY said, that the right hon. Baronet, in his answer to the noble Lord, had fallen into some inaccuracies which he desired to correct. The French War Minister, the right hon. Gentleman said, came down at the end of the year with extraordinary budgets; and he had mentioned one amounting to 3,000,000*l.* But that was for an extra number of men kept up, and extra war expenses incurred in China, Mexico, and elsewhere—and it should be remembered that that House was not unaccustomed to extra budgets for war expenditure incurred in the period provided for by the Estimates. The French Estimates were perfectly accurate for the number of men provided for. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the large expenditure for Algeria. If he would glance at the budget de la guerre he would find first the charge for the army at home, and secondly that for the army in Algeria; and he would see that the cost of the artillery at home and then that of the artillery in Algeria was included in the War Estimates. The cost of the civil administration in Algeria was a distinct matter. As to the difference in the charge for the pay and allowances of the soldiers of the two countries being caused by the existence of the conscription in the one case and its absence in the other, he must confess he was surprised to find the difference so little as it actually was. The pay and food of the English infantry soldier cost 13*d.* per day; and the pay and food of the French infantry soldier cost something over 10*d.* per day. In France it varied in different regiments and according to different circumstances, but it was never less than 10*d.*, and was in most cases 11*d.* per day. The English cavalry soldier's allowance, and he believed also that of the artillery, was 16*d.* per day, while in France the artillery's highest pay was 13*d.* While the difference between the pay of the individual man was only 16 per cent, the cost of the English soldier to the country was infinitely more than that of the French soldier. It was not the conscription which caused that immense difference, although it accounted for some small part of it. It was said that wages were higher in England than in France; but every commercial man knew, that whatever might be the rate of wages per day in England as compared with France, the cost of labour was less in England than in that country. If it were not so, as the noble Lord had truly said, we could not maintain our commercial superiority. Therefore, the item of wages would not account for our excess of expense. Then it was said, that the clerks were paid more in this country; but the higher rate of pay had nothing to do with the number employed. He had made these remarks because he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that careful examinations of the cost of our army as compared with the armies of other countries were useless; and he thought, that if the right hon. Gentleman would apply his clear intellect to these practical matters instead of to the abstract inquiries in which he delighted, great advantage might accrue to the country.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART maintained that though wages might be higher in England than in France labour was much more efficient here than there. The proof of that lay in the fact that in England every branch of business could be carried on at less expense than in France, with the single exception of the business of our Government Departments. The thanks of the House were due to the noble Lord opposite for calling attention to this subject in so clear and forcible a manner; and it was to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis), who was not personally accountable for the present system, would direct his energies to its reformation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the noble Lord opposite, by his lucid, argumentative, and conclusive speech, had done good service to the country, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, had not answered it—indeed, it would be unfair to expect him to do so on the spur of the moment. All he had attempted to do had been to state one or two things which the noble Lord expressly excluded from his comparison, and which evidently had nothing to do with it. The right hon.

Gentleman stated that the payment of artificers was less in France than it was here; but that could not account for the difference of cost which had been pointed out.

He himself as a manufacturer, could meet the French manufacturers with a 15 per cent duty at their back, because, though he could not compete with them in taste, he was able to get things made cheaper than they could. He did not think that they would be able to get people to work at a lower comparative cost than the Government did. They often heard in that House comparisons drawn between the comparative expenditure of the English and French navies; and he thought they ought to be much obliged to the noble Lord for his valuable comparison of the expenditure of the French and English armies.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that as his hon. Friend wished this matter to be inquired into, he could only say that he had inquired into it in former years and found the investigation a very barren one. The noble Lord's comparison rested on what he called the non-combatant part of the Estimates. Would he have the goodness to state what items he included? He had given the amount at about £4,000,000.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he had ascertained the non-combatant expenses by deducting the combatant expenses from the total amount of the Estimates; and he had compared the former with precisely similar items in the French budget. He excluded the first Vote—pay and allowances, and food and forage in the Commissariat Vote, but not movements of troops. He also left out the auxiliary forces.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was unable to understand the plan on which the noble Lord proceeded. The topographical department was not a combatant one, and there was not a corresponding item in the French budget. Barrack establishments and martial law were necessary to an efficient army, and it appeared to him that they could not be considered as part of the non-combatant expenditure.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that excluding the pay and food of the army, he took all other expenses and called them non-combatants; but if exceptions were taken to the word, he would adopt any other which meant the same thing. He had included clothing and fortifications.

GENERAL PEEL said, that they were on the first Vote, pay and allowances, and this discussion had been irregular.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, his object had been to prove that retrenchment could be effected without reducing this Vote. Some said that in order to reduce the army expenditure, you must reduce the army, but he said, "No, you must reduce expenditure without reducing the army."

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,223,936, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Commissariat Establishment, Services, and Movement of Troops, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

MR. ARTHUR MILLS moved that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £80,424, the cost of Commissariat transport in the colonies. No greater jobs were perpetrated than in the transport service in the Colonies. In the Kafir war, in an ineffectual attempt to capture the chief Sandilli, Sir Harry Smith stated that £56,000 had been laid out for waggon-hire alone in what he termed "a bit of a brush." The Vote, moreover, was one which might be reduced without inflicting any injury on the Colonies themselves, while a division upon it would test the views of the Committee upon the question whether populations which enjoyed the advantages of self-government should not have fair notice that they must not rely entirely on Imperial resources, which were already very heavily burdened, to defray all the expenditure which they might incur in their own defence.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £80,424, for Commissariat Establishment and Transport of Troops in the Colonies, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the Committee would see that it was impossible to pass this Amendment. If the hon. Gentleman thought the expense immediately in question should be borne by the Colonies, the proper course for him to pursue would be to move a specific Resolution to that effect. But even if such a Resolution were carried, it would not be binding on the Colonies, unless embodied in an Act of Parliament. Then came the question, how far the House was prepared to tax the Colonies; which would necessarily be the result of a Vote of this sort.

With respect to the reduction proposed, the regular course would be to vote the money, and then look to the Colonies for repayment, as was done in other cases in which they contributed to military expenditure. The sum asked for, however, was one without the aid of which the movement of troops in our colonial possessions could not be effected; and if the Committee were to strike it out, the result would be to paralyse so far the public service abroad. The Motion would not, therefore, he trusted, be agreed to.

Mr. CHILDERS said, that the Vote raised the practical question, to what extent it was possible to reduce our military expenditure in those Colonies which were able to bear a larger amount of it than was now imposed upon them? That question was, he contended, in no way mixed up with that of the number of troops which it was expedient we should maintain there. He thought they were in a position to insist on a reduction of this Vote, even in the current year. He believed the Government were anxious to reduce, as much as possible, the unnecessary military expenditure of the Colonies, and he thought they would be thankful to the House for enforcing such moderate reductions as should indicate that it was the determination of Parliament to proceed in that course. He believed they might, without the least danger or pressure on the Colonies, cut off the sum proposed by his hon. Friend. In dealing with this question the usual course on the part of the Government had been first to call on the Colonies to bear barrack and commissariat expenditure, next extra pay, and only in the last resort the imperial pay of the troops. The present, then, was the Vote which would stand first in order for reduction. Of this Vote, £552,000 was for colonial commissariat expenditure, of which £300,000 applied to the colonies proper. If, then, they could make a moderate reduction in the whole Vote especially applicable to that branch of the Estimates, they would be indicating unmistakably that the expenditure for commissariat purposes ought to be reduced in those Colonies; and he did not think that a reduction of £80,000, which was only about one-fourth of the whole charge, could be considered an extravagant proposition. Take for instance the case of the Mauritius:—The military expenditure at the present time amounted to £151,000, to which the colony only contributed £10,000, and some extra allowances to officers. According to the last blue-book, the actual balance of revenue over expenditure in the Mauritius was no less than £84,600, and the general financial position of the Colony was stated to be exceedingly satisfactory. There were investments at home in the name of the Government to the extent of £293,000, and they had lent the local banks, by way of deposit, £120,000. The Mauritius had, in fact, a cash surplus of £500,000; and surely that was a case in which the Government were entitled to exact a larger contribution from the colonial revenue towards military expenditure. It might be said that the Mauritius was not self-governed; but in his opinion the case was quite as strong as the case of any Colony having a Legislative Assembly. In Ceylon there was an average revenue in excess of expenditure of £50,000. The local contributions were larger than those of the Mauritius, but still there was a large charge on the Imperial revenue for the Island of Ceylon; and that charge might be gradually reduced without trenching on the legitimate means at the disposal of the Colony. Our commissariat expenditure at the Cape of Good Hope during the next financial year would be £102,000. The Colony had greatly retrieved its financial position. Its revenues were about £400,000 a year; but it only contributed to the extent of £10,000. It would be but fair that the Cape of Good Hope should pay some part of the commissariat expenditure. The case of the West Indies was also a strong one; and Jamaica and Barbadoes should be called on to contribute towards the commissariat expenditure. He should like to have some explanation of the cause of the very large increase of the military expenditure in Jamaica in the last few years. Without going at all into the question of the North American Colonies, where there was going on a sort of anticipatory war expenditure, he thought, in the cases enumerated, ground had been shown for the diminution of the Vote proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. A. Mills).

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, that the question raised by his Motion was a reduction of the gross sum by £80,000. His proposal was not that the Government should be compelled to strike off the whole of the commissariat transport expenditure.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE remarked, that the examples quoted by his

hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) were not examples of commissariat transport merely, but of commissariat supplies. With regard to the proposition before the Committee, it seemed to him a rather novel mode of reducing the colonial military expenditure to attack this particular item. This sum of £80,000 was not a charge for the movement of troops in self-governed or other colonies, for the internal purposes of those colonies. The rule laid down and acted upon was that when troops were moved within a Colony for any purpose which came under the head of police or the maintenance of internal order, all the expenses should be recovered from the colonial Government. But this sum, which it was proposed to strike off, was for the necessary and ordinary transport, for the purpose of supplying the troops with food and forage in their different stations. It included, no doubt, the movement of troops within the limits of a certain command; but the whole was as much a part of the ordinary and necessary expenditure for troops in the Colonies as any other item in the Estimates, and it would be quite as reasonable to reduce the sums for food, forage, clothing, or pay, as to reduce this charge, which was necessary if troops were to be maintained in the Colonies at all. As to Ceylon and the Mauritius, there was no doubt much that deserved the attention of the Government, those Colonies having recently enjoyed a great degree of prosperity, and the Colonial Secretary was now in communication with the Treasury and the Horse Guards upon the subject, and had also prepared the Governments of those Colonies to receive a requisition from this country for an increased contribution to their military expenditure. With regard to the Cape, the case was not quite so simple. There a force had been maintained—a force capable of protecting the settlers from formidable external enemies—but the duty was now being performed at a much smaller cost than it had ever been before, the force maintained in South Africa having been reduced, within the last three or four years, from 10,000 to 4,000 men; and as the local border force, which the colonists, much to their credit, had established, became extended, the cost to this country for troops at the Cape would be still further reduced; and the Secretary of State would prepare them for such a reduction.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, he thought that when the Committee were called upon to cut down this Vote, they were asked to act without due consideration of the consequences. It was underlaid by a great principle affecting their colonial possessions. If they asked the Colonies to provide any portion of what was required for the movement of the army in the Colonies, they gave to the Colonies a voice in the management of the army. And he would put this case:—Supposing they had two regiments at Quebec and wanted to move them to Toronto, they being partly paid by the colonial Government, it might object to that removal, and the management would in fact pass out of the Imperial Government's hands; and if they put any portion of the management in colonial hands, they destroyed the home management. He was not unprepared for placing the protection of the Colonies in their own hands, but he did not wish to do it by a side wind. If they wanted Canada to defend herself, they should tell her so, and not come to the House on the Army Estimates and press the right hon. Gentleman to cut down the Estimate by £80,000 in a manner which would divest the home authorities of the management of the army, which was a course he was certainly not prepared to sanction.

Lord STANLEY said, he feared the Committee were getting into a difficulty. The proposal of his hon. Friend for a reduction was in substance right, but he was not taking the right way to do it. The object was to reduce the amount of the colonial military expenses. If that reduction was to be made, it should be on the whole colonial expenditure, and not on any single Vote such as that for transports or commissariat, because that expense must be in proportion to the number of troops. What was desired was to impress upon the Government, that the number of men in the Colonies paid for by the Imperial Treasury must be reduced. The question of military expenditure was a large one, but he believed that it was not one upon which any inflexible rule could be laid down. Take the case of the British provinces of North America. If it were proposed to throw upon the local Government the whole expense of military defence, the people of those Colonies would reply, "We are not likely to be drawn into any quarrel with anybody except the United States; and if we are drawn into a quarrel with them, it will be in consequence, not of our policy, but of the policy of the Imperial Government." Such a course, therefore, would not be wise in the case of Canada:—with regard to some of the other Colonies the case was widely different. He did not think it was wise absolutely to guarantee the colonists against Native incursions, for the result was that instead of being deprecated, and instead of every effort to avoid them, Native wars were looked upon as things to be desired by a portion of the European population, to whose advantage they tended. That was the case both of New Zealand and of the Cape. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies spoke in terms of high praise of what the colonists of the Cape were doing, and he said they had actually raised a very efficient militia force for their own defence. Obviously, the impression on the mind of his hon. Friend and on the minds of the people at the Cape, was, that they were doing England a great favour by condescending to protect themselves. This was the state of feeling they were encouraging in the Colonies by this very liberality of protecting them against internal dangers. He repeated, he did not think that they could lay down a uniform rule. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Roebuck) that they should be careful of putting any portion of the Imperial forces, under the control of the colonial Assemblies. The rule of the Government should be plain and simple; it should be, not to call upon colonial communities to pay for any part of the troops, but to decide without reference to them what number of troops might be considered a fair contribution on the part of the Empire at large to their defence. Having done that, leave them to supply what was wanting by a local militia or anything else, and no question could arise between the Imperial and local Governments. But if any attempt was made to ask the colonial Government to pay for Imperial troops, they would get into an embarrassing discussion, and they might be placed in the position of calling upon the local Government to make a payment which it declined to make, and which we had no power of enforcing. He did not think this question was before the Committee in the most satisfactory manner, and for his own part, he would be glad if they did not go to a division upon it, because it would not do justice to the cause—in the main a good one—which the hon. Gentleman had taken up.

Lord Stanley

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had not intended to say that the Cape colonists deserved any great credit or praise for forming a local force for their own defence; he only meant that it was the business of the Secretary of State to induce them to substitute such a force for a considerable portion of the Imperial troops now maintained there. The difficulty which his noble Friend the Colonial Secretary felt in fixing the number of troops at such a colony as the Cape was, that if one of the formidable Native tribes made an incursion, the House of Commons would hold the Government responsible. So long as the House expected the Government to protect the Cape from savage wars and massacres, so long would the Secretary of State, feeling the burden of this responsibility, hesitate to diminish a garrison which might undoubtedly be the means of preventing such scenes.

MR. BUXTON suggested, as the question was so wide and important, and was not sufficiently raised by the Amendment proposed, that his hon. Friend should withdraw the present Motion, and bring the whole subject before the House, as was done last year. The dimensions of the question were far too great to be dealt with by mere conversations in Committee of Supply. For one, he was extremely disappointed to see how small a distance the Government had gone in the way which had been so clearly pointed out by public opinion last year. If the subject were brought forward in a more formal manner, the House might be able to give the Government a good shove forward.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), and the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), as to placing any portion of the army under the colonial Assemblies, so as to deprive the people of the control of their own army; but that view of the case was not at all incompatible with the Motion of the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Arthur Mills). There was ground for reduction, and he should vote with the hon. Member. He wished to point out, that although there was a nominal reduction in the amount of the Vote, there was an overflowing increase in the staff of officers employed in providing these supplies. Would the right hon. Baronet explain how it was that the Commissariat Staff costs £97,000, against £94,000 last year, while the net cost of provision was only £463,000 as against £495,000 last year; and also why the pay of Commissariat artificers and others was £17,995 as against £12,860? Every year the expenses in this direction were increasing, while the provisions of the establishment were decreasing in amount; that was in another portion of the non-combatant part of the British army, which had been before alluded to.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he must admit that the Motion was rather inconvenient, yet if persevered in by the hon. Member for Taunton, he would certainly vote for it. He regretted that the Government had not done more to induce the Colonies to undertake their own defence. It was perfectly true that the objection was connected with a much larger question—that of the policy of this country lavishing both men and money in all the distant parts of the British Empire. He ventured to say that in his opinion every farthing of this expenditure was not only money to the British people absolutely wasted, but it was money spent as injuriously for those for whom it was spent as those by whom it was spent. He knew it might be said that we have the troops there now, and, having the troops there, that we must pay for their supplies and their travelling. Well, that was perfectly true; but he would nevertheless vote for the reduction proposed, and leave it to the Government to find out how they may furnish these supplies during the remainder of the year. The sum was not large, and the effect would be to quicken the pace of the Government in bringing this question to its proper and legitimate issue. They were told by the Under Secretary for the Colonies that this transport was for Imperial purposes. He would like the hon. Gentleman to go a little further, and tell them what he meant by Imperial purposes. He told them, that if these troops were moved internally in the Colonies for such local purposes as riots, the expense of such transport would be repaid to the British Treasury. He very much doubted whether that had been the case, though it might have been done in some instances. But what did he consider Imperial purposes? Our troops were in New Zealand to put down Native riots, in the Cape to prevent the cattle of the English farmer from being stolen by the Kaffir, and in the West Indies to keep down the blacks. In these instances, were the purposes for which they were used and transported Imperial purposes? The Colonies were, in fact, practically using 40,000 of our troops for their own local purposes. The case of Canada was no exception. It was the position of Canada on the frontier of a country that was in a state of disturbance, and not any policy of ours, that constituted the danger of British North America. The hon. Member for Sheffield had said, "Don't let the colonists pay for the troops, as it will give them the command of them!" In what sense would it do that? The colonists could no more interfere in the command and use of the troops than we could ourselves—but only by stopping the supplies.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE explained, that he said nothing about Imperial purposes. He merely stated that the sum of £80,000, the cost of transport, stood exactly on the same footing as the provisions themselves, and the clothing and pay of the troops.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS wished to explain the course he had taken, so that he might be clearly understood. It was true he particularly directed his remarks to that portion of the Vote, but he now spoke generally of the commissariat expenditure in the Colonies as being, in his opinion, one of great extravagance, and one which he thought was a fair subject for selection in criticising this portion of the Estimates. He had said that there were eight or ten self-governed Colonies whose revenue exceeded their expenditure, and to which, therefore, they could apply the effect of his proposition as they might think proper. If the Colonies would not take the burden upon themselves of maintaining a proper number of troops, they ought to take the consequences. It had been resolved that the Colonies ought to bear their fair proportion of the cost of defending themselves, and in order to obtain some practical result from that Resolution he had moved this reduction of the Vote.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE thought that the hon. Member had by his Motion put the question before them in a practical way, and he himself thought that it was extremely important that they should come to an understanding with the Colonies in reference to an expense which was so local in its character as commissariat establishments. He was not, however, so sure that his hon. Friend had chosen the best time for bringing his proposition forward. Many items of detail were already paid for by the Colonies; and if the Committee insisted upon their bearing a larger portion of the cost of the commissariat, the Government would find a way of bringing about an arrangement.

MR. CAVE agreed with those who thought that the expenditure on the commissariat in almost all the Colonies was extravagant and ought to be cut down. But the gist of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment was that the Colonies ought to pay for their own defence. He thought the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn put the matter in its true light when he said it was impossible to lay down any general rule on that subject. When Colonies required troops for their own defence, they ought to pay a portion of the expense; but troops might be employed in a Colony when the Colony itself did not want them. This especially applied to Colonies like New Zealand and the Cape, which were threatened by barbarous neighbours. In the early history of the Cape of Good Hope the colonists did defend themselves against the savage tribes around them; but the border warfare in the Cape, like border warfare in every part of the world, was attended with circumstances of atrocity on both sides, and this country insisted that hostilities should be carried on according to the rules of European warfare. Hence regular troops, and even a regiment of lancers, were sent into the Bush, at vast expense, and with unsatisfactory results. Now, if we insisted on Colonies defending themselves, they would demand the right of doing so in their own way and in the cheapest manner. Were we prepared to accede that to them? This was a serious question, and one which ought to be well weighed by the House before adopting any general proposition of this kind.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he thought that the best way of preventing colonial wars, which entailed upon us so much expense, was to take care that it was not the interest of the Colonies to have such wars. At present it was the interest of a colony to have a war; for, however much individuals suffered, the Colony gained by men and money being brought into the colony. If the hon. Member for Taunton pressed his Motion to a division, he should certainly vote for it.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment, as at present framed, was for the omission of the commissariat and transport expenses alone.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, that his intention was simply that the general Vote for the Military expenses of the colonies should be reduced by £80,000.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,143,936, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Commissariat Establishment, Services, and Movement of Troops, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st of March 1864, inclusive."—(Mr. Arthur Mills.)

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that though the form of the Amendment might be altered, in substance it was still pretty much the same, as the hon. Member in his speech had touched almost exclusively on this item of £80,000. He had since explained that he wished the reduction to be applied only to those Colonies which had Houses of Assembly, and excluded the Crown Colonies. If it had been directed against the Crown Colonies, it would at least have been a practical Motion, since for them the Queen could legislate by Order in Council. But for the colonies having Houses of Assembly the Crown could not legislate, and the Amendment, if carried, would only throw on the Government a duty which they could not discharge. That could only be done by an Act of Parliament; and to call on any Colony to pay a certain sum into the Imperial Exchequer without their own consent was very like falling back on the old plan of taxing the Colonies. There were only two practical courses open to the House and the Government with respect to the diminution of colonial military expenses. One was for the House to legislate on the subject, which would be departing from the rule religiously observed since the American War; the other was to withdraw our troops from the Colonies. If the House would point out any Colonies where that could be done, the Government would then know how to act. But, instead of the thing being done by a side wind, the question of withdrawing our troops ought to be raised distinctly, and a Vote taken upon it.

MR. MONSELL said, he understood the meaning of this Amendment to be that the hon. Member opposite was not satisfied with what the Government had done to carry out the Motion proposed by him last year on the subject of military expenditure in the Colonies to which they had assented. It was not just that the mother country should contribute to the expenses of any Colony which could perfectly well pay for itself, and he could not understand how any hon. Member who was really in favour of a reduction in our colonial military expenditure could vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Taunton.

MAJOR GAVIN said, that our soldiers did not wish to go to New Zealand or the Cape of Good Hope, but in the discharge of their arduous duties in a foreign climate they needed supplies, and he trusted the Committee would do nothing prejudicial to the interests of those gallant men.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 71: Majority 6.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £630,385, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Clothing Establishments, Services, and Supplies, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

COLONEL DICKSON moved that the Chairman report Progress, on account of the lateness of the hour (eleven o'clock).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS resisted the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. W. WILLIAMS then asked for an explanation of the item of £4,500 for machinery in this Vote for clothing establishments.

COLONEL DICKSON moved a reduction of £25,000 in the Vote. This was a Vote for the non-combatant part of the army, the expense of which was constantly increasing without any corresponding advantage to the soldier. The expense of the establishment at Pimlico alone for clothing, with allowance for the proper deductions, was £52,000. There were also various expensive officers connected with that institution, who raised the expense to upwards of £62,000. The same argument was applicable to all the new establishments of the same kind, many of which were utterly useless. The mere cost of superintendence was upwards of £8,000. The clothing of the army in France was under regimental officers, and nothing could be better managed. He therefore begged leave to move that this Vote be reduced by £25,000.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, it appeared there were clothing buildings at Pimlico and others at Woolwich. It was very objectionable to scatter these buildings about the country instead of having them in one place. The less the Government had to do with manufactures the better, for he believed that no Government establishment paid in a commercial point of view.

MR. PAGET said, that every obstacle was thrown in the way of manufacturers by the viewers. In one case the members of two firms in Nottingham were refused a contract to supply 30,000 pairs of cotton socks of a particular pattern, because the machinery was obsolete by which they were to be made. They afterwards found, that an article by no means identical with the pattern had been accepted from other contractors. This showed, that either the viewers did not know their duty, or else that they were accessible to improper influences. In another case, some pantaloons drawers were bought by the War Office, at a profit to those who supplied them of thirty-five per cent on the first cost. There was no man with the feelings of a gentleman to whom the manufacturers, if their goods were rejected by the viewers, could apply to say whether the goods were of the proper pattern or not. He trusted the facts he had brought before the Committee would induce the Government to make some change for the better in the present system.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there was a diminution in this Vote, as compared with that of last year, of £36,000. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dickson) had unintentionally exaggerated the expense of the establishments, by including the cost of new buildings and other works, to the amount of £20,000, for those items would not be annually required. Expense, of course, there must be in establishments of the kind where work was given out and received in again, and where a close inspection must be maintained. After considerable examination he had arrived at the conclusion that the work done at the Pimlico manufactory was most satisfactory; and, to say the least, colonels did not prefer the work of contractors. There was a small establishment at Woolwich for the supply of clothing to the Artillery and Engineers, which it was not considered advisable to give up. Very little work was done on the premises at Pimlico; most of it was given out to workwomen and men, who took it to their own houses, and the materials were carefully examined both before and after being made up. The process of inspection was an elaborate one, but the result was generally satisfactory. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Paget), he could only say that a few years back the pattern for hosiery was antiquated, and that fact excluded a considerable number of competitors from the tenders. But now a modern sort of sock had been selected, both for woollen and cotton hosiery, and he believed the inconvenience to which his hon. Friend had adverted did not exist.

COLONEL KNOX said, he had the testimony of commanding officers of regiments to the satisfactory work which was turned out of the manufactory at Pimlico. He had at first been opposed to having an establishment of the kind conducted by Government; but he had heard so many officers express their approval of the work produced there, that he had come to the conclusion that it would be well if all the clothing of the army was made at Pimlico. He thought that the double system of private contractors and Government manufacturers should be got rid of, and one or the other adopted.

LORD LOVAINE said, no one who had compared the work done at Pimlico with that of the contractors could have a doubt of the superiority of the former; and as this work materially contributed to the health and comfort of the men, any money laid out upon the establishment would be well spent.

MR. MONSELL trusted that the Secretary for War would appoint some one in whom he had confidence to compare the work produced at Pimlico with that of the contractors, and he was quite sure the latter would be found equal, if not superior. He spoke in the interest of several poor people of the city of Limerick, who were employed by the contractors; but he was quite willing to abide by the issue of such a comparison as he had urged the right hon. Gentleman to make.

MR. MACEVOY said, that Government were making such large workshops it seemed as if they were about to become their own manufacturers. If that were so, he thought it ought to be stated so in the Vote.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he did not object to the principle of the Government having a clothing establishment of their own, but said he found, on referring to the Estimates, that almost every officer employed at Pimlico had got an addition to their pay during the last year. It was in this way that establishments attained large proportions and became permanently expensive to the country. These persons might, perhaps, be worthy of the increased remuneration; but if the combatant part of the army had asked for an addition to their pay, they would have been told that the country could not afford it, or that others could be got to serve for the existing pay.

MR. CAVE could understand the two hon. Members for Limerick taking this view, because the manufacture of army clothing formed an important branch of industry in that county. Mr. Tait, the Limerick contractor, had, as appeared from his evidence before the Weedon Commission, already a very large share of the contracts; but, being an ambitious man, he wanted to clothe the whole army. Now, as the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) had pleaded the cause of the poor there, he (Mr. Cave) also asked for some slight share of the work for the poor people in different parts of the country, for it was a mistake to call the Pimlico establishment a factory; it was only a place where work was given out, inspected, and stored. The inquiry of 1858 proved that the Woolwich establishment, which originated during the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of office, had turned out far better clothing than any then known, and while paying better wages in consequence of getting rid of the piece-masters, had not raised the price to the country. He did not wish to see either the Government factories too greatly increased or the whole of the manufacture of clothing fall into the hands of large contractors. The two systems might exist together, and form a check on each other.

MAJOR GAVIN opposed the item. All that his constituents asked for was competitive examination, the principle so much favoured in every department. An experience of twenty-four years in the army had satisfied him that the clothing made by contract was always the best.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he should be happy to furnish any facilities in his power for a comparison between contract clothing and clothing manufactured at Pimlico. But it was exceedingly difficult to institute a fair comparison between them, and it would be necessary, in the first instance, to settle the details on which the investigation could take place. He felt sure that the apparent advantages of any such comparison would appear at the first blush to be in favour of the Pimlico establishment.

LORD LOVAINE complained that the establishment at Pimlico was intended to work not only for the army, but for the Volunteer service, and also for convicts.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £605,385, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Clothing Establishments, Services, and Supplies, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive,"

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

UNION RELIEF AID ACT (1862) CONTINUANCE BILL—(No 35.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which he would briefly explain. Their Lordships would remember that an Act was passed towards the close of last Session enabling certain unions of Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire to exercise borrowing powers with a view of meeting the prevalent distress under certain conditions. The different unions throughout the counties, with the assistance of charitable committees, had laboured diligently towards the mitigation of evils so extensively felt, and nine of the unions within the distressed districts had taken advantage of the Act and had either used the rate in aid power, or, the power of borrowing on the security of the rates. But, as their Lordships were aware, an immense amount of distress still existed. A large number of persons were supported by means of the rates, and he believed a still larger number derived assistance from those generous contributions which had been made from nearly all parts of the world in aid of the distress in the cotton districts, and without which it would have been absolutely necessary to exercise the borrowing powers in a much larger degree. He trusted, that the general prospects of the country were improving; but it was impossible to say when the crisis would be at an end, and in the mean time there was a great deficiency of the raw material. From week to week the supply was something like twenty as compared with forty-eight bales; and even if some of the mills were kept working half-time, it was impossible to suppose that such relief was generally extended, because, of course, a proportionately large supply of cotton was procured in particular places, while in others the operatives were almost unemployed. The employment thus afforded was, moreover, not a steady process; it depended very much on the price of the raw material and the value of the manufactured produce, and clearly also upon the expectations caused by political events. Consequently, it was necessary that the powers conferred upon unions by the Bill of last year should be continued, at all events, for two quarters; and, with some alterations which the experience of its working in the interval had suggested, the present Bill was a re-enactment of the measure of last year. The most important alteration was that the period allowed for repayment of loans borrowed under the Act was extended from seven to fourteen years; leaving unions to repay the amount voluntarily at an earlier date if they thought proper to do so. By the 4th clause provision was made for the cases of unions in more than one county; and by the 5th clause the parishes comprised within the Mansfield Union, in the county of Notts, were exempted from the operation of the 1st section of the Act. He believed their Lordships would cheerfully give their assent to this measure. He trusted there would be a continuance of the good conduct which had been so remarkable hitherto on the part of all concerned in this great calamity, and that the same co-operation which had been extended by individual effort to the exertions of the unions for the relief of distress would be apparent in the future as it had been in the past. This was a subject to which he could not allude without expressing his regret at the absence of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) whose exertions had been conspicuous in this national emergency. The noble Earl then moved that the Bill be now read 2^a.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

SALMON EXPORTATION BILL.

[No. 39.] SECOND READING.

Order for the Second Reading read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in

moving the second reading of the Bill, said, the measure had passed through the other House of Parliament without opposition, and might be considered as supplementary to the Act of 1861. The operation of that measure had been most satisfactory. As their Lordships were aware, the sale of salmon was prohibited within a certain portion of the year; but the object of the prohibition, he was sorry to say, had been considerably evaded by the exportation of salmon captured in this country to various foreign countries. By this Bill it was proposed to enact that no salmon caught during the time at which the sale is prohibited in the district in which it is caught, shall be exported, or entered for exportation, from any part of the United Kingdom to parts beyond the seas. The infraction of this law would be visited with the penalty of £5 for every salmon, and the burden of proof was placed upon the intended exporter; and he thought it was a measure which would receive the assent of every one of their Lordships.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the object of this Bill clearly was to prevent salmon from being sold during close time, and he did not think they would succeed in this object unless they not only prohibited the exportation of the fish abroad (which exportation was very large), but prevented the importation of Dutch salmon into this country, as the poached salmon was frequently sold as Dutch salmon. The only way of stopping the consumption of this fish during the close season was by preventing both its importation and exportation. He was not prepared with any proposal to carry that out; but he made the suggestion for the consideration of the noble Lord between this and the period when they would go into Committee on the Bill.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he would consider the point, and see if it was possible to introduce a clause into the Bill to carry out the object the noble Earl had in view, though he feared it was impossible to do so—namely, the prevention of the sale of poached salmon under the name of Dutch salmon.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY observed, that there was an analogous case under the Game Laws. The ptarmigan, by the present Game Laws, could not be sold after the 10th of September; but the sale continued under the name of Norway game, though half the birds came from Scotland.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE trusted the noble Lord would not consent to prohibit altogether the importation of Dutch salmon.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

EDUCATION.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

MR. WALTER said, that an appeal had been made to him by his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education to postpone the Resolutions which stood in his (Mr. Walter's) name for Friday next, in consequence of an engagement of a much more agreeable nature, which was likely to occasion the absence of many hon. Members on that evening. As his right hon. Friend was of opinion that the discussion of the question could not be satisfactorily conducted under these circumstances, and would not lead to any conclusive result in the absence of the leading Members of the House, he (Mr. Walter) felt it his duty to accede to his request, and postpone the Resolution to the first day he could secure after the Easter recess.

OFFICERS OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY'S ARMY.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government has determined to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire whether the guarantee given to the officers of the late East India Company's Army by Parliament, by Act 21 & 22 Vict., c. 105, and 23 & 24 Vict., c. 100, has or has not been departed from?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, he felt the importance of the subject which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had given notice of his intention to bring before the House, but he (Sir C. Wood) thought the course proposed by the hon. and gallant Member of moving for a Select Committee of inquiry exceedingly inconvenient, as likely to lead to great delay. He needed not to say that the object of himself and colleagues was faithfully to fulfil the pledges given by Parliament. There was no question of the disposition of the Members of his Council, and especially the military members, to show every disposition in favour of their brethren in India, and he thought he should be able to satisfy the House that those pledges had not been in any way departed from; but, as no person was the best judge of his own case, he thought it desirable that an inquiry should take place by other persons. It was also most desirable that this should be done without delay. He had therefore recommended to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to approve the recommendation, that a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject should be appointed. That Commission would comprise Members of both Houses of Parliament.

COLONEL SYKES: Will the officers who offer to be examined be received for examination before that Commission?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: That will depend upon whether the Gentlemen composing the Commission think it necessary.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR: Will the Commission be composed exclusively of Members of both Houses of Parliament?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I said "comprising Members of both Houses of Parliament."

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis) if he intends to bring forward his Motion relating to the grievances of officers in the Indian army to-morrow evening?

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he could not, in common fairness to the officers who had intrusted him with the matter, postpone the Motion without the House having distinctly before it what sort of a Commission it was to be to which the subject was to be referred, what reference was to be made to that Commission, and what would be the order in which the inquiry would be carried out.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will bring in his Bill upon the subject of Fires in the Metropolis before Easter; and, also, whether he has recently received an official communication from the Insurance Companies, stating that they do not mean to continue the present Fire Brigade any longer?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, such a communication had not been recently received. It was received last year, and was, he believed, laid before the House. It stated the desire of the Insurance Companies to be relieved from the charge now laid upon them of maintaining the Fire Brigade. He had been in communication with the representatives of those Companies, and other bodies, and he hoped he should be able to make an arrangement which would be satisfactory to them and conducive to the public interest. The arrangement was not yet complete, and he did not think it would be in time to enable him to lay the Bill on the table before Easter.

CAST IRON ORDNANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Which of the several plans proposed for rifling the existing cast-iron Service Guns has been reported by the Ordnance Select Committee to be the best; whether the Government intend to introduce the improvement into the Service without delay; and whether the Report of the Ordnance Select Committee on this subject will be published?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, as a general rule the Reports of the Ordnance Select Committee were regarded as confidential. This, however, was a subject which had created a great deal of interest in the public mind, and he saw no reason why, with regard to it, the rule should not be relaxed. Therefore, if his hon. Friend would move for the Report it would be given. He might add, that the Government was not disposed to give effect to the principle of rifling cast-iron guns. But if they were to do so, it would be on the plan of Mr. Bashley Britten. That was the plan they would prefer.

TOBACCO DUTIES BILL.—[BILL 56.]

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to subject Tobacco to an examination of quality, with reference to the imposition of Differential Duties in the same manner as Wine?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that some persons connected with the Tobacco trade were labouring under the apprehension that there was an intention to adopt a system analogous to that which was adopted in the case of Wine three years ago. That was a system impracticable to be administered, and entailed such additional difficulty and responsibility on the Revenue Department that they and the Government were as much opposed to it as the trade. The object of imposing a special increase of duty on Tobacco with less than a certain degree of moisture was simply to meet certain cases, where special processes were used for producing an artificial degree of dryness, and thereby evading the law. It was to such special cases that the increased duty was meant to apply. He was not aware of such special cases occurring except in the traffic between the Channel Islands and this country. It existed there to a very limited degree, but its amount might very much increase if precautions were not taken. With respect to the general importation of Tobacco, there was no intention whatever to apply a system of the kind.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.—IRISH CHURCH.—QUESTION.

In reply to a Question from Mr. WALPOLE,

MR. DILLWYN said, he should put off the second reading of the Endowed Schools Bill, which stood for Wednesday next, until about the end of April or the beginning of May. With regard to the Motion respecting the Irish Church, which stood in his name for to-morrow, he should, in order to meet the convenience of Irish Members, put it off until after Easter. He proposed to bring it on upon the second Tuesday after Easter, if he should find that day open.

ENGLISH POLICE IN POLAND. QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reference to the papers which had been published as to the employment of English Police in Poland, Whether the Detectives who were employed in Warsaw sent to Sir Richard Mayne any letter or document beyond those which had been published, and whether Sir Richard Mayne sent any reply to such letter or document? The document he referred to was a letter asking for an extension of leave of absence, and stating certain reasons for making such a request. He also wished to ask the right hon. Baronet, what was the precise date at which the two officers Walker and Whicher were sent to Warsaw; what was the date when the Russian authorities stated that they no longer required their services, and the date of their return? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would also inform the House what was the name of the gentleman alluded to in Baron Brunow's note dated 31st of July, when he said—

"The first step to be taken would be to allow Sir Richard Mayne to put himself in communication with a gentleman to whose care the Grand Duke has directly and privately intrusted this object, so intimately connected with the success of his own administration."

SIR GEORGE GREY: I cannot tell, Sir, the name of the gentleman; I never saw him, and had no communication with him. With regard to the reports made by the police, I have already stated, that the only written report which Sir Richard Mayne received from the two officers—whom the hon. Gentleman always calls detectives, but one of whom, as I have already said, was a Superintendent of the A division, and not a detective—the only report which Sir Richard Mayne received was the one which has been laid on the table. They left this country, I think, on the 6th of August, and they returned in the first week of October. They would have returned sooner but for the serious illness of one of them, which delayed them several weeks.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: Did the right hon. Baronet communicate on the subject of Baron Brunow's letter with the Foreign Secretary, or with the First Lord of the Treasury?

SIR GEORGE GREY: No; the act was done entirely on my own responsibility.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

On Motion of Viscount PALMERSTON.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Notice of Motion relative to Greece.

GREECE.

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE MOVED FOR.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I rise to move for certain papers relative to the affairs of Greece. The circumstances that Mr. Elliot has returned from his special mission without any information as to its results having been laid before the House, that the Duke of Saxe-Coburg has definitively declined to accept the throne of Greece, and that the state of the country is at this moment excessively critical, amply justify me in calling the attention of the House to this question. Hon. Members are doubtless aware that we are particularly interested in the affairs of Greece, but may not know to what extent. They will understand that better when I state that the unguaranteed debt of Greece, together with the unpaid interest, amounts to £7,000,000, and that the guaranteed debt in connection with the loan of 1832 is about £2,000,000, on which there is about £900,000 of unpaid interest, and of which our share comes to £800,000. It is clear, therefore, that we have a very deep interest in the good government of that State. Moreover, the House cannot be ignorant of the universal sympathy which Greece has shown towards this country by the unanimous vote of the people for Prince Alfred. Seeing, then, that she has thrown herself entirely on our protection, and thereby forfeited the goodwill of France and Russia, it is right we should ask how Her Majesty's Government have fulfilled the obligation thus imposed on them, and how far they have exhibited that fairness, truthfulness, and consideration which Greece had a right to expect at their hands. I regret to be compelled to say that the conduct of the British Government has not been just or generous, and that the Greeks are suffering now, and will suffer still more, from the policy which we have pursued in regard to their affairs. That statement I am prepared to prove. I am bound to say that I think Earl Russell is chiefly to blame for this. Remembering, as I do, how earnestly and cordially the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, has in days past advocated the Greek cause, I cannot but feel assured, that had he now held the seals of the Foreign Office, the present difficulties would not have occurred, and I am even led to doubt whether the noble Viscount really knows the whole truth in regard to the conduct of that Department. I will now ask the attention of the House to some facts, which I will state as briefly and precisely as possible, in support of the charge I have to make against Earl Russell. The change in the Government of Greece occurred last October. Immediately afterwards Earl Russell communicated with the French and Russian Governments urging upon them that the Protocols and Treaties of 1829, 1830, and 1832, by which any member of the reigning families of the three Powers was prohibited from occupying the throne of Greece, should be held binding. The Russian Government agreed at once to this proposal, but the French Government did so with a great deal of reserve. On the 4th of December M. Drouyn de Lhuys wrote as follows:—

“In one sense we admit that circumstances are not absolutely identical. The three Powers were then empowered by a formal delegation of Greece to dispose of the Crown; now the Greeks make direct use of their sovereign power; and France, England, and Russia may have decided upon exclusions to which they are reciprocally bound, without being justified, perhaps, in compelling the Greeks at this moment to adopt their views. . . . Nor do I pretend that this restrictive clause of the protocol is rigorously applicable to the present state of things.”

That despatch is important, because it proves that but for Earl Russell's interference these protocols would not have been held binding, and the Greeks would have had the option of electing the Duke de Leuchtenberg, the Duke d'Aumale, or any one else. On receipt of the above letter Earl Russell wrote, on the 6th of November, to our Ambassador in Greece in these terms—

“Her Majesty's Government have no desire to influence the decision which the Greeks may come to as to the choice of their new Sovereign, except to remind them that by the agreements and engagements concluded in 1832 between England, France, and Russia, no person connected with the Royal or Imperial Family of either of the three Powers can be placed upon the throne of Greece.”

Mr. Scarlett's letter, to be found at page 50 of the Correspondence, was in reply to a communication from the noble Earl, and was as follows:—

“Upon the receipt of your Lordship's telegram, dated November 3, which reached me on the 10th instant, reminding me that by the Treaty of July 6, 1829, and Protocols of April, 1827, and February, 1830, both Prince Alfred and the Duke of Leuchtenberg would be equally excluded from becoming candidates for the throne of Greece, I lost no time in communicating to M. Diamantopoulos the necessary information on that subject. . . . I said I really could not perceive at this moment any chance whatever of the acceptance by Prince Alfred of the throne of Greece.”

Thus far nothing could be more correct than the conduct of the Foreign Secretary; but the importance of Earl Russell's Despatch is to be ascertained only from reading Mr. Scarlett's letter of the 17th December. Mr. Scarlett wrote to his Lordship—

“I observe in some of the newspapers lately received from England that Her Majesty's Government is blamed for not announcing sooner to the Greeks that His Royal Highness Prince Alfred could not accept the throne, and that I ought to have been instructed earlier on this point. To this it may with perfect justice be replied, that at the very outset of this movement your Lordship did instruct me to state to the Greek Government the belief of Her Majesty's Government that both Prince Alfred and the Duke de Leuchtenberg were excluded under the Protocol of 1830; an instruction which I did not fail to carry immediately into effect by reading both your Lordship's telegrams and despatch to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Provisional Government.”

The only despatch of the noble Earl to which Mr. Scarlett could have referred, is that in which he was desired to write at once to the Greek Government to put a stop to the candidature of Prince Alfred. Directly after November 6, however, a great change took place. Earl Russell became acquainted with two very important facts. He learned from Mr. Scarlett that Prince Alfred was universally popular in Greece, and from Russia that that Power, while recognising the binding effect of the protocols, did not deem the Duke de Leuchtenberg to be within their scope. Upon this Earl Russell, who, while under the impression that Prince Alfred and the Duke de Leuchtenberg were alike excluded, had distinctly pointed out to the Greek Government that the protocols were binding, felt it necessary to reconsider his position; but if he saw no possibility of Prince Alfred being allowed to accept the throne, he ought to have intimated as much to the Greeks in the plainest and most distinct manner. After the decided language which Mr. Scarlett had held to the Foreign Minister of Greece, it is clear that any extenuation of the view originally expressed would be misunderstood by the Greeks, and would lead the people to suppose that Prince Alfred would be allowed to assume the crown. Hence it was of the utmost importance that there should be no ambiguous communications on the subject, and that the fatal candidature of His Royal Highness should not be allowed to proceed. On November 17 Earl Russell wrote to Mr. Scarlett as follows:—

"I have received your telegram of the 10th inst., reporting that the Provisional Government of Greece considered the renunciation by the Powers parties to the Treaty of 1827, in regard to the Sovereign of Greece being chosen from among their families, to have no longer a binding effect after the fall of the Bavarian dynasty, which is considered to be complete; and that a strong feeling prevails throughout the country in favour of the election of His Royal Highness Prince Alfred to the vacant throne, in which case the provisions of the 40th Article of the Constitution, in regard to the religion of the successor to King Otho, would not be allowed to stand in the way of His Royal Highness's assumption of the sovereignty. In reply to your request for instructions as to the course you should pursue in this state of things, I have to desire that you will not interfere in regard to the election of the future Sovereign of Greece without direct instructions from Her Majesty's Government. Their desire is that the Greeks should be left free to choose their own King. With regard to the obligations of the three protecting Powers towards one another, I may have further communications to make to you."

How was this received by France and Russia? M. Drouyn de Lhuys, in a despatch dated December 4, says the English Cabinet

"appeared to see, in the hesitation of Russia in explaining whether the Duke de Leuchtenberg was in her sight comprehended in the stipulations of exclusion, a circumstance which might release her from her own engagements, and give her entire freedom of opinion. The candidature of Prince Alfred, which the semi-official organs of the English Ministry no longer rejected, assumed from that moment a new character. Interrupting the prolonged silence of the British Government, the Greeks appeared to consider it an implicit assent, and European opinion no longer asked if prince Alfred would be elected, but if England would accept for him the Hellenic Crown."

Prince Gortschakoff, writing on the 2nd of December, says—

"The rapid march of events in Greece seemed to have inspired the conviction, that if England took from the Hellenic people all hope as to the candidature of an English Prince, the public sentiment would inevitably bear towards a Russian Prince; and thus the Government of Her Britannic Majesty believed themselves authorized in not discouraging the sympathies which were manifested in Greece towards the candidature of Monseigneur the Prince Alfred."

In a despatch, dated December 7, Lord Napier says—

"In the course of my conversation with the Vice Chancellor His Excellency alluded again to the contrivances and incitements by which the alleged candidature of His Royal Highness Prince Alfred had been promoted in Greece, to electioneering arts, to the exhibition of specious inducements, the encouragement of hopes, and the distribution of gold. His Excellency did not say that these practices were directed by Her Majesty's Government, but he seemed to refer them generally to English instigation, and to the agency of persons in authority under Her Majesty's Government."

Let us now see what Mr. Scarlett did upon the receipt of the despatch from the Foreign Office. There was great excitement in Athens, and portraits of Prince Alfred were carried about the streets in procession. Writing on the 24th of November, Mr. Scarlett says—

"On Saturday evening, after I had dined at home, I was informed by several gentlemen who came in to see me, that a demonstration was actually even then gathering in the streets, and on its way to my house. In about twenty minutes after not less than 2,000 persons, consisting many of them of students and professors, and the most respectable townspeople, with a few cavalry and infantry, assembled in the space in front of the Legation, crying out: 'Long live Prince Alfred, the future King of Greece!' As the crowd showed no intention of retiring from their position, I opened the window and stepped out on the balcony, where I was received with the greatest possible enthusiasm; the portrait of His Royal Highness was exhibited to me from the roof of a carriage in the centre of the procession; the people bore aloft lighted torches, and Bengal lights were burnt to render the scene more imposing. As soon as silence was restored, I shortly thanked them all, in English, for the honour they had done to His Royal Highness, and expressed the sympathy I felt for the Greek nation. I asked a Greek gentleman, M. Bondouris, who had just come into the house, to translate the words I had used, which were well received, and they went away loudly cheering."

It was evident, therefore, that the words spoken by Mr. Scarlett could not have conveyed the notion that Prince Alfred would not accept. Further on, in the same despatch, he gives the following account of another demonstration:—

"Yesterday, Sunday, a still larger demonstration appeared about three o'clock before the British Legation, consisting not only of the same people, but also of a large number of persons who had come up on purpose from the Piræus to Athens to take part in the ceremony. On a platform placed on the top of a carriage were displayed, on this occasion, not only the portrait of Prince Alfred, but also those of Her Majesty the Queen, the Emperor of Russia, and the Emperor of the French. The crowd was fully as orderly and well-conducted as that of the preceding evening. Nearly the same proceedings took place; I was addressed in the same manner, and spoke on this occasion to the same effect, adding that I felt bound to continue my reserve with regard to the name of Prince Alfred, whose acceptance of the throne of Greece depended on considerations which I was unable then to determine."

Surely that was holding out hopes to the people that the Prince would accept the throne! At various places in Greece, our Consuls spoke very much to the same effect. At the Piræus Mr. Neale said—

"You naturally turn to the free British nation, who in Her Majesty Queen Victoria have been in possession of this inestimable blessing, and the choice of your hearts is fixed on the sailor Prince, Prince Alfred."

It was evident from the tenor of those despatches at this time that the people of Greece believed that the question was still open, whether Prince Alfred would or would not eventually accept the throne. The noble Lord expressed himself in anything but a positive tone upon this subject. If he had, is it to be supposed the people of Greece would have continued to act as they did, under the persuasion that the British Prince might ultimately occupy the throne of their country? I now turn to a remarkable despatch. It is to be found in page 60 of the Correspondence. It appears that Lord Russell had a conversation with M. Tricoupi, on the 29th of November, and that the noble Earl reported that conversation to Mr. Scarlett. In pointing out to him the several reasons which would prevent the acceptance of the throne by Prince Alfred he proceeds as follows:—

"There are other considerations besides those which I thought it proper to communicate to the Chargé d'Affaires of Greece which influence Her Majesty's resolution on this subject. It is Her Majesty's duty to look to the due succession to the Crown. Prince Alfred stands next to the Prince of Wales in the order of succession, and is heir-presumptive to the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. Among the contingencies which are far from being impossible, it might happen that the sons of Prince Alfred, after being brought up as members of the Greek Church, might be called upon to ascend the throne of England. It is necessary to provide against chances of this kind, and you will therefore not be surprised to learn that it is Her Majesty's fixed determination not to give her consent to the acceptance by his Royal Highness Prince Alfred, or any other of Her Majesty's sons, of the Crown of Greece."

Why were these considerations not stated before? Why did not Earl Russell express himself with as much frankness to M. Tricoupi? I will tell you. Our Government were then negotiating another protocol with France and Russia, for the exclusion of the members of the reigning families, and it would not have been convenient at the moment to let the whole truth be known. With these facts before the House I think I am justified in characterizing this conduct of the noble Earl as neither just nor fair to the Greek nation. In private life a transaction characterized by such duplicity and want of candour, would be stigmatised in very severe language, and the most disagreeable epithets would probably be applied to the offending party. Hitherto I have depended solely on public documents; but I have received a great many private letters from Greece, and two of them, which I received this morning, are so important that I may be permitted to read portions of them. I am not at liberty to give the names of the writers, who are persons of great authority in Greece, but I shall be glad to communicate them in confidence to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The first, dated November 25, says—

"The name of Prince Alfred makes every heart vibrate; what a happiness will it be for the country to have the son of an English Sovereign on the throne! His name will be a guarantee and pledge for the future. We know well that England has an interest in befriending us, and it is this knowledge that leads us to give full faith to the assurances which we receive from her agents here that the Prince Alfred so loved and so desired will accept the throne."

The next letter shows what the feeling now is towards our English. It is dated January 18, and runs as follows:—

"You tell me of the enthusiasm of the English for us, but we are not satisfied of this; it is through the English Government we are in this deplorable condition. On the eve of a massacre, we live in perpetual alarm. We were permitted to indulge the idea that Prince Alfred would be allowed to go to Greece, and thus we have lost the support of the other Powers."

Having materially injured the Greeks while pretending to assist them, our Government at length set to work to make them ridiculous. Now, one fact is clear. In December Mr. Elliot was sent to Athens on a special mission; he arrived on the 23rd, and on the following day made the first official announcement to the Provisional Government that Prince Alfred could not accept the Throne. But here let me notice a curious incident. On the 9th of February, in reply to a question, the noble Viscount at the head of the Government made the following statement in this House:—

"The Greek question at present stands thus:—The Greek nation fixed upon the election of Prince Alfred, son of Her Majesty, and it was only yesterday that the Greek Minister communicated that decision to my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office. To that, of course, the answer given was in conformity with the announcement in the Speech; but no other candidate has yet been proposed to the Greek nation in any formal manner. The Duke of Coburg has been sounded privately on the subject, for the purpose of ascertaining whether, in the event of being proposed or elected by the Greek people, he would accept the throne, and the Duke of Coburg has declined to be put in nomination for the throne of Greece." [Ante, p. 194.]

Now, The Times special correspondent, writing from Athens on the 31st of January, reported that—

"On Tuesday last Mr. Elliot received a telegraphic message stating that Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg was ready to accept the Crown of Greece if it were offered to him; that he was warmly supported both by France and England; that he would retain his paternal dominions; and that, having no children, he reserved to himself the right of proposing at once to the Greek nation a successor who was ready to adopt the orthodox religion."

[Mr. LAYARD was understood to dissent.] The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, and, of course, the documents which have been sent to me may be wrong. But on the 5th of February Mr. Elliot made this speech to a Greek deputation which had waited on him—

"I am charged by my Government to notify to the Provisional Government of Greece that Her Majesty's Government have, with the concurrence of the Emperor of the French, agreed to recommend the Prince Ernest of Saxe-Coburg as a suitable candidate for the throne of Greece. The Emperor eagerly accepted this proposition made by England, and Prince Ernest accepts the throne that is offered him, on the condition that he shall continue to hold, so long as he may consider it desirable that he should do so, his hereditary estates. The Prince, once proclaimed King of Greece, will propose to the National Assembly as his successor one of the sons of his cousin Augustus and the Princess Clementine, daughter of Louis Philippe, late King of France. This Prince is seventeen years of age, and will be educated in the faith of the orthodox Greek Church."

From the answer given in this House by the noble Lord, it would really appear as if he had not been acquainted with what was going on in Greece. At all events, if the Duke of Saxe-Coburg had then decidedly declined to accept the throne, it was most inconsistent that Mr. Elliot should thus have trifled with the Greek people. And what does the House suppose was the effect of this? I will take the language of the City Article of The Times on this point. On the 25th of February the writer in that journal says—

"Greek Bonds are again an eighth lower, and the mortification of the unfortunate holders who made investments at 24, on the faith of the unqualified announcement by the British Government regarding the Duke of Coburg, is increased by the fact, not merely that the manner in which they were misled has never been thought to call for explanation or apology, or caused even a question to be asked in Parliament, but that the affairs of Greece seem now wholly to be discarded for other questions, the country being left to drift into republican anarchy. In the absence of any light to the contrary, the universal feeling in the City is that a more lamentable instance of mismanagement has not often been witnessed."

That is the opinion which was entertained in the City in regard to the conduct of Mr. Elliot, which certainly requires the fullest explanation. But let the House mark the consequences in Greece itself. The Greek Government scarcely knew what to do. I hold in my hand a list of the candidates for whom the Greek people voted, and among the names are Prince Napoleon, "a Republic," a Russian Prince, Prince Ypsilanti, General Garibaldi, the Duke d'Aumale, General M'Mahon, and many others. About 230,000 votes were given for Prince Alfred. I am surprised that one right hon. Gentleman's name opposite is not mentioned among the candidates. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has no idea of his popularity in Greece, and I can only assure him that if he went there, he would find the finest field for his financial abilities. Indeed, there is no end of the candidates whose names were put forward. A Mr. Godfrey de Bouillon was suggested, as was also a Mr. William Ceorops, who claimed his descent from the second daughter of the ancient founder of Athens, and had the advantage of an English education as well as an English Christian name. I come now to another point connected with the same system of trifling upon this question which has created so much dissatisfaction. When Mr. Elliot went to Greece, it was natural for Lord Russell to suppose that his policy would give great dissatisfaction; and the course hit upon for getting rid of that feeling seemed to be by a sort of coup d'état—namely, by a proposal to cede the Ionian Islands. This was meant as a mode of keeping the Greeks quiet, and it has had that effect. I have heard it said by Greeks, "You must be very cautious how you deal with this question. The English Government have behaved very badly in the matter; but if you say too much about it, we shall never get the Ionian Islands." Mr. Elliot arrived at Athens, and in an extraordinary sentence, interlarded with more "ifs" than I recollect ever seeing in the same space, he promised that the Ionian Islands should be given up to Greece. He said—

"If the new Assembly of the representatives of the Greek nation should prove faithful to this declaration, should maintain constitutional monarchy, and should refrain from all aggression against neighbouring States, and if they should choose a Sovereign against whom no well-founded objection could be raised, Her Majesty would see in this course of conduct a promise of future freedom and happiness for Greece. In such case Her Majesty, with a view to strengthen the Greek Monarchy, would be ready to announce to the Senate and representatives of the Ionian Islands Her Majesty's wish to see them united to the Monarchy of Greece, and to form with Greece one united State; and if this wish should be expressed also by the Ionian Legislature, Her Majesty would then take steps for obtaining the concurrence of the Powers who were parties to the treaty by which the seven Ionian Islands and their dependencies were placed as a separate State under the protectorate of the British Crown."

I cannot help thinking that it would have been better to wait till a constitutional monarchy had been formed, and the opinion of the people of the Ionian Islands taken, before making any such promise as that. This is the reflection that might occur to any man, unless, as I have said, the proposed act of cession was a sort of sugarplum thrown to the Greeks to pacify their very natural dissatisfaction at the treatment they have received. But I ask, are the Greeks being deceived even now in this matter? I find this statement in a telegram from Vienna, dated March 6, and published in The Times—

"Advices received here from Corfu to the 3rd instant, announce that the Lord High Commissioner has prohibited the assembling of a meeting in favour of the union of the Ionian Islands to Greece, which was to have been held under the presidency of the Archbishop. The Lord High Commissioner at the same time intimated, that should further similar demonstrations take place, they would be suppressed by the police. The same advices add that the committee of the meeting will protest against these proceedings to the English Ministry."

Now, what can the Greek Government think of the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers in respect to this matter? In many of Earl Russell's despatches he strongly insists that there must be an entire absence of territorial encroachment on the part of the Greek nation. It is extraordinary that it did not suggest itself to that noble Lord that the annexation of the Ionian Islands to Greece had an important bearing on the position of Albania, Thessaly, and Candia. In 1861 the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking with the eloquence and energy he always displays, said—

"Consider again the bearing of this union of the Ionian Islands, if it took place, upon the condition of what I may call the Greek provinces of Turkey. What! Are we to say to the people of the Ionian Islands, it is so intolerable that you should remain apart from the kingdom that has its capital at Athens; and could we at the same time say, to the people of Candia, Thessaly, and Albania, a Christian Protectorate was too bad for others, a Turkish domination is good enough for you." [3 Hansard, clxii. 1868.]

Yet my right hon. Friend, having by his own arguments proved that this cession must be followed by encroachments upon Turkey, is now a party to the proposed surrender of these Islands, and at the same time the Government of which he is a member wishes to discourage the grandes idées of the Greeks. On the same occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"The Greeks do entertain a strong sentiment of nationality, and do desire that the day may come when the Greek race shall be again united and powerful. And, Sir, I confess it grieves me to the last degree when I see, as I occasionally do see, that sentiment on the part of this long unhappy and often oppressed people treated in this country with ridicule and scorn. We assume the care of a people who have been for centuries in the most unfortunate circumstances, and who have always been subject, in one form or another, to foreign domination—we couple that assumption with an express recognition of their independence—we find that they retain the memory of the glorious origin from which they sprung; and then that very sentiment, which is in truth the badge, the proof of national, political, and moral life among them, and their best hope and pledge for the future, we set up, and expose as the butt for wanton, cruel, and, I must say, dastardly ridicule." [3 Hansard, clxii. 1868.]

These are noble words—words which associate the right hon. Gentleman with the warmest sympathies of the Greeks; and, possessing the support of that right hon. Gentleman, and also of another very eloquent man across the channel—the Count de Montalembert—who spoke the other day in glowing terms of the future development of that race, Greece may well cherish hope. This I will say, that looking to future eventualities in the East, I, for one, must express my great regret that Prince Alfred was not allowed to accept the throne of Greece. I assure the House that this is no party question. I have not had the honour of speaking to hon. or right hon. Gentlemen below me upon it. My only desire is that justice may be done to Greece, and I only hope that it may be done through the noble Lord's Government. I have been requested to read to the House this letter from the Chairman of the Committee of holders of Greek Bonds of 1824 and 1825—

"Sir,—It having been announced that you intend bringing the present condition of Greece to the notice of Parliament, the Committee of the Greek Bondholders in England cannot forbear offering their warmest thanks for your valuable exertions on behalf of that country.

"Prince Wilhelm the younger, brother to the Princess of Wales, has many advantages as a candidate for the throne of Greece. His Protestant religion is in his favour; he is in the naval profession—a great point for a maritime people; he is not connected by descent with any of the three allied guaranteeing Powers. Denmark has a purely constitutional Government, and, further, it enjoys the advantage of having a very high character in financial matters; and we have a right to suppose that he would take with him the prestige of the good name which his country bears, and restore the credit of Greece."

Having submitted these facts to the House, and pointed out the actual condition of Greece, and the great responsibility that hangs over her future, I ask, am I not justified in saying that Her Majesty's Government have not treated the people of Greece with justice and good faith? The first formal act of their political existence was to place the dignity, honour, and independence of the country under the protection of Great Britain. They exhibit now the same feeling of touching affection towards this country. Prince Alfred was spoken of throughout his candidature as a son of the beloved and widowed Queen of England; but, I must repeat, the Government have not acted fairly towards them. It might have been perfectly right to have protested against the election of a Russian Prince, to have renewed those protestations, and to have stated that Prince Alfred could not accept the throne of Greece; but it was not right to deceive the Greek Government and people, who had trusted in them, for the sake of a diplomatic victory, at the same time casting the people of Greece into all the dangers of an untried future. For these reasons I ask the Government not only to explain their conduct in the past, but also the course they intend to pursue for the future. I beg leave to move for these Papers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of further Correspondence relating to the Affairs of Greece."

Mr. GREGORY said, he had followed the observations of his hon. Friend with much pleasure, and in that portion of them in which he regretted the existing untoward state of Greece he entirely concurred. He sympathized in his generous aspirations with regard to the future condition of Greece; but the sentence in which he uttered those aspirations was concluded with the expression of a wish that Prince Alfred had been permitted to ascend the throne of Greece. Now, having regard both to the interests of England and Greece, he must say he thought the Government had been right in the course they had pursued. Independently of those considerations that were pointed out in Earl Russell's Despatch, they could not shut their eyes to the fact that jealousies must have arisen by his succeeding to the throne, that complications of a grave character might have been produced, and that most dangerous precedents might have been established for future thrones to be occupied or made for other Royal or Imperial Princes. Not only so, but they should bear in mind that Prince Alfred was but a young and inexperienced man; that if he had gone to Greece, he must either have had to go alone, or had the assistance of English advisers. Had he gone alone to Greece he might, from his inexperience, have fallen into the hands of those who would have rendered him unpopular; and, on the other hand, had he gone to Greece accompanied by English advisers, although they would, no doubt, have been different to the Bavarian advisers who were with Otho, yet it was well known that the interference of foreigners was apt to irritate, and in a moment of some popular outbreak Prince Alfred might have lost the throne of Greece. An act of great humiliation would thus have been inflicted on England, and a most pernicious and hostile feeling excited towards Greece in this country. There was another point in which he differed from his hon. Friend. He (Mr. Gregory) maintained, that from the very beginning of this business to the end, Government did not hold out any hopes that Prince Alfred would be allowed to accept the throne of Greece. It was important to refer to dates. On the 27th of October the insurrection broke out in Athens, and Mr. Scarlett immediately telegraphed to the Foreign Office. On the 28th another telegram was sent to the Foreign Office conveying the intelligence of the successful issue of the revolution, and it appeared from the papers now placed before them, and from Mr. Scarlett's own statement, that so far from the Government being privy to any impression that Prince Alfred would be permitted to accept the throne of Greece, the contrary impression was conveyed both by the letter of the 6th of November and the telegram immediately sent on receiving intelligence of the revolution. There could not be better testimony on that point than Mr. Scarlett's own clear and decisive representation of the case at page 119. He says—

"I observe in one of the newspapers lately received from England that Her Majesty's Government is blamed for not announcing sooner to the Greeks that his Royal Highness Prince Alfred could not accept the throne, and that I ought to have been instructed earlier on this point. To this it may with perfect justice be replied that at the very outset of this movement your Lordship did instruct me to state to the Greek Government the belief of Her Majesty's Government that both Prince Alfred and the Duc de Leuchtenburg were excluded under the protocol of 1830—an instruction which I did not fail to carry immediately into effect, by reading both your Lordship's telegrams and the despatch to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Provisional Government."

Thus, then, at the very beginning of the revolution, and down to the present time, the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government had been perfectly clear and above-board in regard to the candidature of Prince Alfred, contrasting most favourably with the shifty, and not to mince the matter, double dealing of the Russian Government. On this point also he entirely differed from his hon. Friend, although no doubt they had both the same object in view—namely, the prosperity of Greece. He thought nothing could be more detrimental than that Greece should lose all confidence in England, and he therefore thought it unfortunate that his hon. Friend should endeavour to persuade Greece that Her Majesty's Government had played her false from the beginning to the end of these transactions. Before leaving this part of the discussion he could not help referring to one passage in this correspondence, which was so entirely characteristic of the style of the Foreign Minister, that he ventured to say if it were thrown on the table with five hundred other diplomatic extracts, it would be singled out at once as coming from his pen. It occurred at page 84. Earl Russell was referring to the quibble raised by Count Bloudoff, that, "juridically, he did not consider the Duke of Leuchtenburg excluded by the terms of the protocol, though politically he might be so," and he said—

"The judicial doubt raised by Prince Gortschakoff, and repeated by Count Bloudoff, seems at length to have been resolved by the unbought popularity of Prince Alfred, and the determination of the British Government, that the protocol should not hold good for excluding an English Prince and be deemed invalid for excluding a Russian."

Well, he (Mr. Gregory) did not find fault with the noble Lord for this little bit of smart writing. The noble Earl had fought very boldly and stoutly against the Russian diplomatists; and if on achieving a very legitimate triumph he flapped his wings a little, such exultation was, of course, very natural. But he (Mr. Gregory) wished to ask his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State a few questions, and he hoped he would take a note of them. The first was, whether since the Foreign Office had been under its present régime there was any particular axiom or rule laid down, that when any extremely difficult matter in foreign affairs had to be conducted, the ordinary diplomatic agents were to be set aside, and the management handed over to a gentleman of one particular family? He meant the family of Elliot—that is, the Elliots with two l's. His hon. Friend would see that there was good reason for asking the question, as he would recollect that a noble Peer bearing that name was sent to Italy in 1848—a difficult and dangerous time—in order to instil into that country an appreciation of the advantages of constitutional government. Of late, when Italy was passing through a very severe ordeal, requiring a man of great ability in communication with the Government, it was proposed to supersede Sir James Hudson, and to replace him by a gentleman of the name of Elliot; and on this occasion he (Mr. Gregory) presumed Mr. Scarlett was considered unequal to the emergency, and a Mr. Elliot was sent out in his place. Mr. Elliot gave his own account of his tour and arrival in Greece. On the 23rd of December Mr. Elliot arrived at Athens, and forthwith held communication with the head of the provisional Government. He said, "Here I am." He opened his budget and said, "This is what I have; I have the King of Portugal in one hand, and the Ionian Islands in the other. I have brought them both to you." The Greeks certainly did not seem to have received that intimation with any great degree of enthusiasm. But Mr. Elliot was evidently a man of considerable power of persuasion, for in a few days after, on the 2nd of January, he wrote a rather extraordinary despatch, to the effect that, up to that point, the mistaken confidence of the Greeks in the election of Prince Alfred had had a most beneficial effect. But the beneficial effect was increased a week after, when an undeniable improvement had taken place in the opinions of the influential classes regarding the King of Portugal. After that undeniable improvement, which was no doubt owing to the persuasion of Mr. Elliot, all at once there came down upon the people a clap of thunder, in the shape of a despatch, fourteen days later, from Lord Russell, stating that he was sorry to say that King Ferdinand, on account of his affection for his sons, had declined the throne. Now, he (Mr. Gregory) asked why did not the Government ascertain the state of the King of Portugal's affections beforehand? Was any application made to the King of Portugal? If so, let them know it, and hear what it was. But if no application was made to the King of Portugal, then he (Mr. Gregory) contended there was a most unwarrantable liberty taken with a Royal personage, and a most cruel delusion practised on the Greeks, by proposing to them as King a person whose candidature was a mere idea of a British Minister. The Greeks, however, were still to have a repetition of this expectation, because, after they had been informed on the 15th that King Ferdinand had declined the throne, Lord Russell informed Mr. Elliot, on the 19th, that the Duke of Coburg might well be brought under the notice of the Greek Provisional Government, but upon the 8th of February the noble Lord the Prime Minister announced that the Duke of Saxe-Coburg had declined to accept the throne if he was elected. There appeared, to use a common but expressive phrase, to have been a series of "sells" practised upon the Greek nation; and if Her Majesty's Government were to blame for putting forward those two illustrious names without first ascertaining the views of the personages themselves, he could only regard such diplomacy as reckless. It was reckless, because, it made our diplomacy the laughing-stock of Europe—and because it did away with the legitimate influence which England ought to possess in Greece; for it was to a prosperous, a well-governed, and an extended Greece that he, for one, looked eventually for the main solution of the so-called eastern question. And as he had spoken of an "extended" Greece, he would add, that he entirely approved of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in proposing the cession of the Ionian Islands. His

hon. Friend had declared that that proposal was a mere sop, to make other less agreeable things go down, and he quoted a speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year. But his hon. Friend must see, that if the Ionian Islands were offered to Greece at a time when that country was well governed, they were denied to her at a time when she was one of the worst-governed countries in Europe; and that was the whole fact of the matter. He was perfectly prepared to advocate at some future time the cession of the Ionian Islands, even on strategic considerations; but he advocated it mainly on the grounds on which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Queen's County (Colonel Dunne) the other night opposed it. His hon. and gallant Friend said, that if the Islands were attached to Greece, they would be a standing menace to the opposite coast of Turkey. That was the very reason why he (Mr. Gregory) supported their cession. Another reason was this. It was said that we had espoused the cause of oppressed nationalities in Hungary, Venice, and Italy, that we had uttered our protest against the proceedings in Poland, yet here we were keeping down a nationality which was desirous of escaping from our protection, or domination, and whose aspirations to be joined to another country, with which they considered themselves naturally connected, had frequently been quenched in blood. These were the reasons which induced him (Mr. Gregory) to support Her Majesty's Government in these questions. But before he sat down perhaps the House would allow him to make some observations on a subject which, though not strictly connected with that which had been introduced by his hon. Friend, yet was on such intimate relation with it that it ought not to be passed over in silence. He had long thought that the policy of England as regarded what was called the Eastern question was well worthy at the present moment of the very gravest consideration; and in making that observation he did not in the slightest degree mean to impugn the policy which had hitherto been pursued by English statesmen. All he meant to do was this—to assert that our past policy should not be accepted as a criterion and standard for the future. He contended, that although the past policy of the English Government had been to preserve the integrity of the Turkish Empire, even though it might have been accompanied with great disaster to begged to second the Motion of the hon. Member.

Mr. MONCKTON MILNES: Sir, I doubt whether my hon. Friend has done very good service to the cause which he has so warmly advocated by converting the question before us into a Turkish question. I think, that if in one point more than another Greece has won the sympathy of Europe, it is that her people have shown a self-command which is the real foundation of all freedom, and that in this crisis of their fate they have thought about their own Government and their own internal affairs instead of being tempted into foreign aggression. It is this, I believe, which has led Her Majesty's Government to join with the rest of Europe in according to the Greeks their best sympathy and approbation. As to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, I do believe that it has been founded upon the best intentions towards Greece, but I cannot think that the issue has been so successful as the intention was good. They intended to show for the Greek revolution at once interest and respect. Their interest in it has been shown, but I hardly think that they have treated that great event with respect by leaving it, as they have left it, so entirely in the hands of diplomacy; nor can I think that diplomacy has shown itself as wise or as successful as we might have hoped to see it. There were two lines of conduct which England might have pursued, and I think that each would have been more successful than the middle line which she has actually adopted. For my part, I cannot agree with those who hold that there was an absolute necessity of re-establishing the protocol which excludes from the throne of Greece the leading princes of Europe. What is the effect of that protocol? At this moment we tell the Greek people that they are at liberty to choose what Sovereign they please, and at the same time we exclude from their choice all the Royal personages of those three great Powers who may be supposed to be brought up with the largest views and the highest intelligence of which Royal persons are capable. We, in fact, limit the choice of the Greek people to the princes of Germany. We deprive them of all that sympathy in religion and race which we might secure by electing a Russian prince; we deprive them of the means of strengthening that great intellectual and sympathetic connection which they have long had with France by preventing them from electing a French prince; and we deprive them of the best chance of constitutional liberty by preventing them from calling an English prince to the Greek throne. I do not think, that even if this protocol had not existed, Her Majesty's Government would have done right in acceding to the election of Prince Alfred. My objection to their doing so would be founded on different grounds. I believe that the free choice of the Greeks should light on some man of ability and experience—on some man who would be fully capable, understanding the work he had undertaken, of carrying out the duties of his position with courage and prudence. I do not think it would be prudent to place on the throne of Greece a young and inexperienced prince, which, providing it meant anything, would mean "the protection of England." I believe the Greek people ought not to be under any protection, but should be left to do the best they can, to stand by themselves; but if, on the one hand, diplomacy was to be introduced into this matter—if the occupancy of the Greek throne was to be made the pour parler from Court to Court—if that line of diplomacy was to be pursued, I cannot understand why it should not have been more reticent. If it had been more reticent, it might have been more successful. Why was it known and commented on by every newspaper in every part of Europe that the King of Portugal had been asked but had refused to become a candidate for the throne of Greece? Why was the Duke of Saxe-Coburg's name mentioned before it had been ascertained whether he could become a candidate? Why, above all, was the imprudence committed of allowing Mr. Elliot to proclaim to the Greek people the candidature of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg before that illustrious prince had consulted his own States in order to know whether he should receive from them that sanction without which he could not accept the throne of Greece. No doubt it is to be regretted that a prince of his high courage, intellectual ability, and enlightened views, has not felt himself in a position to become a candidate. If he had been permitted to commit the charge of his own State to a Regent while he reigned in Greece, I believe there would have been every hope of his achieving a success equal to that which has attended his distinguished uncle's occupancy of the throne of Belgium. But I believe the Duke of Saxe-Coburg acted rightly in making that a condition; for I do not know how much of the success of the King of the Belgians may not be owing to the fact of the Belgian people knowing that any day he was ready to come back to Claremont. On this point we are now at sea. It seems that there is no candidate in the field who has received the sanction of the Powers of Europe. If my hon. Friend (Mr. Layard) is not able to name one this evening, I should venture to advise the Government that we should give up looking for candidates. I think it would be better that the Greek people should have to try the principles of self-government for some time than that we should go on in the useless course of proposing prince after prince, and getting refusal after refusal. The future of Greece does not seem to me to depend very much on the character of the Sovereign who may happen to be elected, because the real test of the fitness of a nation to exist is its power of enduring an unpopular Sovereign for at least a considerable time, and of choosing a new one when there is no other resource. I should therefore be glad if it were possible to combine the throne of Greece with some other principle than that of popular election. If some arrangement could not be made by which an appearance, a semblance of succession to the Greek Throne was established, I cannot see that it would lead to any considerable advantage; and if that course is not adopted, I see nothing for Greece but a Provisional Government for a considerable period. Greece is not new in municipal institutions. Her municipal institutions in the olden times carried her through under the Roman Empire, and later they enabled her to survive through the Byzantine period and under the domination of the Turks. They have been a considerable agent in the liberation of the country, and why should she not, in a great measure, revert to those institutions? Why, with the aid of those institutions, should not Greece continue for some time under a Republican form of Government? I believe, that if she succeeded in that, she would acquire a high position. It would be a hard test, a strong test; but let her succeed in standing it, and the time will come when princes will not think it unworthy of them to obtain the chief magistrature of such a State, and to take part in shaping the destiny of such a nation. I believe that destiny is one to be won by prudence and self-control; but hitherto I am bound to say the mercantile classes of Greece have not shown the patriotic spirit that might have been expected of them, by taking back to their own land the wealth acquired in foreign countries, and using it to fructify the resources of Greece. We know very well the ability of Greek merchants in foreign cities. We know very well that there are hardly any merchants who can compete with them on 'Change in the great commercial cities. Why is not that skill and energy to be employed for the benefit of their own country? In this crisis of their fortunes, let the Greek people but show a spirit of self-control in their own Government, endeavouring, if they can, to elect a wise, good, and courageous man for a Sovereign, but let them not go about Europe looking for a foreign Sovereign as a symbol of foreign protection. If they could secure some one of the able men from whose number they are still permitted to choose, I should heartily rejoice in it; but I profoundly regret that by the provisions of the protocol they are prevented from choosing such men as the Duke of Leuchtenberg, Prince Napoleon, and the Duke of Cambridge. I believe that the political combinations which might arise from such a choice would be comparatively unimportant as compared with the advantages which would accrue from having an experienced man and an intelligent Sovereign at the head of the Greek people.

MR. LAYARD: Sir, of the three hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on this question no one agrees with the other, though all seem to disagree with the policy of Her Majesty's Government, except my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), the earlier part of whose speech I admire more than the latter. I am desirous of calling the attention of the House to dates. I think dates have been somewhat overlooked, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton. To judge from what fell from my hon. Friend, it might be supposed that Her Majesty's Government had not, throughout the whole of those events in Greece, held the same language. He says we have treated the Greeks unjustly and ungenerously, that we have misled them, that their present difficulties are a consequence of that line of policy, and that if those difficulties should increase and disaster ensue, we shall be responsible. Now, I think that by referring to dates I shall be able to show that my hon. Friend's charge is an unjust one. On the 27th of October the news of the revolution in Greece was telegraphed to us, and there was not the slightest idea then that an English prince would be elected to the throne. Earl Russell did that which he was bound to do; he stated that the English Government was not desirous of intervening in any way in the affairs of Greece, that they admitted that the Greeks had a full right to change their Government and elect another King, and all that England meant to do was to adhere to treaty engagements and to insist on other Powers doing the same. Shortly afterwards a rumour reached England that the Greeks were likely to elect Prince Alfred for their King. Earl Russell at once telegraphed to Mr. Scarlett to the effect that the future King of Greece could not be a member of a reigning family of either of the three Powers which had been parties to the protocol drawn up at the time of the first revolution. The opinion of the French Government was asked, and, as will be seen at page 21 of these papers, they stated that they took the same view of the protocol as we did. They considered the engagement then entered into to be binding, and they meant to adhere to it. The Russian Government were also asked for their views, and they answered that they adhered to the views expressed in the protocol, but that they insisted upon the article of the Greek Constitution which made it necessary that the next King of Greece should be of the orthodox faith. This answer naturally excited some suspicion in the minds of Her Majesty's Government, seeing that there were no princes coming within that definition except the princes of the Imperial House of Russia. It was thought necessary to ascertain the views of the Russian Government still more fully, and we asked this distinct question and required to it a categorical answer—Does the Russian Government consider the Duke of Leuchtenberg to be included in that protocol? Originally, perhaps, the Duke was not a member of the Imperial family; but by a special ukase he was made a member of it, under the title of Prince Romanoffsky. To this question we got at first an equivocal answer, and it was some time before we could obtain an assurance from Prince Gortschakoff that the Duke of Leuchtenberg was included in the protocol. The exchange of notes in which that assurance is conveyed only took place on the 4th of December. Any hon. Gentleman who will read the reasons which Earl Russell gave as to the necessity of arriving at a complete understanding with Russia as to the persons included in the protocol will come to the conclusion, I think, that my noble Friend was perfectly right in what he did. Prince Alfred stood in two separate and distinct conditions in regard to the Greeks. We had stated that for certain reasons he could not accept the Crown of Greece. Those were great reasons of State; they were fully understood and appreciated by the country at large, and they received the support of the entire press of this country. Everybody felt that it was not desirable that a prince of the English blood so nearly related to the Queen, and so near in the order of succession, should accept the throne of Greece. But these reasons only applied in this specific case to Prince Alfred personally. There were general reasons which would exclude him and every other prince of the English blood Royal from the throne under the protocol. Earl Russell thus puts forward his views on this subject as applied equally to the Duke of Leuchtenberg—

"The line of Great Britain upon this question has been clear and simple. She might bind herself by a protocol or a declaration by which the other two protecting Powers should be equally bound; or she might, for the sake of British interests, refuse to entangle herself in the politics of Greece, and to separate from her own Royal family a prince so near in the order of succession to the Crown. But, as Her Majesty's Government considered the Duke of Leuchtenberg as a prince of the Imperial family of Russia, they could not declare themselves to be bound by the protocol of 1830, without knowing what that protocol meant. If it was meant that Prince Alfred should be bound to refuse, and Prince Romanoffsky free to accept the Crown of Greece, that would have been, in the eyes of Her Majesty's Government a position of inferiority and inequality which Great Britain could not accept."

That reasoning is perfectly conclusive. Earl Russell did not at any time change his language on this subject. If the hon. Gentleman will look through the papers, he will see that from the beginning, in all his communications with the Russian Government, with the French Government, and with M. Tricoupi, Earl Russell distinctly stated that Prince Alfred could not accept the Crown of Greece. My hon. Friend opposite has mixed up two different things. Earl Russell at one time did give instructions to Mr. Scarlett not to interfere in the elections; but if my hon. Friend will follow me, he will see that in so doing he in no way departed from his first declaration that Prince Alfred could not accept the throne. The Greeks had a perfect right, if they chose, to elect Prince Alfred, after having being solemnly warned, as they were warned, that he could not accept the Crown, and we certainly should not have been justified in attempting to prevent them if we could have done so. But suppose we had interfered in the election before the Russian Government had declared their views about the protocol. We knew that there were intrigues going on in Greece in favour of the Duke of Leuchtenberg—I will not say that they were intrigues prompted by the Russian Government—but there were intrigues. If we had insisted that Prince Alfred should not be elected, the Greeks might have considered themselves free to elect the Duke of Leuchtenberg; and Russia, not having admitted the validity of his exclusion by the protocol, might have turned round and said, "You may have withdrawn Prince Alfred, but we do not see any reason why we should withdraw the Duke of Leuchtenberg, and we insist on his election." There was no concealment in the policy of England, and it will be seen in the papers that Lord Napier was instructed by Earl Russell to state distinctly to Prince Gortschakoff that we should consider it our duty to do all we could to oppose the election of the Duke of Leuchtenberg. We had good reasons for doing so. I believe the policy of Her Majesty's Government was a wise policy, and I have not the least doubt that the election of the Duke of Leuchtenberg would have been as mischievous to Greece as to Europe. There were other reasons, also, for not intervening. We were told by persons well acquainted with Greece, that if any attempt were made at that time to check the general unanimous feeling in favour of Prince Alfred, mischief might occur; that Greece had been left suddenly in a state of great disorder, and that the only chance of restoring order was by such a candidate as Prince Alfred being put forward. My hon. Friend read a long list of candidates, but he did not read the number of votes given for them. Very few votes, in fact, were given for any one but Prince Alfred, and the election was practically unanimous. I hope the few words I have said will make it clear to the House that the conduct of the Government has been perfectly straightforward. We felt the deepest interest in Greece, but it was not for us to interfere with them in their choice of a Government. They had a perfect right to change their Government as they chose. We were bound by solemn treaties, and it was our duty to ascertain what view was taken of those engagements by the other contracting parties. My hon. Friend the Member for Galway amused himself by making some observations in reference to Mr. Elliot, whose position he entirely mistakes, and who, he thinks, on the strength of his spelling his name with two "l's" and one "t," was selected, as a near connection of Lord Russell, for a special but unnecessary mission to Greece. If Mr. Elliot is an instance of the advantage of having such family connections, I can only say that he is a very discouraging example of being related to the head of the Foreign Office; for just as he was comfortably settled at Naples, he was suddenly deprived, by no fault of his own, of his position there, and has since remained unemployed in his profession. He had been previously in Greece; and when it became necessary to send a special mission to Greece, as he was not employed in active service, he was chosen for it. Had another diplomatist been taken from some other post for temporary employment, whilst Mr. Elliot was permanently put in his place, my hon. Friend might have had some ground for blaming Lord Russell. It is said that we deceived the Greeks by holding out other candidates. But, if you look carefully at the language used by Her Majesty's Government, you will see that there was nothing in it calculated to deceive the Greeks. Her Majesty's Government have not the slightest wish to deprive the Greek nation of the utmost liberty in choosing their king. It is true the King of Portugal was mentioned to them by us, under the impression that he would be inclined to accept the crown. His administration of the affairs of Portugal had been such that, if he had thought fit to accept, a more eligible candidate for the crown of Greece could not have been found, and Her Majesty's Government recommended him to the Greeks upon that ground. Unfortunately, he thought fit to decline. The next candidate was the Duke of Saxe-Coburg. It is well known that he is a wise and liberal prince, and I believe, if the Greeks had had the good fortune to obtain him for their King, they would be in a few years in a very different position from what they are now. Her Majesty's Government recommended him under the impression that he was prepared to accept, but unexpected difficulties arose in another quarter. His Chambers refused, except under certain inadmissible conditions, to sanction his acceptance of the throne of Greece, and he declined. I should have limited myself to these remarks upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government in the case of Greece, if observations had not fallen from hon. Members to which it is very desirable a reply should be given. The policy of Her Majesty's Government in the East has of late been very much misunderstood and very deliberately misrepresented. Her Majesty's policy in Greece is a part and parcel of her policy in the East. I believe that the necessity to Greece of an extension of territory has been greatly exaggerated. What is the utmost extension you could, upon any just grounds, claim for Greece? The only parts of the Turkish Empire inhabited entirely by Greeks are Thessaly and part of Epirus. They are mountainous districts. Thessaly possesses one fine harbour and one or two plains, but, I believe, that neither Thessaly nor Epirus would in any way add to the material strength or wealth of Greece. The Greeks have been diverted from that which would have really contributed to their welfare and happiness by this cry after an extension of territory in Turkey. Such extension would not add to their trade, or to their material resources. Their commerce is more the commerce of brokers. They have never been a manufacturing people, nor have they been merchants in the strict sense of the term. I grant that they have driven the English merchants out of the East, but how has that happened? The English merchant, under the ancient Levant Company, and his successor was one of those merchant princes of whom we hear people often speak. He lived in great luxury. He had horses and carriages. He indulged in profuse hospitality. To live in that way he had to make a great deal of money, and it was done by selling his goods at enhanced prices. The Greek, who became his rival, and finally succeeded him, lived on olives and cuttlefish. He slept on a carpet in his reception-room. He indulged in no luxury. He devoted his whole intelligence and ability to trade, and very great, I admit, are the intelligence and enterprise of the Greeks. The consequence was that he was able to undersell the great English merchants, and one after another they went. But by selling English goods at a less price they have very much increased the English trade, so that, undoubtedly, we are greatly indebted to the Greeks. Greece is remarkably well calculated for a race of enterprising people such as its present inhabitants. The people have maritime tastes, and the country is full of the finest harbours. They could command the most extensive and lucrative carrying trade, but all their prospects have been destroyed by the fatal spirit of intrigue. Instead of seeking to develop the resources which they possessed, they have sought to extend their territories and to look for other resources. This has led to great and unnecessary expenditure. They had an army and navy of no use whatever. They were compelled to maintain a useless and expensive diplomacy. Representative institutions fell into contempt; there was a general state of insecurity. No roads were formed, no improvements were effected; bankruptcy supervened; they did not pay their debts; their public men forfeited the public confidence—the same fate followed the King and Queen, and the end was the expulsion of the Bavarian dynasty. Her Majesty's Government have been constantly advising them to give up that fatal policy, and devote their attention to the improvement of the country. The answer has been, "You are enemies to the Christians; you are friends to the Turks." I believe the advice which was given was sound, and that if it had been taken, the Greeks would not have been in the condition in which they now are. No country in Europe was in such an admirable position as Greece. No one could attack her, for she was guaranteed by the European Powers. She needed no army and no diplomacy. And, with regard to Turkey, I defy any one to say, that during the connection of Turkey and Greece Turkey has ever violated any of her stipulations with Greece. If there have been violations of treaties, they have systematically been by the Greeks and not by the Turks. Hon. Gentlemen say, that we offered to cede the Ionian Islands to compensate for the disappointment felt by the Greeks when we refused them a prince. Two or three years ago I had the honour to take part in a debate on the Ionian Islands in this House, and the views which I expressed then I maintain now. If we had given to Greece the Ionian Islands at a time when the policy of Greece was so aggressive, it would have been fatal to British policy in the East.

Mr. Layard

We have made it a condition that Greece must give up her aggressive views if she expects this Government to cede to her the Ionian Islands. I remember that I said, the time might come when it would be equally advantageous to this country and to Greece for this country to cede the Ionian Islands, and I hope and trust that time will very shortly arrive. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) further touched on our policy in the East, and it is of the greatest importance there should be clear views as to what that policy really is. The cry has been raised, that the Turks look to London rather than to Constantinople. I remember M. Thiers on one occasion saying, when commencing a speech in the French Chambers, "I am going to give you a lecture on geography." I will not venture to lecture the House, but I wish to draw attention to three or four facts. Of what is Turkey in Europe composed? There are the Danubian Principalities, under the suzerainty of the Porte, inhabited by an unmixed Christian population, with their independence guaranteed by the European Powers, so that Turkey has only to receive the annual tribute. You have Servia, with rights not so extensive, inhabited by a pure Slavonic race of the Greek faith, but in no wise dependent upon the Constantinopolitan head of the orthodox Greek Church. On the contrary, one of her first struggles was to release herself from the government of the Greek Patriarch at Constantinople, and to obtain an independent Patriarch in Belgrade. You have Bulgaria, inhabited by a race presenting an ethnological anomaly. Although speaking a debased Slavonic language, they are, in fact, a Tartar tribe. The landowners are Turks, and they hold the land absolutely. The labouring population are Christians of the Greek faith, yet not accepting the superintendence of the Greek Patriarch at Constantinople, for a very short time ago so great was the struggle to throw off the government of the Greek Patriarch, that they actually threatened to become Roman Catholics if they did not succeed. You have Bosnia, inhabited by a Slavonic race. At the time of the Turkish conquest the landowners embraced the Mohammedan faith to save their lands. They were the old feudal landowners, and in some cases properties have descended among them for hundreds of years. But the agricultural population are of the Greek faith. In Roumelia you have the Bulgarians, a Slavonic people of the Greek faith, but the landowners are Turks, descendants of the conquerors. We then come to Albania, where, with the exception of the south, the population is Mohammedan. They are not Slaves, nor are they Greeks. In Thessaly, a very small province, you have a substratum of the Greek race, but there too, the landowners are for the most part descendants of the old Mohammedan conquerors; while in Macedonia the substratum is Slavonic with the exception, that a few seaport towns are inhabited by Greeks. But what, let me ask, are the relative populations of these provinces, for it is of importance the real facts of the case should be known to the country. I find that M. Ubicini, who is a good authority on the subject, gives the population of Turkey in Europe as follows:—Mohammedans, 4,550,000; Greeks, 1,000,000; Armenians, 400,000; Slaves, 6,200,000; and Roumans, 4,000,000. About one million of the Slaves inhabit the principality of Servia, the Roumans are the inhabitants of the Danubian Principalities. In Constantinople you have Mohammedans, 475,000; Armenians, 205,000; the Greeks being only 130,000. Such being the case, you will perceive that the great majority of the population of Constantinople is Mohammedan, while in the provinces the Mohammedans, who exceed four millions, are also the great landowners. More than this, they are men inured to arms, against whom the Christians have no power of successfully contending. I must, moreover, maintain, in opposition to my hon. Friend, that it was not the Turks who corrupted the Greeks, but the Greeks who corrupted the Turks, and I venture to say that no conquerors ever pursued a more liberal policy than that which the Turks adopted. They acknowledged the church of the Greeks and their municipal system. It is all very well to talk of taking the Greeks to Constantinople. Indeed, I do not exactly know what is meant by those who speak after that fashion. Do they desire to give Constantinople a Greek Administration and a Greek King? That is to say to put foreigners there to reign over the Bulgarians, Roumans, and Mohammedans of various races, and thus to violate all the principles of nationality. If so, you would only bring about a state of things infinitely worse than that which now exists. Now, without being particularly in love with the Mohammedans, I wish to be just to all parties; and how, let me ask, if the views to which I have adverted are carried into effect, do you propose to deal with the large population of Mohammedan landowners? Are you to forfeit their lands? Fortunately, the Sultan has never preached a war of religion; for if he were to raise that cry, the whole Mohammedan population would rise, and the result would be too horrible to contemplate. It is not to be expected that 4,000,000 of a warlike race of landowners would give up their land without a struggle; they would fight, and either conquer the Christians, or the Powers of Europe would step in, and thus lead to a European war. My hon. Friend alluded to Belgrade, and I think it is well to state that Serbia was under the guarantee of the European Powers; that Turkey never broke her treaties with Serbia, while Serbia over and over again violated them in the case of Turkey. When, however, there was a struggle in Serbia between those who attempted to oppress the people and the people themselves, the Porte invariably took the side of the liberal party. For two years there had been deliberate attempts made to break treaties, and to drive the Turks from Belgrade. The Turkish population, which lived near the walls of the fortress, had negligently allowed the Greeks to build within the gates which were the outworks of the fortress. The Prince of Serbia instituted a military police, by whom the Turkish quarter was attacked. Before the bombardment the Servians fired at the castle, and sacked the Turkish quarter, murdering many women and men, and the Pasha, who was greatly alarmed, bombarded the town—a step which could not be justified. A man accustomed to military command would not have done it, but there was a certain amount of provocation. To throw the blame of what followed entirely on the Turks is to adopt a line of argument totally at variance with the facts of the case. The Porte did its utmost to make amends by deposing the Pasha and sending one of its most eminent statesmen to make an inquiry into the facts of the case. Now, what we say is, that we should like to see the position of the Christians improved; that we should wish them to have the full enjoyment of their properties, to be allowed to profess their religion unmolested, and to be as well governed as possible. That we believe to be a much safer and surer way to better their condition, and to prepare them for the destiny which may be in store for them, than to permit them to be worked upon every year by intriguers, and exposed to be put down by Turkish or European intervention. You say we are always interfering in Turkey; but all we ask is, that no one else should interfere. Then we shall have no wish to do so. We have no desire to throw back these Christian populations for years and years, instead of allowing them to improve their condition. What has happened in Montenegro in consequence of her recent war, brought on by foreign intriguers? She has lost some of her best men, has been thrown back fifty years, and has gained nothing. If she had taken our advice, instead of wantonly attacking the Turks, and of rising in so hopeless a manner, all this would not have happened. My conviction is, then, that the policy pursued by the Government is a just and wise policy, and that it is the best, not only for the Christians themselves, but for Europe at large, which can be adopted.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the speech of the hon. Gentleman was directed to the state of Turkey, rather than the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, in reference to the affairs of Greece. He never remembered a debate which wandered so widely from its legitimate object; and in the few observations which he should address to the House he should endeavour to confine himself strictly to the matter they had in hand. It was natural that his hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, so long and so honourably connected with Greece, should look at the question from a Greek point of view; but, for himself, while wishing the Greeks well, and hoping that they would do in future what they had failed, according to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, to do in the past—namely, that they would pay attention to their commerce, cultivate their land, pay their debts, and respect the landmarks of their neighbours, he should discuss the question in an English sense, and with reference to European consideration. The question the House had to discuss was really very simple—namely, had the conduct of the English Government since the revolution broke out in Greece been manly, straightforward, and honest, and had their policy been a policy calculated to maintain the reputation of England and secure the tranquillity of Eastern Europe? Upon a careful perusal of the documents which the Government had submitted to Parliament, he was prepared to contend that they had failed most signally in those particulars. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary appealed to dates. He (Lord John Manners) accepted the challenge. He contended that the question was essentially a question of dates; and he took leave to ask the House—regarding it as a question of dates—if it could not be legitimately converted into a play with three completed acts and a fourth in progress? The first act of the Greek drama commenced with the expulsion of King Otho from the throne, and the determination of the three protecting Powers to act in harmony and concert together, and mutually to respect the Treaty of 1832. The time occupied in that act ranged over the first fortnight of November. The hon. Gentleman had told the House that England was the first to propose an adherence to the Protocol of Paris of 1832, and the first to re-enact the provisions of the treaty by which the independence of Greece was guaranteed. It appeared, however, from the papers submitted to Parliament, that if strict justice were done to Russia, she was the first Power to propose an adherence to the Protocol of 1832. It appeared that on the last day of October Lord Napier wrote from St. Petersburg that such was the wish of the Russian Government; and on the 6th of November the English Government took that view of the case in a letter addressed by Earl Russell to Earl Cowley at Paris. On the 7th of November Earl Cowley wrote that the Government of France had arrived at the same conclusion. So that at that date the three protecting Powers were entirely at harmony as to the principles which were to characterize their policy in Greece. Indeed, the noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs appeared to be so pleased with the overtures from Russia and so well satisfied with Russia, up to that time, that he could not refrain from expressing his gratification at the conduct of the Russian Cabinet. In answer to Lord Napier, Earl Russell said, in a despatch dated the 10th of November—

“I stated to your Excellency, in reply to your telegram of the 31st of October, that Her Majesty's Government were glad to hear the view taken by Prince Gortschakoff as to the mutual obligations of the protecting Powers, and that Her Majesty's Government have no doubt that those Powers will agree as to their duties and obligations in regard to Greece.”

Again, Earl Russell wrote, so late as the 15th of November, to Lord Napier—

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

“Prince Gortschakoff has been the first on the present occasion to appeal to that engagement, and to state most truly that it could not be departed from without the consent of the three Powers who were parties to it. . . . So far, I trust, there may be a concurrence of views among the three Powers. But the Russian Government, it appears, lay great stress on the provision of the Greek Constitution and subsequent engagements which provide that the successor of King Otho should be a member of the Greek Church.”

The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had argued that from that expression the Russian Government had shown an inclination to procure the election of a member of the Russian Royal family as King of Greece; because it was impossible, according to the Under Secretary, that any Prince could be found who was a member of the orthodox Greek Church without being also a member of the Russian Royal family. Did Lord Napier entertain the same view? On the 31st of October, Lord Napier wrote to Earl Russell—

“I thanked Prince Gortschakoff for his obliging communication, and then put the following question to him:—If a Prince of the House of Bavaria should present himself professing the orthodox religion, and fulfilling all the provisions of the treaty, would he have that degree of moral support on the part of the Imperial Government which could be exercised without applying an unjust constraint on the Greek people, and which would appear conformable to the spirit of the treaty, by which the three Powers had recognised the Bavarian dynasty and regulated the succession?”

Again, in the course of the debate, reference had been made to a statement made by Her Majesty's Government, early in the Session, that a Prince of the House of Saxe-Coburg was most eligible, because the Duke was ready to promise that a young member of his family should be educated in the Greek Church, in order that he might fulfil the obligations upon which Russia laid such great stress. Therefore, the argument that Russia, because she expressed anxiety to maintain what seemed to her the essential principles of the Protocol of 1832, was intriguing in favour of a scion of her own Imperial family, was a most gratuitous assumption.

Mr. LAYARD explained that he had not charged the Russian Government with intriguing. There were intrigues, but the Russian Government denied having anything to do with them.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Gentleman now exonerated the Russian Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON observed, that his hon. Friend never made a charge against the Russian Government.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the best plan would be for the noble Lord, and the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, to settle between themselves what course they would take in the debate. It was very unseemly that they should be contradicting each other.

MR. LAYARD said, that so far from contradicting, the noble Lord confirmed what he said.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman meant to make any charge of intrigue against the Russian Government or not, for he certainly understood him in his first speech to intimate, that because the Russian Government laid stress on the maintenance of that particular provision inserted in the Treaty of 1832, there was an intrigue going on in the Russian court, the object of which was to place a Russian Prince on the throne of Greece. If the hon. Gentleman said that there was no foundation for any such charge, then all the observations he (Lord John Manners) had made fell to the ground; but if he did not, then there was no proof whatever in the correspondence before them of any such intrigue existing, and the charge he now brought against the Government was that the change in the policy of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office was not justified by any appearance or even suspicion of intrigue on the part of Russia. As he had already stated, the first act of this melancholy Greek comedy terminated on the 15th of November. Earl Russell's despatches of that day expressed his satisfaction at the substantial agreement of Russia on the general policy which the great Powers ought to pursue, and the curtain descended amidst the plaudits of the British Government and expressions of hopefulness for the future of Greece. But what appeared when the curtain drew up for the second act? On the very next day, the 16th of November, the whole policy of the English Government had changed. The declaration of the noble Lord, that under no circumstances should Prince Alfred accept the throne of Greece, had become a dead letter: on the 16th of November the noble Lord telegraphed, and on the 17th wrote to Mr. Scarlett. The noble Lord said—

"I have received your telegram of the 10th instant, reporting that the Provisional Government of Greece considered the renunciation by the Powers parties to the Treaties of 1827, in regard to the Sovereign of Greece being chosen from their families, to have no longer a binding effect after the fall of the Bavarian dynasty; and that a strong feeling prevails throughout the country in favour of the election of His Royal Highness Prince Alfred to the vacant throne, in which case the provisions of the 40th article of the constitution in regard to the religion of the successor to King Otho would not be allowed to stand in the way of His Royal Highness's assumption of the sovereignty. In reply to your request for instructions as to the course you should pursue in this state of things, I have to desire that you will not interfere in regard to the election of the future Sovereign of Greece without direct instructions from Her Majesty's Government. Their desire is that the Greeks should be left free to choose their own King. With regard to the obligations of the three protecting Powers towards one another, I may have further communications to make to you."

Now, it was remarkable that the telegram of the 10th instant, which he believed to be the key to the change of policy by England, was not given in the papers laid on the table of the House, nor was any despatch connected therewith. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary tried to make out that the despatch of the 17th merely meant that the mode of the election of the King of Greece was to be left free, and he explained that to mean the mode of election by ballot, or universal, or restricted suffrage, and that it had nothing whatever to do with the change of policy of the British Government as to the eligibility of Prince Alfred. Was that the view that Earl Russell himself took? He found Earl Russell on the 6th of February stating—

"It appears to me that the proper course to pursue will be to leave the Greeks entirely free to take their own course and to reserve our objections."

Well, but the objections which the noble Lord had to the election of Prince Alfred on the 6th of November were not reserved, nor were they up to the 16th; and his complaint was, that the noble Lord did not treat the matter fairly, but having originally told the Greeks that they were not to have Prince Alfred for their king if they elected him, he departed from it in a fortnight, and for a whole month afterwards the Greeks were left to imagine, that if they elected Prince Alfred, no obstacle would be interposed by the British Government to his assumption of the Greek throne. Let the House observe the effect of the letter to Mr. Scarlett, requesting him to hold his hand and not interfere. From the 17th of November downwards, a great part of the despatches in the correspondence contained statements from persons engaged in various official capacities, from consuls, vice-consuls, and others as to the general feeling of the Greeks in favour of the election of Prince Alfred. On the 21st of November, Mr. Scarlett writes—

“I have the honour to enclose an extract from a Greek paper called the Future of the East, which alludes to the report spread everywhere yesterday that Prince Alfred is on his way to Corfu, and that His Royal Highness will be raised to the throne of the seven united islands. Since your Lordship's instructions to me by the telegram of November 16, I have, when asked any questions on the subject of a successor to the throne, merely held the language that I do not intend to interfere about the election of another Sovereign in this country. Of the strength of the feeling existing here your Lordship will, however, best be able to judge by the extract herewith enclosed. The writer, hearing, from common report, that I had received instructions to leave the Greeks entirely to their own inspirations in this conjuncture, apparently at once infers that I am favouring the movement. I need not assure your Lordship that my language both before and after the receipt of the telegram above referred to has been most guarded.”

The House would see that the language of Mr. Scarlett before the receipt of the telegram was most clear and decided that Prince Alfred could not accept the throne; but after that event it was guarded, as Mr. Scarlett himself said, and, in point of fact, confined to telling the Greeks that in this conjuncture he should not interfere in the election of a successor to the throne. The example set by Mr. Scarlett, in obedience to the direct command of his chief, was followed with alacrity by all his subordinates. For instance, there was an account given by Mr. Lloyd, the Consul at Syra, of the enthusiasm with which the name of Prince Alfred was received. The people assembled before the door of the British Consulate, and cheered when the Consul thanked them for the expression of their sentiments, which he said could not but be highly flattering. No doubt he maintained a guarded silence with reference to the acceptance of the throne by the Prince; but, undoubtedly, the people left his house under the full impression that no obstacle would be thrown by the British Government in the way of the Prince's acceptance of the throne. Mr. Scarlett himself made a speech, which was reported in the papers and copied into the blue-book, in which he said that the English Government desired to see the Greeks prosperous and free to choose whatever Prince they liked. Was that holding guarded language? Was that telling the people from first to last, from the end of October to December, that under no circumstances was the policy of the British Government changed? On the contrary, Mr. Scarlett told them in the same speech, which was corrected by himself, published in the National Guard, and sent to the British Government, that England would respect the expression of the desire of the Greek people; but that as to Prince Alfred it was impossible for him to tell them whether the throne would be accepted by that Prince. On another occasion Mr. Scarlett said that when an influential gentleman asked him his opinion upon that point, he declined to give him any opinion upon the matter, not having received further instructions; all that he did being to express a hope that the Greek nation would proceed to a modification of the Government, and be neither Republican at home nor aggressive abroad. Consul Ongley, at Patras, also gave an account of a demonstration to which he had responded with the usual reserve, without the least hint of Prince Alfred being excluded from the candidature. Hearing the repeated statements on the part of the British officials, in which there was no allusion to restrictions on the freedom of choice, and observing the marked difference in the language held at the beginning and at the end of November, it was impossible for a sharp, quick-witted people like the Greeks not to jump at the conclusion that the British Government had seen reason to change its views in a most material respect, and would no longer oppose the election of Prince Alfred. Thus the curtain fell on the second act, leaving the Greeks befooled into the notion that they were free to have the Prince of their choice. Reference had been made to the reluctance of Russia to consent to the exclusion of Prince Romanoffsky, and the noble Earl no doubt flattered himself he had achieved a diplomatic triumph over the Court of St. Petersburg on that point. Now, he could not learn from the despatches that the Greeks were at any time disposed to accept Prince Romanoffsky, or that the Russian Government had any design of thrusting him upon them. The voting papers certainly showed that he had scarcely any supporters at the election. It seemed to be a mere suspicion on the part of the English Government, and it was as well to recollect that similar comments were made at St. Petersburg, with much more apparent foundation, concerning the proceedings of our consuls and captains in regard to Prince Alfred. We had undoubtedly a vast deal of influence in Greece, and much greater means of propagating our views than Russia. If suspicions were in question, Russia had really more ground for saying that during the election England used underhand exertions in favour of Prince Alfred, than we had for charging Russia with improperly promoting the candidature of Prince Romanoffsky. But even if it were true that Russia had been intriguing in the matter, the proper mode of counteracting her efforts was not to plunge into other intrigues, such as those which had brought confusion upon Greece and misery upon the people, but to proclaim boldly and manfully that England would not accept or respect the election of Prince Romanoffsky. Who could believe, that if such a declaration had been published by us at a time when we had such moral influence and such an overwhelming material force in that quarter, the Greeks would have disregarded it, and elected Prince Romanoffsky? The idea was too preposterous to be dwelt upon for a moment. When the curtain rose for the third act, it disclosed the Greeks with their eyes at length opened to the truth by the peremptory despatch of the 1st of December, and introduced a new character. The stage direction was "Exit Scarlett with the policy of silence and reserve, and enter Elliot with the written exclusion of Prince Alfred in one hand, and the promise of the Ionian Islands as a sop in the other." With respect to that cession, that was, perhaps, not the proper time to enter into the question, and the printed papers threw remarkably little light upon either the reasons for the measure or the motive for adopting it at that particular moment; but there could be no doubt that it was offered as a sop to sweeten the refusal of the British Government to place Prince Alfred on the Greek throne. It was not, however, uninteresting to notice how the cession of the Ionian Islands first came to be mentioned in these papers. It was, it appeared, the Greek Minister in London who first suggested the cession. In a despatch to Mr. Scarlett, dated November 29, Lord Russell stated that Mr. Tricoupi told him it was understood all over Greece that the election of Prince Alfred meant that "a time might hereafter arrive when Thessaly and Epirus on one side, and the Ionian Islands on the other, might be peacefully united to the Greek kingdom." The noble Lord said that he had a good deal of desultory conversation with the Greek Minister, and in that desultory conversation the first idea seemed to have occurred to the noble Lord of the extent to which the desires of the Greeks were to be indulged. He (Lord J. Manners) did not think that that was a time when the question of the Ionian Islands should be gone into at length; but he felt bound to say, that whether the question were viewed from an English or from a European point of view, it could be shown to be impolitic and indefensible. Looking at the question from an English point of view, it amounted to a confession on the part of England that she had either failed or was likely to fail in the discharge of the trust which had been placed in her hands by the other great Powers of Europe in the Treaty of 1815, and was content to occupy less ground in Europe than she had hitherto occupied. Such an act must be regarded as the abandonment of a most important naval and military stronghold, which had been occupied by England for nearly forty years, and a departure from the traditional policy of the country. In a European point of view it was a virtual abandonment of the traditionary and well-founded policy of England, which regarded as of the highest importance the independence and integrity of Austria and Turkey. Certain illusory and childish safeguards, no doubt, hedged round this cession, but they would not be worth the paper on which they were written after the cession was made. Observe what they are. Greece must be a Constitutional Monarchy; she must elect a Sovereign who shall, in the language of Mr. Scarlett, be "a guarantee of order at home, and in the foreign relations of the country," and refrain from all attacks on her neighbours; and then, if the other Powers sanction such folly, and the Ionians are mad enough to vote it, Corfu, which lies off the coast of Turkey, is to be incorporated with the Greek Kingdom, in order to strengthen the really peaceful Empires of Austria and Turkey. As no suggestion was thrown out of the necessity of obtaining the consent of the Parliament of England, he supposed the House of Commons were not to have a voice in the matter, but he remembered in the Parliamentary history of this country a proposed cession of territory by a powerful Whig Ministry in the last century. The King was willing, foreign countries were treated with, and the cession was arranged by the Cabinet. But Parliament, the consent of which had never been asked, interfered, the cession was overruled, and Gibraltar still belonged to this country. But if this cession of the Ionian Islands were carried out, and Parliament remained silent, how long would Gibraltar continue ours? He trusted that Parliament would speak out in unmistakable language against this proposed cession of the Ionian Islands, and that a regard for the integrity of Austria and Turkey would hinder so unwise and so revolutionary a disposition of the territory of Eastern Europe. He called it unwise and revolutionary, and he now wished to look for a moment at the almost certain result of the cession, with its futile safeguards, if it were accomplished. M. Tricoupi had already announced that Greece seeks Epirus and Thessaly as well as the Seven Islands, and the Archbishop of Corfu, on congratulating Sir H. Storks on the tardy magnanimity shown by England in this cession, appealed to it as a pledge, that when reconstructed Greece should attack Turkey, the moral and material aid of England would be afforded to her. Who could doubt that Corfu would become the nucleus and starting point of every piratical expedition which refugees might plan for the purpose of invading Thessaly or Epirus, or promoting any other revolutionary design dangerous to the existence of the established Powers of Eastern Europe. He now came to the fourth act of this extraordinary drama; but over that darkness, hitherto impenetrable, seemed to hover. The hon. Under Secretary had been expected to shed some light upon the subject, but he had not said a single word upon it. The hon. Gentleman had, indeed, given the House an interesting account of the neighbouring provinces, but of the present state of the Crown of Greece he had not said one single word. It was anticipated that the hon. Gentleman would tell the House when the solution of the existing difficulty was likely to be arrived at, and what that solution was likely to be. So far as he could understand, England was performing the undignified part of hawking about this damaged crown in every little German principality, and dangling the bauble before the enraptured eyes of every German, or, for aught they knew, every Scandinavian princelet. What was to be the end of that Downing Street Comedy of Errors? The noble Viscount at the head of the Government was fertile in resource, and was seldom baffled in his undertakings.

The noble Lord would, however, pardon him if he compared him in this instance to the unsuccessful manager of a theatre, anxious for the termination of a play which had not had a great success either at home or abroad. Might he therefore make a suggestion? Would it not be possible that the performance might be brought to a successful issue if this oft-rejected crown, which had been slipping through the weary fingers of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, were to alight on his own unanointed head? Greece would thus gain a model constitutional monarch, and England lose, for a time at least, one of the most rash, meddlesome, and impulsive of all her pen-wielding politicians.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that although he did not think Her Majesty's Government were quite free from blame in their conduct of the negotiations respecting the succession to the throne of Greece, yet they were not, in his opinion, open to all the severe criticisms which had been lavished on them by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. To one matter he would refer, as it appeared to be considered important; it was not correct to say that they had concealed from the Greeks their determination to regard the Protocol of 1830 as valid, and to enforce it in the present instance. As early as the week after the revolution, Earl Russell wrote a despatch to Mr. Scarlett, in which he stated that the English Cabinet had resolved to consider the protocol as valid, and that fact was communicated immediately by our representative at Athens to the Greek Minister for Foreign Affairs. Nor was that all. At the very time when Mr. Scarlett was accused of misleading the Greeks, at Athens, when it was represented as culpable secrecy on the part of Earl Russell, it might have been ascertained, as both the hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House upon the subject might have found, if they had more closely examined the despatches, that Earl Russell had caused the proposal to be made at St. Petersburg, that the three Powers should at once make known their determination to act upon the arrangement of 1830. It was the Russian Government, and not the English, which objected to that course. On the 19th of November, Lord Napier—in accordance with instructions from England—proposed to Prince Gortschakoff that the three Powers should make a joint declaration at Athens that the Protocol of 1830 was to be accepted as binding; but the Russian Minister refused to be a party to any such announcement. That at once disposed of all the arguments which had been advanced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. With regard to other points which had been raised in the course of the debate, he did not think Her Majesty's Government equally free from blame. He should like to know whether King Ferdinand had ever been consulted before the throne was offered to him. That was a point which the hon. Under Secretary of State had not answered. How was it, too, the negotiations with the Duke of Coburg were announced as having been completed at Athens? That was not managing things in a proper manner, for it tended, more than anything else, to bring the Greeks into contempt. They complained, that having thrown themselves entirely upon England, England had neglected and betrayed them. They said—“The selection of a Sovereign is a most important thing for us, a young nation, which has just effected a revolution in a manner of which the English Government has spoken approvingly. We, throwing off all our own relations, come forward and say to England, ‘We admire your Constitution more than that of any other nation, and we will be guided entirely by your Foreign Office.’” Probably, too, the Greeks wished to pay a compliment to Her Majesty, whose virtues had raised the repute of constitutional monarchy so high. They went to the Foreign Office, and for six months that Department left them in a state of absolute neglect, or, when it acted, moved in such a blundering manner that he regretted a statesman with the high character of Earl Russell should have so committed himself. What was the present position of the question? It was not known whether King Ferdinand was ever consulted; all that could be said was that he had refused. The Duke of Coburg's acceptance had been announced as certain. On examination, that statement was found to be premature. Certain conditions had been imposed which could not be fulfilled, and therefore he also was out of the field. Who was in the field now? Months had elapsed; the Greeks, for what he might call a half-civilized people, behaved admirably; they kept order for some time, but no people could maintain order permanently in the absence of a settled Government. And that was the position in which the question now stood? The Greeks were deeply interested in the issue of that debate, and he hoped it would not close without some definite expression of opinion on the part of the Government. He felt anxious to press that point, as he perceived that the noble Lord the Prime Minister had just re-entered the House. It was highly desirable that the debate should not close, leaving the House, the Greeks, and Europe at large in its present state of uncertainty. It was expedient that some person should be chosen who had been previously consulted, and had consented to accept the throne; but it was also necessary that that choice should be made quickly. The Greeks had placed the choice of their future King in the hands, not of three Powers, as in 1830, but entirely in the hands of the British Government. The destinies of that people were confided altogether to the British Foreign Office; and, what was more, the Government had tacitly accepted that trust. But for months past there had been no sign of action, and it was not known in the least who was to be the future King of Greece. One thing was certain—that the state of Greece was daily growing worse. Among that impulsive people there were many spirits whom it was difficult to keep in order, and, after years of misgovernment, the country necessarily was not in a satisfactory state. No man in Europe was more interested than the noble Lord in the solution of this question; for, to his honour, Greece might be regarded as one of his children. The noble Lord, who was then the Minister of a party including many members who doubted whether a constitutional way was the best form of Government for the human race, at a time when democratic theories were much more in fashion than at present, and when Europe had not as enlarged a political experience, called into existence that family of constitutional monarchies throughout Europe, which in most instances had succeeded so well. He hoped the noble Lord would give his utmost care to this important subject, and the first choice having failed so lamentably, he would try to discover—though not among the little princes or Germany—a King who would fulfil his constitutional duties, under whose sway life and property would be respected, and who would advance the social progress of the country. The parallel between Sardinia and Greece, must have struck most persons. It was the only part of a great race governed by a ruler of its own choice. As an example to the whole of the Greco-Sclavonic peninsula, extending to Constantinople, it was of the utmost importance that it should be well governed. He could scarcely believe his ears, when he heard the speech of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the great Italian reformer—the Gentleman who during his whole life had been so indignant at the wrongs of Italy, the misgovernment of Austrian Lombardy, of Tuscany, and of Naples. Could it be possible that it was he—for he had taken down his words—who said that it was “intrigues which spoiled the Greeks”? As he listened to his hon. Friend, he really might have mistaken his sentiments for those of the Member for Honiton, with regard to Naples. The advice which his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs gave to the Christians of Turkey, was, that if they were well governed, it did not matter whether they were the subjects of Mohammedans or of a King of their own choice. That was a most singular instance of inconsistency. A change of position, as they all knew, sometimes entailed a change of opinion; but his hon. Friend—Turk as he was—must admit that Lombardy was a little better governed than the province of Roumelia. Even he must admit that there was more reason for the Greeks to desire a change than for those who had been subject to the Austrian yoke; that a Christian population did not like to be under a Mohammedan conqueror, and that the provinces of European Turkey could bear no comparison to any portion of the rest of Europe, not even to Greece itself, in cultivation and in civilization. Of all the Eastern people he had known, the Turks possessed the least idea of Western civilization. The Hindoo, the Persian, or the Affghan, he would even say the Tartar of the Caspian Sea, was infinitely superior to the Turk. Russia had civilized the Mohammedans under her sway, and made them vastly superior to the denizens of the Turkish Empire. He spoke the sincere convictions implanted by observation. Where were the Turkish universities, where the Turkish Merchants? Our Consul's reports told how Mohammedans treated the Christians. The name of Belgrade had been introduced into the debate. The hon. Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had explained that the Pasha bombarded the town because an innocent Turkish fisherman had been killed.

MR. LAYARD said, that what he had stated was, that among the various wrongs complained of, was the murder of two or three Turks.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR: And for that the town was bombarded! He thanked the hon. Gentleman opposite for bringing forward this subject. The Greeks having asked the son of our Queen to fill their vacant throne, the British Parliament was bound to see that the Government settled the question satisfactorily. The hon. Under Secretary looked down upon the Greeks, and stigmatized them as brokers, and not merchants. He had asked commercial gentlemen what that phrase could mean, and they were as little able to understand it as he was. If a firm like that of Ralli, for example, was not composed of merchants but of brokers, then the first firms in London also were not merchants but brokers. The Greek race was throbbing with a new life, and it was only the foot of a spy that was attempting to crush out that life. For the sake of the Greeks themselves, he should be sorry to see any province yet added to their kingdom; but they could not long remain deaf to the cry of the Greek Christians in Turkey. Their diplomacy had been wanting in that energy and decision which might have been expected from it, since the Treaty of 1856. The Turk was an Asiatic rather than a European, and ought to be peremptorily told, that if he did not introduce the reforms he had so often promised, his doom was sealed, and that not even the arm of England could shield him from the fate which surely awaited him. He rejoiced at the course taken by Her Majesty's Government in respect to the Ionian Islands, the proposed cession of which was a practical denial that we were, as a nation, actuated by the lust of conquest, and had gained for us the good opinion of Europe. In conclusion, he thought every Englishman must feel that the best mode of showing our sense of the honour done us and our institutions by the offer of the Greek throne, for an English Prince, was by extricating the Greeks from their difficulties as quickly as possible.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he would not have ventured to address the House had he not conceived that many hon. Members who had spoken had strayed very far from the question. The point really at issue was, whether Her Majesty's Government had followed a straightforward course in their conduct towards the Greeks. Having perused the papers before the House, he was sorry to say, that as far as he could make out, they had pursued a very double-dealing and Machiavellian line of policy in the matter. There had been a very animated discussion between hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the relative merits of Turk and Greek. That was not the first time the hon. Under Secretary had taken up the challenge thrown down to him on that head, and had espoused the cause of the Turk with all the warmth which usually characterized his advocacy. The real question, however, was as to when the candidature of Prince Alfred had positively been withdrawn. After the very able speech of the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) it was impossible not to see, that if Her Majesty's Government had as distinctly announced to the Greeks as their diplomatists announced to their agents, that Prince Alfred could not become the King of Greece, the unfortunate imbroglio in which the Greeks were now involved would never have arisen. Another question which it was material to consider was, whether Her Majesty's Government had really a right to drag the names of two most eminent members of the Royal Houses of Europe before the public without obtaining the previous sanction of those princes for doing so. It had been insisted upon by several speakers, and more especially by the hon. Under Secretary, that the choice and election of the Sovereign of Greece was to proceed from the Greeks themselves. Now, it occurred to him that that had not been allowed to take place, and that the persons who had really had the selection and nomination of the candidates were Her Majesty's Government. They had placed themselves in the unenviable position of going round about the world, and saying to this or that Prince, "Come, and let us offer you as a candidate for the Crown of Greece." Whatever might have been their motives—whether to obtain a predominant influence in Greece, or to secure to themselves the first choice of the King—it was not for him to say; but it seemed to him that their policy had been actuated more by a desire to exclude the Duke of Leuchtenberg than to give the Greeks the first opportunity of quietly selecting a Sovereign for themselves. He did not say it would not have been of advantage to exclude the Duke of Leuchtenberg; but if that object was to be attained, it should have been attained in a straightforward manner, not only by distinctly declaring, as Earl Russell did at first, but by consistently adhering to the declaration afterwards, that no candidate could possibly be accepted out of the reigning houses of the countries which had signed the treaty. Had the Government acted with similar candour and distinctness throughout the transactions, the Greeks would not have been placed in their present unenviable position. It was scarcely proper that the candidature of Prince Alfred should have been used simply to prevent the election of a Russian Prince.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that if the course which the Government had taken had had the effect of preventing another great Power exercising an undue influence over Greece, he was not prepared, having regard to all the difficulties with which they had had to contend, severely to censure the Government for the want of directness in their proceedings. At the same time, he was of opinion that the policy of successive Governments of this country, with regard to the East and to Greece, had not been consistent with any intelligible principle, but had been most wavering and contradictory. They made her a nation, and then deprived her of those very provinces which had been the cradle of ancient Greece. The name of ancient Greece could not be mentioned without Thessaly and Epirus suggesting themselves. The very names, Hellas and Hellene belonged to provinces which did not now belong to Greece. They had deprived her of these provinces, and they had imposed a Government upon her which was alien both in language and in religion. They offered them an acquisition—the Ionian Islands—upon the condition that they should make no use of it. What could be the use of the fortress of Corfu to them except to fill the Adriatic with gunboats; but they were to be forbidden to use it for the only purpose for which they would care to possess it—namely, to make aggression on the neighbouring provinces of Turkey. To make concessions with crippling conditions was a cheap kind of generosity. He was most anxious to know upon what constitutional doctrine that proceeding was founded. He had understood the noble Lord at the head of the Government to say that the prerogative, in virtue of which Her Majesty had offered to surrender the Ionian Islands, would authorize her, if she thought fit, to give up any other possession of the Crown. Some of his friends thought that the noble Lord could not have asserted such a position, and he was therefore desirous of knowing what interpretation the Law Officers put upon the prerogative in this respect. The cases which had been mentioned by the noble Viscount the other night were not at all analogous. No doubt, when a treaty of peace was being negotiated, the Crown was authorized to determine the conditions. But on such occasions the public were alive to what was going on, and had an opportunity generally of expressing their wishes. Therefore when Minorca was restored to Spain by the Treaties of 1783, or of Amiens, or on other similar occasions, the country was not taken by surprise. But in the present case Parliament was not sitting, and had not the slightest suspicion of what was going on, when the Ministry, wielding the prerogative of the Crown, entered into and might have completed the transaction. The Ministry were thus exercising a despotic power, and instances were not wanting of Liberal Ministries using the prerogative unscrupulously, as at the time of the Reform Bill, when they were not satisfied even by a verbal assurance, but actually required the King to sign a paper that he would swamp the House of Peers. If the Ionian Islands could thus be ceded, why not Gibraltar or Canada? It would therefore be extremely satisfactory to be told how far the doctrine of the Royal prerogative could be carried. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary generally got himself into some difficulty during autumn, when Parliament was not sitting, and it was a matter of very grave consideration how far such a cession could take place without the immediate knowledge of Parliament.

Mr. CAVE felt sure that no debate could take place upon the affairs of Greece without allusion to that most remarkable episode of a remarkable history, the proposed surrender of the Ionian Islands; he thought it was now full time for those who took an interest in the Ionian people to ask Her Majesty's Government how long those unhappy islanders were to drift on the uncertain sea of Greek politics, to the daily-increasing detriment of their best interests. It had been generally assumed, whenever this question had cropped up, as it were, in Parliament, that the Ionians desired separation from this country. He believed that to be an erroneous impression. He admitted that their Legislature had more than once passed resolutions to that effect, and they would probably do so again. He allowed that ordinarily the voice of the Parliament was to be taken as the voice of the people; but this was a very peculiar case, and it might be well to inquire whether since the hasty and inconsiderate changes which took place in 1849, during Lord Grey's Administration, but for which he was not entirely responsible, the Ionian people could really be said to have been represented at all. Even in this country it was sometimes difficult to say whether public opinion was the result of deliberate judgment, or merely the product of an organized agitation, which, while professing to educate the public mind, allowed it to dwell only on one side of the question; but in a small community like the Ionian Islands that was still more the case. Where there were few people of leisure, and the best men could not give time to public affairs, and especially where there was payment of representatives, politics degenerated into a mere trade, and public opinion, instead of pervading the whole community, was, like the Demos in the play of Aristophanes, only one character in the drama, and that not a very important one. Hon. Members scarcely knew perhaps how things were managed in the Ionian Parliament. Let them imagine a building with accommodation for the forty-two deputies on the floor, and some four hundred strangers in the galleries, who expressed their approbation or otherwise of the various speakers in a way which here would be considered very extraordinary, so that a debate was more like a scene at the hustings than a serious discussion in a deliberative assembly. Let hon. Members recollect that the franchise was practically low, especially in the towns, that political courage was not a conspicuous virtue of the Ionian character, and that the deputies were paid what was nearly equivalent to £300 a year in this country, and that the biennial protest against England gave them two advantages. The first would be appreciated nearer home; it was the éclat of patriots, martyrs, and conspirators, without the slightest risk. The second might be understood even within those walls; it was the speedy termination of the Session, which sent hon. Members back to their farms or their merchandise to enjoy their official salary without working for it, under the shadow of that Power they had openly defied. No inconvenience resulted from this. It had been provided for by the Constitution, and the Government was carried on during the long recess by the Lord High Commissioner and the Senate. This proceeding was, in fact, analogous to that House passing abstract Resolutions, a mode of obtaining popularity without responsibility; but playing with edged tools was a dangerous game, and had proved so in both cases. There was, indeed, a powerful party in the background, willing to bring things to a deadlock, that they might get rid of Lord Seaton's Constitution. They were still less sincere in the cry for separation. The right hon. Gentleman now Chancellor of the Exchequer offered them an amended Constitution. He did not think it would have answered, for the same reason that a similar Constitution did not work well in Jamaica; but it was a bond fide offer, and met most of their complaints. That was its fault. Agitators were the last people to desire the extinction of the grievances they denounced, and by which they lived. He had said that there was little public opinion in the Ionian Islands; but when the intelligence arrived that they were to be taken at their word, that real public opinion which was evoked by interest was aroused, and it was not too much to say that the news was received with universal consternation. The demonstrations in its favour were mere shams; that at Corfu was headed by a Zantiote, and composed of a few Greek priests and boys singing the Greek Marseillaise in the streets. The fact was, that the Ionians were too contented and too prosperous to wish for changes. The difficulties which followed Lord Seaton's ill-judged reforms, which threw succeeding Governments into the hands of a camarilla, by which we became the protected rather than the protectors to the just discontent of the people, had been to a great degree surmounted by the energy of the present Lord High Commissioner; and though Lord Russell's famous Turin despatch increased those difficulties by playing into the hands of the demagogues, yet he believed that to be true which was stated to him by an Ionian, who was no personal friend to the English (if he might be excused for repeating the exact words) "that every Ionian who had a pair of breeches was in favour of the protection." There were no more industrious, quiet, well-disposed people than the Ionians when left alone by agitators, especially the country people, and there was security of life and property throughout the Seven Islands which was not known in this country, and was wholly unknown in independent Greece. The evil reports they sometimes heard of them came from the fluctuating English population, who could not speak their language, took no pains to understand them, and sometimes, he regretted to say, treated them with that hauteur and want of consideration which was too often characteristic of our bearing towards foreign, and especially towards dependent races. From what he heard, however, he was afraid the present uncertainty was exercising a most unfavourable influence upon their character. They all had the fixed belief that some day they would be annexed to Greece. That idea was usually dormant, just as all hoped some day to grow old, but did not wish to precipitate the event. But they were an excitable race, and on such occasions as the present fell an easy prey to demagogues and agitators. But, whatever might be the result of this extraordinary measure in the islands, a more important question arose as to its effect on our ancient allies. We had heard a great deal lately of the regeneration of the Ottoman Empire, of its growing civilization and prosperous finances. Lord Hobart and Mr. Foster had been sent as a kind of dry nurses to that renovated youth; but was the present policy of Her Majesty's Government consistent with that deep interest in Turkey? The noble Lord could not be ignorant of the dangers which menace the Turkish Empire. He must know that Russia adhered to her traditional policy; that arms were carried last year by Russian agents from Corfu to Montenegro; that arms accumulated in Serbia, and that there was a confident expectation throughout the neighbouring provinces of Illyria and Dalmatia of a revolt among the Christian subjects of the Porte. Was this a time to make a demonstration on her other flank? the cession of Corfu would be a standing menace to Epirus and Thessaly. The great island of Candia would certainly be induced to revolt. When he was in the Turkish town of Preveza, the Greek inhabitants who were voting for Prince Alfred openly proclaimed their hope that within the year Albania would be as much Greek as the opposite coast of Acarnania. This was so well understood on the Continent that the noble Lord's policy was a perfect enigma there. An influential French journal asked "whether he had thrown over his first love, or was, like Molière's Don Juan, trying to persuade each of his victims that he loved her alone." "For, unless," the journalist went on to say, "the noble Lord has abandoned Turkey, his Eastern policy can only be called political bigamy—la politique bigame." But if that policy was difficult to be understood by others, how much more so by those who remembered the debate in 1861, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. He was not going to quote Hansard; the actual words used did not signify, but he appealed to those who remembered the debate whether the hon. Gentleman now Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the Under Secretary for the Colonies, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government did not then give the strongest reasons against the cession of the Ionian Islands, and whether those reasons had not equal force now. He did not complain of change of policy; and when changed, it was manly and honest to avow it, but they had a right to know the fact and the reason. Was it a concession to that party who were fond of exhibiting expenditure in one hand and aristocratic patronage in the other, and of turning them round in a kind of political thaumatrope till the two appeared inseparably connected; or had Her Majesty's Government no settled policy at all, but were ready at one time to make war for Cervi, Sapienza, or Turk's Island, and at another to throw away valuable possessions, like the poor maniac who one hour crowned himself with straws and the next tore off his most necessary clothing? The noble Lord, indeed, told them in the most decided tone that he was not going to give up Malta or Gibraltar, but in 1861 he had told them in a tone equally decided that he was not going to abandon the Ionian Islands. He (Mr. Cave) did not share in the unfavourable opinions entertained by many people respecting the Greeks. He looked on their future as more hopeful than that of Turkey. Again, he admitted that the Ionian Islands were not so important to England even with regard to our Indian communications as they formerly were, since the use of steam, and especially since the extension of railways down the Italian coast would shortly enable steamers to sail direct for Alexandria from Brindisi or Otranto without stopping to coal. But it must be borne in mind that in case of rupture with France or Italy the Trieste route, and therefore Corfu, might become again very important. He was not competent to speak of the strength of the works, but he was informed on very good authority that they could hold out for some months against any force which could be brought against them, and they must remember that in the days of Collingwood, when our sailors were not accustomed to shrink from desperate enterprises, those works, when far inferior, set at defiance the British squadron. There was no doubt, however, that these islands involved an annual outlay, and placed us in a somewhat false position. They could not stand alone, and their manifest destiny was to be absorbed in Greece, for Greek they were in language and feeling, even in Corfu, though some of the principal families were of Venetian origin—as much Greek as Attica, the population of which was half Albanian. He should have no objection to see them belong to Greece; but then it must be to a well-governed and tranquil Greece—a Greece which would do them justice, and continue the good Government they had hitherto enjoyed, and not use them as stepping-stones to aggression upon her neighbours. Greece must show that she could rule five cities before she could claim to be intrusted with ten. The converse had been done in this case. Like a foolish parent who bribed a child to be good, we had with almost indecent haste offered the Ionian Islands to Greece as an inducement to be moderate, forgetting that we were dealing with the most subtle race in the world. They would take our bribe, but would they abandon that dream of extended empire which was ever present with them, and which we gave them additional means of realizing? He believed that the expense of the occupation might be much diminished. The storekeepers and commissariat might be curtailed, and the engineers, who seemed to think it their business to change the face of nature in every possible way, might be checked. But, however that might be, he believed that the truest economy was the maintenance of the national character; and it appeared to him that by thus precipitating what might have been later done with honour and propriety, the Government had acted unfairly towards our dependents, inconsiderately towards our allies, and gained neither the gratitude of Greece nor the good opinion of Europe.

MR. C. C. CLIFFORD said, that the people of the Ionian Islands might be divided into two classes—those who had got places, and those who wanted places. A few days before, he had received a letter from Corfu, in which the writer said, that when the news arrived of the proposed cession, an Ionian asked him what demon could have inspired the English Government to entertain such a horrible idea. "But how comes it," replied his informant, "that you, who were the great author and proposer of annexation to Greece, should now avow opinions so diametrically opposite?" To which the answer, full of charming candour, was, "That's true; but now I have got a place, then I wanted one." The misfortune of the islands was that the educated classes had no profession to follow. There was no army, no navy, no bar; the clergy were taken chiefly from the agricultural classes, and so there was no other resource open to those classes but to try for place under Government. There was thus one continual rush for places; and unless men succeeded, they would join in an agitation against any Government. He agreed, also, with the hon. Member who had just spoken, that it was a great misfortune to the Ionians to have paid representatives, for politics thus became a mere trade. While admitting that, however, his conclusion differed from that of the hon. Member. He believed that we were in a false position in the Ionian Islands. The people there were not British subjects. They were simply placed under British protection, and he thought it was a great pity that England had ever accepted such an invidious trust. The people had constantly remonstrated against the protectorate, and expressed their desire for union with Greece, but now that we had taken them at their word he believed that they would most bitterly repent it. Under British rule they had been much better governed than they would have been if united to Greece; but still the connection with this country had been unfortunate. He fully believed that the value of the islands had been much overrated. Corfu was no longer valuable as a naval station, and he was assured that during the war between France and Austria the news that the French fleet had steamed up the Adriatic on its way to blockade Venice first reached the Islands from the newspapers of the Continent. In his opinion the political interests of this country, as well as a regard for economy, would be best consulted by severing a connection which had been obnoxious, or been said to be obnoxious, to the inhabitants and prejudicial to ourselves.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I own that when the hon. Member who made this Motion gave notice of his intention, my curiosity was greatly excited to discover what could possibly be the ground upon which he would found an attack upon Her Majesty's Government for its conduct in regard to this affair of Greece. And certainly the result of his speech has shown that, whatever talent he possesses—and I do full credit to it—even his ingenuity and that of those who have followed him have been very much at fault to find any tangible point upon which they could rest a real attack. They have been liberal in their personal abuse of my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Department. But the able conduct of our foreign relations by my noble Friend is sufficiently well known to the public to make him perfectly indifferent to the personal attacks which have been made upon him this evening. And judging by recent allusions to the motives which influence persons in the Ionian Islands, who are described as only attacking the Government when they want places, I think, that if that be a reflection generally applicable to mankind, my noble Friend may be still more indifferent to the personal observations which have been made this evening. As far as I was able to collect that which has fallen from Gentlemen opposite, I think there are one or two things which have grievously weighed upon their minds, and which have excited on their part bitter regret and disappointment. The first is, that the Greeks should have exhibited so universal a desire to elect an English Prince. ["No, no!"] I will prove it, because one attack which has been made upon the Government is that we did not let the Greeks know that by our diplomatic engagements, and by considerations of our own, Prince Alfred could not accept the crown of Greece, and that we did not thus prevent his election. But those who raised that objection were compelled, by the papers which they held in their hands, to acknowledge that at the earliest possible moment we did let the Greeks know that our diplomatic engagements and our own Imperial considerations would prevent him from accepting the Greek crown. Then, when we had told the Greeks that Prince Alfred could not accept the crown if elected, and when in spite of that communication the Greeks went on with a full determination to elect him, hoping that—as they themselves avowed—in spite of the first refusal, those objections would be waived if he were elected by a unanimous vote of the Greek nation, it is said, "You committed an egregious fault because you actually told your Minister in Greece that he was not to interfere in the Greek election." Well, Sir, that was indeed a grave offence. Would hon. Members opposite, then, have had Mr. Scarlett and Mr. Elliot to have gone about to all the Greek hustings and all the assemblies where the elections were taking place, saying to the people, "Now, mind you are not to vote for Prince Alfred, but vote for anybody else you please?" Why, Sir, if we had instructed our Minister to interfere in any such way, we should have been told that it was most unbecoming thus to meddle with the domestic concerns of any foreign nation. We did our duty by taking the earliest opportunity of acquainting the Greeks that Prince Alfred could not be their King, if elected; but it would have been a gross impertinence on our part had we interfered in the election by trying to prevent the Greeks from voting in a particular manner. The noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) talked about the instructions given to our Minister which had reference to the conduct of the election, whether by ballot or open suffrage. Surely, the noble Lord could not have supposed anything so absurd? What was meant was what the plain words expressed—namely, that our Minister, having told the Greeks what the decision of the English Government would be, was not to meddle in any manner as to the mode in which they might see fit to express their opinions by their votes. Sir, I am astonished that hon. Gentlemen, Englishmen, should feel this sort of regret that the Greek nation have expressed such confidence in England. ["No, no!"] If that is not the feeling of hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from the other side of the House, what is it they mean, and what is it they would have had us do? Two things evidently weighed upon their minds—First, that the Greek nation should have been permitted to express a unanimous vote in favour of an English Prince; and, next, that they should not have been allowed to elect a Russian. That is the only conclusion to which we can come from the arguments that have been used. ["No, no!"] When hon. Gentlemen declare that we have befooled the Greeks, that we have deluded them, and brought them into a wretched condition, I deny every one of these assertions, and say that our course throughout was perfectly frank and straightforward. We told the Greeks from the first what our position was, and what would be the result of their election; and if they chose in spite of this to manifest their confidence in the British Constitution, and their attachment to the Royal family of this country, I say that instead of repining at that, as hon. Gentlemen do—[Loud cries of No!]*—*they may cry "No," if they please; but the country, when it reads this debate, will say "Yes!"—instead of repining at such a mark of confidence, they ought to feel proud at an election which enabled the Greeks in the face of the world to show their respect for England, and their admiration for the Royal family and institutions of this country. It is said that we have neglected the Greeks—that we have not taken pains to fulfil the trust reposed by them in the British Government with respect to suggesting to them a fit person to be their Sovereign. But, Sir, we have lost no time, and spared no pains, to accomplish that object. We have communicated with several distinguished persons whom we thought fit to be selected by the Greeks for the high post of reigning over that which, in spite of all that has been said, is, I believe, a most enlightened nation, and one destined to a high place among the people of Europe. The distinguished persons to whom our attention was directed as being fitted for the selection were persons who had other interests and other occupations which prevented them from accepting the throne. But, undoubtedly, we did from time to time let the Greek Government know we were in connection with these persons. We were greatly mortified, and the Greeks were much disappointed, when one after another these illustrious persons felt themselves prevented by their local duties and ties from allowing themselves to be put in nomination for the Greek throne; but we do not despair that we may yet be able to point out to the Greeks one who may be fit to perform the high duty of reigning over Greece and be acceptable to the people at large. At the same time, the selection of a Sovereign lies with the Greeks themselves; for we have not received, as my hon. Friend seems to suppose, plenary powers from that people to select a Sovereign for them. They are to exercise their own choice. All the British Government can do is to suggest a person who may appear fitting on the one hand, and whom they would be likely to accept on the other. Sir, it has been said that the Greeks are reduced to a lamentable condition. They are reduced to no lamentable condition. They have shown great moderation and prudence; they have conducted a great revolution in a manner that does them honour. There have been no acts of violence—no popular outbreaks. They have had great difficulties in arranging their Provisional Government, but they have done it to the best of their judgment, and nothing has happened to entitle any man to say that their condition is a miserable one, or that they have suffered in the eyes of Europe by the course which they have pursued. It is most meritorious on their part, because, undoubtedly, the Government they have suffered under for the last thirty years has been calculated to degrade and demoralize them. It has been a Government carried on by corruption for the purposes of arbitrary and despotic rule. It has been a Government on which a Constitution was forced in 1843, but which, from that time down to the last moment of its existence, endeavoured by every device and artifice to render that Constitution null. That endeavour was made by corruption of every description, which at last led to the events of October. And, Sir, when hon. Gentlemen say the Greeks are so difficult to govern that it will not be easy to find a prince to undertake that task, I say that a nation which has submitted for thirty years to such a Government as the Greeks have at last severed themselves from cannot be difficult to govern. There must be in such a people a latent principle of subordination and order which must give rise to a feeling of encouragement, and not of difficulty, in those who are called upon to take a part in managing their affairs. I should like to know in what manner we have laid ourselves open to imputation in our dealings towards Greece. I say that from the beginning of the negotiations to this moment we have been frank and straightforward in our language to the Greeks, and that we have been persevering in our efforts to find a prince willing to accept the throne who would be fitted for that high position and acceptable to the Greek nation. What has been said by my hon. Friend (Mr. Layard) as to the conduct of Russia is quite true. I will speak out. The shuffling and evasion on the part of the Russian Government were such that it was with the utmost difficulty we got them to acknowledge that the Duke of Leuchtenberg was, as he is, a member of the Imperial family. He is doubly a member of the Imperial family—First, as the son of the daughter of the late Emperor; and next, through an ukase by which he was aggregated to the Imperial family, and brought within the line of succession to the Russian throne. We had a right to expect a more frank and straightforward course of conduct on the part of the Russian Government at the outset than that which we had to contend with in bringing them to a frank and fair categorical admission that the Duke de Leuchtenberg is excluded by the protocol. Now, Sir, other topics have been brought into the discussion. My hon. Friend the Under Secretary has been taxed with having introduced the subject of Turkey and the European provinces of Turkey. It was not he who introduced it. It was my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), who, soon breaking away from Greece, entered the lists in regard to Belgrade, Servia, and other places. My hon. Friend the Under Secretary followed very rightly, to correct the errors into which my hon. Friend the Member for Galway had fallen. From his knowledge and personal experience of the country, no man has a better right to express an opinion on the subject; and he has stated, that so far from Turkey being in a decrepid state, in which it is the fashion in some quarters to represent to the House, it has of late years made great progress towards that state of civilization at which we hope to see it arrive. My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) has used language which shows that he has prejudices against the Turks. He ought to get rid of those prejudices, for it is perfectly clear that education and intelligence are abroad in Turkey, and that the Turkish Government is improving. I trust their organization will go on improving from day to day. As to the Christians, no doubt there are privileges and equalities yet to be conceded to them; but they are much better off than they were at any former period. I will not go into "the siege of Belgrade," or the attack on the fortresses; but there is another question which has been introduced, and which is connected with the subject of the debate, although it was not much alluded to by the hon. Member who opened it—namely, the cession of the Ionian Islands. The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. D. Griffith) strongly argued that they are a British possession, and that in the course of last autumn, when Parliament was not sitting, we alienated them. Now, first, the House knows that the Ionian Islands are not a possession of the British Crown; and secondly, it is aware, that though we intimated that under certain circumstances we should take certain steps which would lead to the cession of those Islands to Greece, yet nothing has been actually done. Therefore, when the hon. Member says we have surreptitiously alienated what he calls a possession of the British Crown, I must reply that we have done no such thing. The hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave) said he was much opposed to the cession which we proposed; but he added, that if the Greek Government would maintain order and peace, and conduct itself in such a way as to render the people happy, then it might be well to cede the Ionian Islands to Greece. But, Sir, the hon. Member has only paraphrased a passage in the despatch of my noble Friend; because these were the conditions on which my noble Friend said the Government was willing to take steps for a cession of the Ionian Islands to Greece. The hon. Member, though, began by stating facts which had come to his knowledge, to show that the Ionians were anything but willing to part with the English protection and be ceded to Greece. No doubt, as Greece was under the late Government, under King Otho, it would have been a misfortune for the Ionian Islands to have been transferred to Greece; and when we are told that we argued against the cession in 1861, it was because Greece was so ill-governed at the time that we felt it would have been a cruelty to be accessory to depriving the Ionian Islands of the protectorate of this country and ceding them to Greece; but if the Government of Greece becomes a good one, regulated by the principles referred to by the hon. Member for Shoreham, then the feelings of the Ionians may become entirely altered, and they may be desirous of being transferred to Greece. Again, he said, that annexation to Greece is the manifest destiny of those islands. If that be so, we are not to blame for saying the time may come when that destiny may be accomplished to their profit and not to our loss, and that we ought to aid in accomplishing it. The hon. Member says that we are laughed at in France for this transfer. Perhaps, in a country which very lately made such acquisitions, and in such a manner, as Savoy and Nice, the voluntary surrender of anything belonging to us may be looked on as a childish piece of folly; but I cannot help thinking that the example, if we set it, of a country on principle, and without any regard to selfish considerations, releasing a population from her rule on the ground that it is for the advantage of that population she should do so—I cannot help thinking that this may be an example so applicable to many transactions pending in Europe as to be not only honourable to England, but useful, and likely to lead to good results to other parts of Europe. I can only say, that I hope the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion will be content with having expressed his own opinions. We shall be ready to give any papers which may seem to bear usefully on the subject, and I hope that, notwithstanding the late hour, he will now allow us to go into Committee of Supply. I promise him that as time and the correspondence go on, or when there are other papers which may be useful to the deliberations of the House, we shall have no objection to produce them.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, although in the course of this debate we have wandered from the subject originally before us, and various Members have taken us half over the map of Europe, yet at the same time the question itself is very short, simple, and narrow. The noble Lord who has just sat down, it is quite true, has recalled the House to the question before us; yet he, too, has—I think very adroitly—tried to lead away the House from the real point presented to our consideration by the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane). It seems as if the noble Lord was conscious of the weakness of his answer, and seemed to think that to the particular point under consideration the Government would not venture to reply. The noble Lord entered upon topics totally unjustified by the course of the debate, and which seem to me to have nothing on earth to do with the question before us. The noble Lord said he was surprised that the debate had been taken advantage of by those on this side of the House, and some other hon. Members, to make a personal attack upon the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office. Well, Sir, I have been in the House since the commencement of the debate—I have listened attentively to every speech that has been made, and I have not heard from the beginning of the evening to the present moment anything that in any form or shape could be construed into a personal attack. If criticism of a Minister and his policy is to be characterized as a personal attack, then I think there will very speedily be an end to freedom of discussion and an end of all comment on the policy of the Government. But the noble Lord went beyond that, for he told us that the debate had been taken advantage of by hon.

Gentlemen on this side of the House, who were moved with regret that a Russian Prince had not been placed on the throne of Greece, and that it had been made a matter of complaint by those hon. Members that the people of Greece had shown respect to the people of this country and their Sovereign by offering the crown to a British Prince. Sir, I say that not only no such reflection has been made by hon. Members on this side of the House, but, on the contrary, they have expressed a sentiment, on this and on the other side of the House, that the choice of the Greek people was a credit to Greece, as it was at the same time a high compliment to the Crown and people of this country. The question before the House is simple: it is whether the policy of Her Majesty's Government as regards the people of Greece in this question has been a frank, a straightforward, and an English one. No hon. Member has expressed regret that an English Prince had been selected by the Greek people; but it has been regretted that the policy of Her Majesty's Government has not been that which became the English Government. Now, what is really the history of this case? We have heard from the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in strong language, his opinion of the Greek people, and of the way in which this revolution has been carried through. We have been told that it has done them honour to have got rid of, what he calls, a corrupt Government, in the way they have done, without violence or bloodshed; that they have asserted their rights; that they have looked to the establishment of constitutional government; that they directed their first wishes to this country as being the best security to obtain such a form of Government; that they disclaimed the desire to wage war or commit acts of aggression on their neighbours; and that they had desired solely to obtain their rights in a peaceable and constitutional manner. This is what the noble Lord has stated as the object of revolution. Well, what is the position of the Greeks now? They are without a Government and without a Sovereign, and on this very day we receive news from Greece that the army is divided into two parts, and that the Greeks themselves are in hourly fear of massacre and anarchy. We ask ourselves what it is that has produced this state of things? How is it that a revolution which at its outset was so hopeful, which in its course, and in the various steps taken by those who promoted it, did so much credit to the people, has led to results so contrary to all that was hoped or expected? Instead of constitutional government, you have anarchy; instead of peace, the fear of massacre and bloodshed. The reason is this—the hopes and wishes of the Greek people have been trifled with. That the opportunity has been lost of establishing a constitutional government in that country, that now they are drifting hopelessly on the sea, is, we believe, to a great extent the result of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government, have not dealt fairly with the House in quoting the papers to which reference has been made. Scarcely any one in this House, I believe (unless it be an hon. Friend behind me, judging from a chance expression which he dropped), will regret that Prince Alfred did not accept the throne of Greece. I believe that the acceptance of the throne by His Royal Highness would have been a most fruitful source of complication and embarrassment and danger to this country, and would have contributed neither to the peace nor the future honour of His Royal Highness. Therefore, I put that altogether out of consideration now, because nobody regrets it. But what we regret is, that Her Majesty's Government, having in the first instance adopted a clear, open, and decided policy, and boldly announced it in the most unmistakable terms, afterwards, for reasons which I shall presently advert to, changed their tone, and allowed the Greek people to believe it was possible, if Prince Alfred were elected, that he still might accept the throne, and that at the last moment the Greeks found their hopes most cruelly disappointed. I am not going to refer to the papers at any length. They have already been referred to in the debate, and on all sides it is quite conceded, both on the part of those who impeach the conduct of the Government, and on the part of the Government, who themselves have pointed it out, that in the first instance they clearly announced their opinion that any member of the Royal families of the three protecting Powers was ineligible to the throne. With that we entirely agree, but what we say is that you afterwards changed your tone, and that can be easily proved by reference to one despatch. After the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had communicated, in the most open terms, his opinion that no member of the Royal families of France, Russia, or England were eligible, and had directed Mr. Scarlett not only to express that to the Ministers, but to make the opinion of the English Government known in all quarters wherever he possibly could, he sent a telegram on the 16th of November, which is thus referred to by Mr. Scarlett, in a despatch dated November 24, and received on December 6—

“Your Lordship is aware that on account of the uncertainty hanging over the question of a successor to the throne of King Otho, and more especially since I received a telegram from your Lordship (dated the 16th of November) directing me ‘not to interfere at all in election of the King,’ but to leave them ‘to choose whom they like,’ I have, in my position here, maintained the necessary reserve on that important subject. When informed previously that a demonstration was likely to occur in front of the Legation, in order not to give umbrage to any of my colleagues I purposely left the house, and by my language deprecated the intention of the Greeks to make any manifestation of this kind before my residence, thinking it might have the effect of compromising Her Majesty’s Mission, and causing a false construction to be placed on the neutral line of conduct I had determined to adopt.”

It was perfectly clear that at that time Earl Russell had, in the first instance, directed Mr. Scarlett to announce, not only to the Greek Government, but wherever he possibly could, in society, to public bodies, and others, the statement that Prince Alfred could not be elected. He then sends another telegram desiring him to let it be known that the Greeks may “choose whom they like,” and directing Mr. Scarlett not to interfere in the election. That telegram, according to Mr. Scarlett, throws the Greek people into the most utter uncertainty as to the future. We will go on a little further. Mr. Scarlett speaks of a demonstration in favour of Prince Alfred, and he says that in returning thanks for this demonstration he merely thanked them for the honour they had done His Royal Highness, and expressed sympathy for the Greek nation; but he does not any longer say, as Earl Russell had desired him in the first instance, that it was impossible for Prince Alfred to accept the throne. On the same day there is another demonstration, and when he is asked to be the bearer of the sincere and unanimous wish of the people to have Prince Alfred for their King, Mr. Scarlett replies that he is “not authorized to give them an answer on this matter.” Not authorized to give an answer on this matter! Why, the instructions he received from Earl Russell in the first instance were, that he was to make it known everywhere that Prince Alfred could not accept the throne; and it is only until uncertainty is produced by this telegram that this modified answer is given by Mr. Scarlett. Is that all? On the following day, Sunday, a still larger demonstration took place, and, in describing the form of it, he says—

“I was addressed in the same manner, and spoke on this occasion to the same effect, adding that I felt bound to continue my reserve with regard to the name of Prince Alfred, whose acceptance of the throne of Greece depended on considerations which I was unable then to determine.”

Is it not perfectly clear from these papers which the Government have given us, that in the first instance they intended to exclude the members of the three Royal families; and then, finding Russia willing to agree to it—nominally, but not really, because, although Russia was willing to agree to the protocol as regards the members of the Royal family of Russia, she wished to exclude from that description the Duke de Leuchtenberg—is it not clear that the British Government, finding that, changed their tone and allowed it to be considered by the Greek people as possible that Prince Alfred might be elected, and that he might possibly accept the throne? And that with this double object—they knew, on the other hand, that Prince Alfred was the more popular candidate of the two, and they thought that if he were withdrawn, the Duke de Leuchtenberg might be elected, and they therefore allowed the Greek people to think that Prince Alfred might be elected, and might accept the throne, in order to prevent, as far as lay with them, the election of the Duke de Leuchtenberg. And this was further done with another object as regards Russia—that the Russian Government might be put in this position, finding that the Duke de Leuchtenberg had no chance, that the popularity of Prince Alfred was such that his election was secure, they would be driven to acknowledge that the Duke did come under the description of a member of the Royal family of Russia, and was therefore excluded from the throne. Her Majesty’s Government succeeded in this—they succeeded in preventing the Duke being elected, and in obtaining a declaration that he was ineligible because Prince Alfred was ineligible. But is that a policy which the English Government ought to pursue—trifling with the feelings and aspirations of a whole people? Is this a straightforward, frank, and candid course? No, Sir; it appears to me to be a disingenuous policy, to be a tricky policy, and one that reflects no credit on this country or on the Government. This is the charge that has been made against the Government, and it is that which they have not sought to meet except by inaccurately quoting papers which they themselves have supplied. There are other grounds of quarrel I have with the Government. Having thus, as the hon. Member for Honiton has well said, befuddled the Greek people, they make that people and themselves ridiculous; and why? Because, throughout, as it appears to me, their policy has been one of impulse, and they have acted without consideration and advice. As regards candidates, they have proposed King Ferdinand of Portugal, who, it was soon found, would have nothing to do with the Greeks. Would it not have been more reasonable to have ascertained his wishes and feelings before they proposed him to the Greek people? Then they took the same course with regard to the Duke of Coburg. Would it not have been as well if they had ascertained the grounds on which they were proceeding before they proposed his candidature, and went the length of authorizing the minister at Athens to announce his acceptance of the throne? Has not this hasty, hand-over-head policy, which has marked their choice of candidates, characterized the course of the Government in reference to the Ionian Islands? Before Greece had a government, they said they were willing to give up the protectorate if the Sovereign to be elected would do as Otho had done thirty years before—promise everything and fulfil nothing. Did it never strike the Government that there were others to be considered—that the question might be deemed by the British Parliament of sufficient magnitude and importance to deserve their consideration. Did it never strike them, before throwing this apple of discord among the people in the East, that it might be as well if the Ionian people were consulted. The noble Lord the other night told us that this was a mere offer, and that it went for nothing—he said it meant nothing because it was necessary to consult the other parties to the Treaty of Vienna before the protectorate could be given up. Did it not strike the noble Lord that Austria was deeply concerned in the matter, and that her consent might have been asked? Or was this intended to show a piece of cheap generosity, in exhibiting to the Greek people the readiness of England to make the cession, and throwing the odium upon Austria of standing in the way? It appears to me that the policy of the British Government has been throughout hasty and ill-considered, and that from the beginning to the end—whether looking to their negotiation with Greece as regards the candidates proposed, to the cession of the Ionian Islands, or still more looking to the conduct they pursued towards the Greeks in first refusing Prince Alfred, then encouraging them to hope, and finally denying them—their conduct has not been such as to reflect honour on this country, and that is certainly a charge which Her Majesty's Government have not successfully met this evening.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, after the appeal which had been made to him by the noble Viscount, he would not divide the House. The noble Lord had misrepresented him. He had never said that the Greeks were difficult to govern. On the contrary, he expressed his admiration of their conduct in the increased difficulties consequent upon the noble Lord's policy. It was also a misrepresentation to say that hon. Gentlemen on those (the Opposition) benches regretted the popularity of Prince Alfred. He had said himself, that it was the noblest testimony which could be given of the high opinion entertained towards Her Majesty and English institutions. The conduct of Earl Russell had excited false hope, and was disrespectful to the Sovereign in making use of Prince Alfred's name for the sake of a diplomatic intrigue.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

STOPPAGE OF OFFICERS' PAY FOR FORAGE.—ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he rose in pursuance of notice, to move—

"That this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that the stoppage from the pay of Cavalry and Horse Artillery officers for forage be discontinued.

The question, though brought under the consideration of the House on previous occasions, stood now upon different ground to what it did before. Field officers of cavalry and horse artillery were permitted to keep four horses, and obliged to keep two, and for each horse 8½d. per day was stopped. Captains were permitted to keep three horses, and obliged to keep two, and for each horse in like manner 8½d. was stopped. Lieutenants and cornets were obliged to keep two horses for the benefit of the service, and 8½d. was likewise stopped from them. Now, he contended that it was wrong to say that the pay of a cornet was 8s. a day, and then to deduct from it 1s. 5d., which, in reality, reduced his pay to 6s. 7d. The mess in a cavalry regiment was exceedingly expensive; and if he put down the expenditure of a cavalry officer at 10s. a day, he was sure that he was not putting it at two high a figure. In consequence of the examination system, of which he did not complain, so many rich men did not enter the service at the present day as was formerly the case, and therefore officers, as a general rule, were less able to dispense with the money which was deducted from their pay for forage. The deduction operated, he might add, with the greatest severity in the case of those officers who were raised from the ranks for their good conduct, and who were obliged to keep up the appearance of gentlemen on very small pay. It was not a small matter to have £26 a year deducted from the pay of subalterns; £39 deducted from the pay of captains; and £52 a year deducted from the pay of field officers. The subject had been brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon and the late Lord Herbert, when in office, and had not only received their favourable consideration, but had been pressed by them on the Lords of the Treasury, who stated that on certain conditions they might agree to the discontinuance of the stoppage. Those conditions had been complied with, hence the different grounds on which the case now stood. The commissions had been reduced, the high prices over regulation had been diminished, and you had got that class of officers which the Treasury thought were most likely to remain in the service. He trusted the right hon. Baronet who was now at the head of the War Department would look upon it in the same light, and that he would meet with the co-operation of the Treasury in removing a charge which was a great detriment to the service.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that the stoppage from the pay of Cavalry and Horse Artillery Officers for forage be discontinued,"

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that it was the misfortune of the Secretary for War, in proposing these Estimates to the House, to be placed between two antagonistic forces. On the one side he had to contend against hon. Gentlemen, who complained that the Estimates were extravagant, that the charge for the army was excessive and ought to be reduced; while, on the other, he was pressed by other Gentlemen in an opposite direction, who wished to increase the expense of the army beyond what had been proposed by her Majesty's Government. Upon a late occasion, reference was made to what was said to be the excess of cost of the English army over certain foreign armies, and particularly was it mentioned that the expense of a soldier of Denmark was only £12 a year, and that was held out as a model for our imitation. Well, upon the present occasion, the hon. Gentleman said that the pay of a cavalry officer was insufficient, and he proposed in substance an addition to their pay. ["No, No!"] Well, if it was not an addition to their pay, he would be glad to know what it was. If the remission of a stoppage from a man's pay was not substantially an addition to his pay, he really was at a loss how to designate it; and it was impossible for the House to regard it in any other view. Now, it would be necessary, if this Motion were agreed to, to bring in a supplementary Estimate for about £20,000. The matter had been considered in former years, and there was no doubt that former Secretaries for War had taken a favourable view of the scheme, but it must be observed that the price of a commission of a cavalry officer was higher then than it was at present. A few years ago the price was lowered to the standard of the infantry. That circumstance had been rather ingeniously used as a reason for this addition to the pay of a cavalry officer because, said the Mover, a different class had been admitted to the cavalry. Still the reduction in the price of the commission must be regarded as a benefit to the persons who purchased, and therefore was rather a reason against the increase of their pay. Under all the circumstances of the case, he regretted to say that it was not in his power to accede to the Motion.

COLONEL NORTH said, they put down the pay of a cornet at 8s. per day, and obliged him to keep two horses, for which they deducted the charge for forage. Now, it would be much fairer to set down his pay at 6s. 7d., which was really the amount. He should like to know why the deduction in the case of the horse artillery was only 6d. The horses ate the same amount of forage—the same forage when stationed in the same garrison. Under what regulation or system was this state of things permitted? [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: They are a scientific corps.] Scientific? Are the horses scientific? [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: But the officers are.] Well, that might be, but that was no sufficient reason why their horses should not require as large a quantity of forage as those of others, and he trusted the House would see the propriety of yielding to the appeal which had been made to them by his hon. and gallant Friend below him.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought it possible to reduce the expenditure on the army in various directions, but he would not do so by deducting the pay of officers for the forage of horses which they were compelled to keep for the good of the service. But it seemed to be the principle of Government to stick to abuses, and to refuse reforms where they would be useful and truly economical. It was because they would not reduce the monstrous excrescences that attached to the expenditure of the army that they were unable, by complying with the Amendment, to do an act of justice to a deserving class of officers.

The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 75: Majority 32.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Sir George Lewis

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £635,637, Barrack Establishment.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to inquire how it was that at page 21 there was an item of £25,000 for washing and repairing barrack bedding, and at page 25 a further sum with respect to hospitals, for repairing bedding. Then for washing of sheets a sum of £10,000 was paid into the Exchequer by private soldiers, who were charged 2d. a month for that purpose. He wanted to know whether they were charged that money in the Colonies as well as in the United Kingdom, and when in billets as well as in barracks? He was informed, that when the Guards were in London, they did not pay for their washing, but somebody else did—namely, the Corporation of London. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give some explanation of this matter.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he thought the soldier should be relieved from the charge for sheet-washing at barracks.

MR. WYLD said, the present canteen system of the British army was not in harmony with the spirit of the age. The system of letting them out to contractors was very bad, and he knew one man who made £10,000 a year by them. The experiment made at Chatham, he believed, had succeeded in improving the character of the soldiers there. He saw no reason why the rooms in them, instead of being dark and ill-ventilated, should not be rendered light, and furnished with newspapers and other periodicals.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he felt it his imperative duty to call the attention of the Secretary at War to a painful subject. The establishment of camps at Aldershot and other places had produced a fearful amount of immorality and disease in the neighbourhood of those camps. From information which had reached him regarding the camp at Aldershot, he believed the careful attention of the Government was urgently required to the state of things there. There were no police regulations there. The French and other Governments on the Continent, who had for several years past formed military camps, had provided in connection with them various means of amusement and employment, which had tended very much not only to lessen the evil to which he referred, but to improve and elevate the minds of the soldiers. He knew that the Secretary at War was deeply interested in any movement beneficial to the army.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that during the recess his attention had been attracted to the subject of canteening. He had not found the evils of which the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) spoke, so generally prevalent, and at present he was at a loss to know how any material alteration of the system was to be produced. No doubt, it was to be wished that the soldier would not drink spirits or beer; but that state of perfection was not likely to be attained for some time; and if the soldier did consume those intoxicating liquors, he was not aware whether a preferable mode of supplying them to that which existed could be devised. With respect to the painful subject adverted to by the hon. Member for Finsbury, he could say that it had not escaped the attention of the Government, who had caused an inquiry to be instituted respecting it. They were in possession of an official Report on the subject, founded upon a careful investigation of facts and statistical accounts. It was difficult to exaggerate the evil as respects both the army and the navy, and he was afraid that it would be very easy for him, with the assistance of the Report to which he had alluded, to lay before the House a picture conveying an idea of the great intensity and depth of the evil. The difficulty consisted in suggesting such a remedy as would conform with public opinion in this country, and which the majority of that House would be likely to assent to; but he did not altogether despair of devising some practical means of mitigating the evil, and he thought that in the course of the Session it might be possible for him to call the attention of a Committee of the House, at all events, to the subject.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £46,097, Divine Service, agreed to.

(3.) £43,012, Martial Law.

MR. CHILDERS observed, that he thought the expenditure for military prisons was capable of reduction.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he would recommend the military prisons to the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as a model for the civil ones, as they were really a terror to evildoers.

LORD LOVAINE pointed out that there was an increase in the items for subsistence.

COLONEL W. STUART commended the effectual and economical administration of the military prisons.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS explained that the Vote for the administration of martial law appeared separately in the Estimates for the first time. The increase of £12,000 for subsistence was only nominal, as a deduction on that account was made from the soldiers' pay. Formerly the balance only was stated, but now the whole sum was set down. As the number of inmates in each military prison was small compared with the proportion in civil prisons, the expense was, of course, greater.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £255,993, Medical Establishments.

GENERAL PEEL said, he could not but express his regret at the diminution of the Staff. The warrant founded on the Report of the Sanitary Commission of 1858 was calculated greatly to improve the medical establishment, by inducing talented men to join. Its provisions had not, however, been carried out, and he thought the medical officers had just ground for complaint. The result was that the number of candidates was falling off, so that on a recent occasion, when there were forty-five vacancies, only fifteen candidates appeared, and some of these broke down under the qualifying examination.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there had been some difficulty in the navy in regard to the warrant. Negotiations had been opened with the Admiralty, and he hoped that before long the warrant would be issued in a form likely to be satisfactory to all the medical officers. The numbers of the staff medical officers were given in accordance with the return of the Medical Director General. The reductions had been chiefly effected in foreign stations.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought that the item for purveying staff, which had sprung up of late years, was capable of reduction.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to ask for some explanation respecting the appointment of a civil medical officer, whose salary, being a civilian, did not appear in the Estimates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware that Dr. Sutherland, the gentleman referred to, held any permanent office in the War Department. He was a

this addition to the pay of a cavalry officer because, said the Mover, a different class had been admitted to the cavalry. Still the reduction in the price of the commission must be regarded as a benefit to the persons who purchased, and therefore was rather a reason against the increase of their pay. Under all the circumstances of the case, he regretted to say that it was not in his power to accede to the Motion.

COLONEL NORTH said, they put down the pay of a cornet at 8s. per day, and obliged him to keep two horses, for which they deducted the charge for forage. Now, it would be much fairer to set down his pay at 6s. 7d., which was really the amount. He should like to know why the deduction in the case of the horse artillery was only 6d. The horses ate the same amount of forage—the same forage when stationed in the same garrison. Under what regulation or system was this state of things permitted? [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: They are a scientific corps.] Scientific? Are the horses scientific? [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: But the officers are.] Well, that might be, but that was no sufficient reason why their horses should not require as large a quantity of forage as those of others, and he trusted the House would see the propriety of yielding to the appeal which had been made to them by his hon. and gallant Friend below him.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought it possible to reduce the expenditure on the army in various directions, but he would not do so by deducting the pay of officers for the forage of horses which they were compelled to keep for the good of the service. But it seemed to be the principle of Government to stick to abuses, and to refuse reforms where they would be useful and truly economical. It was because they would not reduce the monstrous excrescences that attached to the expenditure of the army that they were unable, by complying with the Amendment, to do an act of justice to a deserving class of officers.

The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 75: Majority 32.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £635,637, Barrack Establishment.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to inquire how it was that at page 21 there was an item of £25,000 for washing and repairing barrack bedding, and at page 25 a further sum with respect to hospitals, for repairing bedding. Then for washing of sheets a sum of £10,000 was paid into the Exchequer by private soldiers, who were charged 2d. a month for that purpose. He wanted to know whether they were charged that money in the Colonies as well as in the United Kingdom, and when in billets as well as in barracks? He was informed, that when the Guards were in London, they did not pay for their washing, but somebody else did—namely, the Corporation of London. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give some explanation of this matter.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he thought the soldier should be relieved from the charge for sheet-washing at barracks.

MR. WYLD said, the present canteen system of the British army was not in harmony with the spirit of the age. The system of letting them out to contractors was very bad, and he knew one man who made £10,000 a year by them. The experiment made at Chatham, he believed, had succeeded in improving the character of the soldiers there. He saw no reason why the rooms in them, instead of being dark and ill-ventilated, should not be rendered light, and furnished with newspapers and other periodicals.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he felt it his imperative duty to call the attention of the Secretary at War to a painful subject. The establishment of camps at Aldershot and other places had produced a fearful amount of immorality and disease in the neighbourhood of those camps. From information which had reached him regarding the camp at Aldershot, he believed the careful attention of the Government was urgently required to the state of things there. There were no police regulations there. The French and other Governments on the Continent, who had for several years past formed military camps, had provided in connection with them various means of amusement and employment, which had tended very much not only to lessen the evil to which he referred, but to improve and elevate the minds of the soldiers. He knew that the Secretary at War was deeply interested in any movement beneficial to the army.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that during the recess his attention had been attracted to the subject of canteening. He had not found the evils of which the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) spoke, so generally prevalent, and at present he was at a loss to know how any material alteration of the system was to be produced. No doubt, it was to be wished that the soldier would not drink spirits or beer; but that state of perfection was not likely to be attained for some time; and if the soldier did consume those intoxicating liquors, he was not aware whether a preferable mode of supplying them to that which existed could be devised. With respect to the painful subject adverted to by the hon. Member for Finsbury, he could say that it had not escaped the attention of the Government, who had caused an inquiry to be instituted respecting it. They were in possession of an official Report on the subject, founded upon a careful investigation of facts and statistical accounts. It was difficult to exaggerate the evil as respects both the army and the navy, and he was afraid that it would be very easy for him, with the assistance of the Report to which he had alluded, to lay before the House a picture conveying an idea of the great intensity and depth of the evil. The difficulty consisted in suggesting such a remedy as would conform with public opinion in this country, and which the majority of that House would be likely to assent to; but he did not altogether despair of devising some practical means of mitigating the evil, and he thought that in the course of the Session it might be possible for him to call the attention of a Committee of the House, at all events, to the subject.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £43,012, Martial Law.

MR. CHILDERS observed, that he thought the expenditure for military prisons was capable of reduction.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he would recommend the military prisons to the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as a model for the civil ones, as they were really a terror to evildoers.

LORD LOVAINE pointed out that there

was an increase in the items for subsistence.

COLONEL W. STUART commended the effectual and economical administration of the military prisons.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS explained that the Vote for the administration of martial law appeared separately in the Estimates for the first time. The increase of £12,000 for subsistence was only nominal, as a deduction on that account was made from the soldiers' pay. Formerly the balance only was stated, but now the whole sum was set down. As the number of inmates in each military prison was small compared with the proportion in civil prisons, the expense was, of course, greater.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £255,993, Medical Establishments.

GENERAL PEEL said, he could not but express his regret at the diminution of the Staff. The warrant founded on the Report of the Sanitary Commission of 1858 was calculated greatly to improve the medical establishment, by inducing talented men to join. Its provisions had not, however, been carried out, and he thought the medical officers had just ground for complaint. The result was that the number of candidates was falling off, so that on a recent occasion, when there were forty-five vacancies, only fifteen candidates appeared, and some of these broke down under the qualifying examination.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there had been some difficulty in the navy in regard to the warrant. Negotiations had been opened with the Admiralty, and he hoped that before long the warrant would be issued in a form likely to be satisfactory to all the medical officers. The numbers of the staff medical officers were given in accordance with the return of the Medical Director General. The reductions had been chiefly effected in foreign stations.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought that the item for purveying staff, which had sprung up of late years, was capable of reduction.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to ask for some explanation respecting the appointment of a civil medical officer, whose salary, being a civilian, did not appear in the Estimates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware that Dr. Sutherland, the gentleman referred to, held any permanent office in the War Department. He was a sanitary commissioner, and was engaged on several inquiries.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £751,084, Disembodied Militia.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the Government proposed a Vote for the English Volunteers, but none for the defence of Ireland. There ought to be a Vote for longer time for the drill of the militia regiments, or some equivalent, for defensive purposes, to the English Vote for Volunteers.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he thought that the War Office ought either to increase the pay of militia surgeons, or withdraw the circular requiring them always to remain at head quarters.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to inquire, whether the Secretary for War had taken into his consideration the Report of the Committee of last Session on the pay and duties of army medical officers?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was his intention to act upon the Report of that Committee, and the present Estimates included the additional sum necessary for that purpose. With regard to the claim put forward by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne), it was impossible to give money to the Irish militia regiments as a bounty, because there were no Volunteers in Ireland.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that no one would assert that the time the Irish militia were out was enough to render them efficient.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £94,162, Yeomanry.

LORD LOVAINE said, he would move that the Chairman report progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

NAVAL COAST VOLUNTEERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL (Lords).

[BILL 55.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Sir George Lewis

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he rose to oppose the Bill. It consisted of one clause only, empowering the Admiralty to send the Volunteers to any part of the world; whereas by the existing Act they could not be sent to a greater distance more than 300 miles from the British shores. If the Bill should pass it, would go far to destroy the Naval Volunteer Service. The men of the Naval Volunteer Service lived on the sea coast, and were engaged mostly in the fisheries, and they were the best security for the country, but they strongly objected to be removed from the localities in which they lived. The force had been created by the late Sir James Graham and a near relative of his (Mr. Berkeley's), Lord Fitzhardinge, who, if his health had permitted it, would have been in his place elsewhere to oppose the Bill. The only reason he had heard for the Bill was that in the case of a war, if a privateer were to appear on our coast, a captain of a vessel manned by Volunteers would be unable to follow that privateer beyond certain limits. Now, the answer to that was that no vessel having Englishmen on board would ever decline to follow an enemy anywhere. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.
